Under such law there will be no excuse for the submarining or destruction of an American merchant vessel without notice and without giving an opportunity for the preservation of the lives on board such vessel. It is true that the belligerent, upon searching the vessel, may find contraband, and may condemn both the ship and the cargo, but the lives of those on board will be preserved. The question of the legality of such condemnation can be tested in prize courts, either during or after the war. Such condemnation may arouse the indignation of our citizens, but certainly not to such a degree as to cause them to consider war.

On the other hand, if the lives of our citizens on board our merchant vessels are destroyed without notice and without opportunity to escape, then it will be necessary for the President to establish the combat area as provided in the act.

Let it be remembered that if the act had been defeated in the Senate, or if it is defeated in the House of Representatives, that then there will be no cash-and-carry law or any combat-area law on our statute books. If the act is defeated, then our vesse'ls can legally engage in commerce with warring powers as they did in 1917, and can carry guns for defense while engaged in commerce with neutrals adjacent to belligerents, and these vessels will be sunk, in all probability, as they were sunk in 1917. And the lives of our seamen will be lost, and our people will become excited, indignant, angry, hysterical, and violent, and they may demand war, as they did in 1917.

It was not the loss of money or the illegal destruction of our property that inflamed the minds of our citizens and engendered the uncontrollable spirit of war in 1917. For over 2 years we bore the illegal destruction of our property without threat of war. While our people unqualifiedly condemned, with righteous indignation, the illegal and inhuman sinking of the Lusitania without notice, resulting in the great loss of life, including the lives of 128 of our citizens, our Government, realizing the horrors of war and longing for peace, did not declare war then, as urged by Theodore Roosevelt, because our citizens were not without blame. The Lusitania was a British ship. It was sailing from the United States to Great Britain. It was carrying contraband of war to German's enemy. Germany had warned American citizens before the Lusitania sailed to keep off the ship. It is true that our citizens, under international law, had a legal right to travel upon such ship. During over 2 years others of our citizens lost their lives on belligerent vessels, but there was no necessity for their being upon such vessels, and they had been warned by our Government of the danger.

It is now made unlawful for our citizens to travel upon belligerent vessels.

I do not recite these facts in justification of the brutal submarining of passenger vessels without opportunity for the preservation of the lives of those on board. I recall to your mind these facts to emphasize the absurdity of the slanderous charge that our Government was influenced by munition makers or bankers or by loss of property or the danger of lost moneys loaned to the belligerents.

Certainly when we restrained ourselves, even in such conditions, we could not have been influenced to war because of the mere loss of property.

Then the question naturally arises, What acts did force us into the war? The answer is definite and certain. It was the unlimited submarine warfare conducted by the German Government against our neutral commerce and our merchant vessels in March and April 1917. From March 12 until April 4 the Germans submarined and sank 8 of our merchant vessels on the high seas without notice, resulting in the loss of lives of 63 American seamen.

These vessels were not sunk upon the excuse that they were carrying arms and ammunition. No such protest was ever made by Germany. No American vessel was sunk for any such alleged cause. They were sunk because they could legally carry anything to Germany's enemy. Germany was fighting just as fiercely to prevent wheat, cotton, iron, steel, copper, and other raw materials, not now included on the embargo list, from reaching her enemy as she was to stop the delivery of arms and ammunition.

If our embargo law had been on our statute books and in effect during the World War, would it have prevented Germany from submarining our merchant vessels in 1917? Obviously, it would not. Would the Embargo Act have any effect during this war? Certainly not. Then how will the embargo on arms and ammunition even tend to save the lives of our seamen, when our vessels can carry everything else to belligerents?

If the act that passed the Senate passes the House, then no goods can be carried by American vessels to belligerents in the war area. We have got to save the lives of our citizens from destruction by warring powers by keeping them off belligerent vessels, and by preventing our own vessels from trading with such belligerents, or going into combat areas. Unless this is done it is probable that we will be dragged into the present and future wars. If the Senate act passes the House and becomes law, there need be little fear for the lives of our citizens or the peace of our country.

Is there any intelligent, peace-loving, patriotic citizen who would be willing to see such act defeated by reason of leaving out the embargo provisions, or for any other excuse whatsoever? Does not every intelligent citizen know that our first duty is to protect the lives of our citizens from destruction by warring powers, and that the most effective way to accomplish this is to keep our citizens off of belligerent ships and out of combat areas, and to protect the lives of our seamen by keeping our American vessels from trading with belligerents and from entering combat areas? Is this not the surest way to keep out of war? If this be so—and I know that all thinking citizens will admit it is so, unless they are confused by misleading and illogical arguments and appeals to groundless fear—they will pray for the enactment of the Senate act.

Those who will have the Embargo Act or nothing, present three main arguments:

(1) That it is unneutral for our Government to change the law during war;

(2) That it is inhuman to furnish weapons for the mass murder of people by warring powers; and

(3) That the repeal of the embargo law constitutes intervention in the present war, and is the first step that will inevitably lead us into the war.

Now, let us calmly consider these arguments.

It is the overwhelming opinion of international lawyers that the change in a domestic law of a neutral even after war has arisen is not unneutral if in its changed form it operates equally as between the belligerents. A neutral may, according to the best interpretation of international law, enact any law that it deems essential for the protection of its citizens and for the protection of its peace, without regard to its effect on belligerents.

Much is made of the fact that nearly all of the 63 Senators who voted to repeal the embargo law voted for it in 1935 and 1937. I introduced the acts, both in 1935 and in 1937, and supported them on the floor of the Senate. I believed then that it might have a deterrent effect on war. It has become obvious that that conjecture was erroneous. I believe then that it could be administered equally and justly as between all belligerents. Subsequent events have proven conclusively to my mind that I was in error as to such conclusion. The impossibility of administering the law justly was demonstrated in the conflict between Japan and China. China, having no munition works, had to have the manufactured arms and ammunition. Japan, having vast munition works and ample cheap labor, preferred to acquire and did acquire the raw materials out of which arms and ammunition were made. The Embargo Act did not include in its list raw materials. Had the embargo been placed upon Japan and China, Japan could have gotten everything she needed, while China would have been deprived of getting the only thing she could use—that is, arms and ammunition.

And then the war broke out between Great Britain, France, and Poland on the one side and Germany on the other. The President, under the existing law, put in force and effect the Embargo Act against such warring powers. The act absolutely prevents France and Great Britain from obtaining arms, ammunition, and implements of war from us. Germany, on the other hand, can obtain unlimited quantities of our arms, ammunition, and implements of war through Russia, Italy, Rumania, or any other neutral European power. Russia is neutral. Italy is neutral. They can obtain all the arms, ammunition, and implements of war they desire from the United States because the law only applies to belligerents, and such countries are not belligerents but are neutrals.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho in his colloquy with me at the time of his speech on October 2, stated that Italy is in alliance with Germany, and that our arms, ammunition, and implements of war should not be permitted to go to Italy. I then called to his attention the fact that the law only applies to belligerents and unless the law is changed we cannot place the embargo against Italy.

Russia has a mutual-aid treaty with Germany, and yet Russia, under the law—and no one has offered any amendment to change the law—can obtain all of the arms, ammunition, and implements of war she desires. There is no way that the United States can prevent such arms, ammunition, and implements of war from going into Germany through Italy and Russia, or even through Rumania, which Germany dominates.

I could not have anticipated such a condition at the time that I voted for the Embargo Act. At the time I voted for it I thought it could be administered justly. Now I know that it cannot. If we enacted a law which at the time we believed just, and afterward we discover that it is unjust, we should repeal it.

There is still another grave injustice in the Embargo Act. It permits a country like Russia to arm to the hilt through the purchase of arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States, and then, when prepared, prevent countries like Finland, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania from preparing for defense by simply starting war against them. When she starts war against them the Embargo Act goes into effect as to all of them.

Now as to the second argument; that is, that it is inhuman to permit arms and ammunition to be exported to belligerents.

How any citizen can support such argument so long as his Government permits its citizens to furnish to warring powers the scrap iron that makes the bomb, and the gasoline that runs the airplane that drops the bomb, is beyond my imagination.

Now as to the third one, namely, that the repeal of the embargo constitutes an intervention.

It is not seriously denied that passing the law would not be an intervention, and, therefore, it is difficult to see how having no domestic law would be intervention. Under the international law as it has existed from time immemorial, it is not unneutral for a neutral government to permit belligerent governments to purchase arms, ammunition, and implements of war in its country, or to purchase any other kind of material. In fact, the great writers on international law have contended that such was the only safe way to be neutral. All writers on international law agree that no change in the domestic law is unneutral if it bears equally upon the belligerents. I believe that I have shown that the law at present operates unequally and injures France and Great Britain and aids Germany. I think it is obvious that if we have no embargo law both belligerents will obtain equally our arms, ammunition, and implements of war.

We hear it reiterated that the repeal of the embargo will be the first step toward war. I contend that it will be the first step away from war, because it is the only act on our books that will subject us to taking sides, thus arousing the hatred of people.

It has been said that if we repeal the Embargo Act that, then, next we will repeal the cash provisions of the act and extend unlimited credit, and that, then, when Great Britain and France have exhausted their securities, we will give them more credit without security and that, then, it appearing that Great Britain can't win and can't pay her debts unless we send soldiers over to help win the war, that we will send soldiers over to help them win the war.

That argument might be denounced as the height of absurdity if it were not pitiable in that it brands a majority of the Members of the Congress of the United States as weak, pusillanimous individuals who have not sufficient will power to do what is right today for fear they will do what is wrong tomorrow. It brands the majority of the Members of Congress as inhuman, as men and women who would be willing to sacrifice the lives of thousands, possibly millions, of our boys to save some money.

The only excuse for such arguments is to blind the reason of our citizens and to influence them against an American law—the strongest law we could possibly enact—to preserve the lives of our citizens and keep us out of war. They have attempted to arouse the animosity of some of our citizens against Great Britain. I hold no brief for Great Britain. I am seeking solely, and as intensely as I ever performed any act in my life, to preserve the lives of our citizens and to make it possible for the United States to keep out of this war.

In commenting upon my answer to Colonel Lindbergh's last speech, a newspaper published that "PITTMAN drops the mask which administrators and leaders have employed—the mask that repeal of the embargo will make us more neutral. He says the major object of repeal is to help England and France." This is the character of unmitigated falsehood that is published to accomplish base deception.

It is intimated that the 63 Senators who voted for the Senate bill are under the direction and domination of the statesmen of Great Britain. There is absolutely no foundation for any such statement. Those that charge this seem totally oblivious to the facts that the German press have had their pictures in many issues and have praised them to the skies as patriots. They seem oblivious to the fact that the head of the bund in this country has admitted that he has engaged in propaganda against the repeal of the embargo. They seem oblivious to the fact that the press of Russia is condemning the 63 Senators who voted for the act as traitors to their country, while praising those Senators who felt that we should retain the Embargo Act.

No; the 30 Senators who voted to retain the Embargo Act are able, sincere, and patriotic men and have not been influenced by any propaganda, nor have those who voted for the cash and carry and the repeal of the Embargo Act been influenced by any propaganda.

We are all seeking the same end, and that is to preserve the peace of our country and protect the lives of our citizens and to keep out of war. We are all determined to accomplish these ends.

Neutrality Joint Resolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. KING

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

STATEMENT BY HON. CARTER GLASS, OF VIRGINIA

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the able senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who, unfortunately, has been indisposed for some time, was unable to be present when the final vote was taken in the Senate on the so-called neutrality joint resolution. He has, however, prepared a strong statement expressing his views respecting the proposed legislation. I ask that his statement may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of October 30, 1939]

GLASS SEES HITLER SOLE UNITED STATES WAR PERIL—SENATOR, ILL IN BED, SAYS CONGRESS ONLY HAS POWER TO TAKE US INTO CONFLICT

WASHINGTON, October 29.—Senator CARTER GLASS said today that only one person could get the United States into the war—"this wretched creature," Adolf Hitler.

The elderly Virginia Democrat declared it was "the sheerest drivel" to say that the President could involve this country in a foreign conflict. Saying that only Congress has the power to declare war, he added:

"The only person who may drag this Nation into war is Hitler. His pledged word is not worth a thrip. He is a fervent believer in the immoral Machiavellian doctrine of the end justifying the means, however vile the end may be.

"He has repeatedly lied as to his purposes since the deplorable Munich conference, and it may confidently be expected that under his wretched domination Germany still regards written treaties as mere scraps of paper."

PRINCIPLE HIS SONS FOUGHT FOR

Senator GLASS granted an interview in his sickroom at a Washington hotel. Attired in blue-trimmed white pajamas, he propped himself on a pillow and asserted that he still believed in the principles he enunciated in 1916 when he spoke against a bill which would have had Congress warn Americans that they traveled in belligerent vessels at their own risk.

At that time, Senator GLASS, speaking of his two sons, said that he "would rather be pursued through time and eternity by the pitiful apparition of their shattered forms than to see my country dishonored and its flag hauled down in disgrace."

The Senator glanced across the room at pictures of Gen. John J. Pershing, his children, and his grandchildren.

"One of my sons was gassed, and the other was a combatant soldier," he remarked.

"But a nation without spirit or an elevated soul is as bad as a derelict on the seas, and must be devoid of self-respect and unworthy of the respect of other nations.

"This country should not be content simply to eat and sleep and go to the movies. That would be a sorry contribution to modern civilization."

SHIP CURB IN FEAR OF ASSASSIN

Senator GLASS, who has been ill for a month, said he was "distinctly distressed" at his inability to cast his Senate vote for repeal "of the abominable Embargo Act."

He expressed sharp disapproval, however, of provisions in the bill which would prohibit American ships from trading with belligerent nations as "expedients to contravene immemorial requirements of international law through positive fear of a Central European assassin."

"The only person on earth who may drag this Nation into war is Hitler, and the action of the Senate in passing the cash-and-carry feature of the embargo bill, as it seems to me, distinctly in anticipation of Hitler doing this very thing, is brutal disregard of international law," he said.

Not Britain, or France, or Italy, "or even Russian" was expected to sink American ships without warning, he said.

"It is only Hitler who is expected to do it," he added.

"We are spending approximately a billion dollars to create an effective merchant marine, and are now deliberately proposing to paralyze the industry by preventing it from going to sea except in restricted areas."

The Senator said he would have voted against the so-called cash-and-carry provisions of the neutrality bill and, while conceding that the action was "expedient," added that "even with the harsh and unprecedented restrictions upon our merchant shipping, there is no assurance that Hitler's submarines and bombers will not disregard all requirements of international law."

"This country went into the World War to vindicate its rights on the high seas, and now to relinquish these rights through fear of Hitler is to dishonor our dead," he said. "The proposition is utterly destitute of courage and moral sense."

STATEMENT BY SENATOR

Senator GLASS's statement of his views on neutrality was as follows:

"Although distinctly distressed at my inability, due to severe illness, to be in the Senate and personally cast my vote for repeal of the abominable Embargo Act, I derive measured satisfaction from the overwhelming vote in favor of repeal. I was paired in favor of repeal, and to that extent my vote counted as much as had it been cast personally.

"I do not take much satisfaction in the inclusion in the embargo repeal bill of the so-called cash-and-carry feature. I think no other nation on earth has thus voluntarily abandoned its undoubted rights in international law on the subject of neutrality.

"Not in my eighty-odd years of life have I known or heard of a more humiliating spectacle than that presented by the legislative body of a great, rich, and powerful nation spending months in devising expedients to contravene immemorial requirements of international law through positive fear of a Central European assassin.

"In my view, the talk about the President or any other personage in this Nation 'dragging the country into war' is the sheerest drivel. The Congress has the sole constitutional right to declare war; the President is not granted the power to either approve or veto the decision of Congress in this respect. So that if we are to be dragged into the war or to stay out, as we undoubtedly should do, it must be by action of the Congress.

"HITLER THE ONLY WAR MAKER

"The only person on earth who may drag this Nation into war is Hitler, and the action of the Senate in passing the cash-and-carry feature of the embargo bill was, as it seems to me, distinctly in anticipation of Hitler doing this very thing in brutal disregard of international law.

"No sane person conceives that either Great Britain or France is going to sink any of our merchant vessels, or ruthlessly drown any of our nationals without warning and in shameless violation of international law. Nobody has ventured to suggest that Italy or even Russia is capable of doing anything of this kind.

"It is only Hitler who is expected to do it, and it is in fear of this wretched creature, dripping with the blood of women and children and noncombatants, boasting of his ravages of open towns in one of his conquered nations, that we have the shocking spectacle of this great Nation relinquishing its rights on the high seas and excessively penalizing its own shipping industry for carrying on its legitimate business.

"We are spending approximately $1,000,000,000 to creat an effective merchant marine and are now deliberately proposing to paralyze the industry by preventing it from going to sea except in restricted areas.

"AMERICA'S RIGHTS ON SEAS

"Should our ships be permitted to assert their rights on the high seas, they would, of course, be subject to the requirements of international law and alone responsible for any hazard taken contrary to the requirements of international law. 'Search and seizure' are sanctioned by all civilized nations, and our merchant marine fully understands this.

"This whole subject of American rights on the seas was exhaustively and intelligently discussed by the Congress just prior to our entrance in the World War. Over and over again Lansing, Acting Secretary of State, vehemently asserted the rights of American shipping and warned Germany that we would not tolerate any attempt to violate them or any breach on Germany's part of the prohibitions or sanctions of international law.

"To enforce his contention, Lansing reasserted the doctrine proclaimed by Chief Justice Marshall in the Nercide case of 1815, reaffirmed time and again by the Supreme Court of the United States in all judicial determinations by the Court up to this time.

"Hence, had I been able to attend the Senate sessions, I would, upon full consideration, have dissented from the cash-and-carry feature of the embargo bill. However, I imagine the circumstances were such, unhappily, to make the action taken expedient if not desirable.

"Nevertheless, persons actuated by reason and not by considerations of pseudo-humanitarianism could well wish that the United States would not be taken to the verge of poltroonism, as was so cogently expressed in 1916 by Senator Sutherland, since a notable member of the Supreme Court of the United States.

"MORAL SENSE OF NATION

"Even with the harsh and unprecedented restrictions upon our merchant shipping, there is no assurance that Hitler's submarines and bombers will not disregard all requirements of law. His pledged word is not worth a thrip.

"He is a fervent believer in the immoral Machiavellian doctrine of the end justifying the means, however vile the end may be. He has repeatedly lied as to his purposes since the deplorable Munich conference, and it may confidently be expected that under his wretched domination Germany still regards written treaties as mere scraps of paper.

"This country went into the World War to indicate its rights on the high seas, and now to relinquish these rights through fear of Hitlerism is to dishonor our dead. The proposition is utterly destitute of courage and moral sense. A nation without spirit or an elevated soul is as bad as a derelict on the seas, and must be devoid of self-respect and unworthy of the respect of other nations.

"This country should not be content simply to eat and sleep and go to the movies. That would be a sorry contribution to modern civilization.

"The talk about the munitions industry dragging this country into war, either past or present, is incredible fiction. As a matter of fact, in the World War our munitions industry was utterly incapable of supplying our own demands, and American troops at the front had to be supplied with rifles by France."

Repeal of Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

LETTER FROM HON. JAMES E. WATSON, FORMER SENATOR FROM INDIANA

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, on October 30, 1939, in the Washington Evening Star, there appeared a splendid letter by a former distinguished leader of the majority here in the Senate, a former Senator from my State. I am sure that his colleagues will be interested in the views of Hon. James E. Watson, former Senator from Indiana, on the question of the repeal of the arms embargo and the passage of the so-called Pittman Act. I therefore ask unanimous consent that his letter may be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of October 30, 1939]

FORMER SENATOR URGES REPEAL OF EMBARGO—PASSAGE OF PITTMAN BILL HELD BEST PEACE INSURANCE

To the EDITOR OF THE STAR:

It is very evident that, had Congress never passed an embargo act, it would not enact one now, and especially the kind that is on our statute books today.

Probably not a half dozen Senators could be induced to vote for it as an original proposition, for it immediately would be construed all over the world as a nonneutral act.

And it seems to me quite evident that the present act is nonneutral for it undoubtedly inures to the benefit of one country. This was not intentionally done when the act was passed, but circumstances have so completely changed in Europe that our present law works to the advantage of Germany and discriminates against England and France.

In order to be perfectly neutral we should do neither, but the present temper of our people is for our Nation to be just as helpful to Britain and France as we possibly can without getting into war ourselves.

Before the passage of this law in 1935 everybody believed that we were entirely neutral in all of our international relations, and, therefore, it is manifest that the Embargo Act is the only obstacle that stands in the way of at least a partial restoration of that status and feeling.

It seems quite certain that, with that act repealed, we would be well-nigh restored to the condition that existed before it was passed, and hence it is altogether desirable to repeal it, unless we encounter greater difficulties by repealing it than now exist, and that has not yet been demonstrated by any facts adduced or any argument advanced by the advocates of the existing law.

Both sides to the controversy are convinced that international law has nothing to do with this proposition. We had the right to pass the Embargo Act and we have the right to repeal it. It is wholly a domestic matter and we are under no obligations to present the question to any other nation before taking action.

Under international law we have always sold everything we had to sell to other nations that wanted to buy, even in time of war, and our right to do so has never been questioned.

The Embargo Act was passed with the very best intentions, but it now seems to have gotten us into a difficulty from which we cannot be extricated unless we repeal it, and that repeal undoubtedly could be effected without interfering with international law, or with our relations with any other nation, with the possible exception of one.

To retain the Embargo Act is, therefore, to the advantage of just one nation and to the disadvantage of many others.

Germany cannot complain if we want to restore the condition of neutrality that existed before this act was passed; and England and France, on the other hand, would undoubtedly be delighted to have it done.

It is said that if we pass the proposed law, Germany will not have access to our markets because she has no navy. That is unfortunate for her only. It is not our fault, but her misfortune, and there is no requirement of international law and no item in the comity of nations that compels us to prevent England and France from taking full advantage of their fortunate situation in this regard.

With the Embargo Act repealed and a cash-and-carry plan adopted, all nations can come here and buy whatever they have the money to pay for and carry it away in their own vessels, subject to whatever dangers naturally accrue in time of war.

When a Member of the Senate, I voted for the World War, but that problem did not rise to disturb us at any time during that conflict, for, under the rules of international law, as far as they could be observed in time of war, every nation had the right to buy or sell in any market where the articles they desired could be obtained.

We were literally forced into that war because Germany engaged in a ruthless attack upon our commerce upon the seas. Her submarines sank many vessels, destroyed many cargoes, and killed many Americans, and these outrages so aroused our people that Congress was compelled to go to war as our only recourse.

Now, the simple truth is that all of those outrages can occur under our present existing law and doubtless will if it remains on the statute books; whereas if it is repealed, and if substituted for it the proposition now before the Senate is enacted into law, such losses cannot occur for the simple reason that both ships and property will be prevented from sailing into danger zones where such destruction can occur. In other words, there is not a shadow of doubt but that the proposed law would keep American ships out of present regions of danger.

Therefore the present law, or anything that could be done pursuant to its provisions, is not a guaranty against our involvement in war, whereas the proposed law necessarily would prevent our being dragged into war by reason of the destruction of our property on the high seas.

Let it not be forgotten that no arms, munitions, or implements of war can be carried on our own ships under any conditions if this proposed law be enacted, nor could anything in any of these categories be carried in foreign ships from our shores until all title to them has been transferred to the foreign buyer.

So it is very plain that if any materials, or the ship, or the crew, or the passengers on such foreign vessel should be destroyed there would be no action for our Government to take that would involve us in war because of such destruction. This is just as plain as that 2 and 2 make 4.

JAMES E. WATSON,
Former United States Senator from Indiana.

OCTOBER 22.

The Late Cardinal Mundelein

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. MEAD
OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

STATEMENT BY HON. JAMES M. MEAD, OF NEW YORK, AND COMMENTS BY VARIOUS PERSONS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, recently many expressions of sympathy were evoked and much comment was made on the great loss suffered by the Nation in the passing of Cardinal Mundelein. I represent, in part, the great State of New York. This noted figure of the church was born and raised on the East Side of the city of New York. He was raised there among an illustrious group. I am setting forth in a statement prepared by me, which I ask to have published in the RECORD, comments on his death by many who knew him in his childhood and many who knew him as a young man in school and later on in the university.

The story of the unusual capacity for knowledge of this immigrant's son, the experience he gained in the atmosphere in which he was reared, his unusual attainments in college and in the university, and his great contribution to the well-being of the church, of which he was a leader, and to the Nation in which he was a great constructive force for good, in my judgment, constitute an epic that merits the attention and study of every American.

So, Mr. President, I ask to have included with my remarks, comments on this great figure by President Roosevelt, by the Archbishop of New York, by the Postmaster General, and also by others who knew him and particularly by those who were associated with him on the great East Side of New York, where many of the leaders in the political and religious life of the Nation received their start.

There being no objection, Mr. MEAD's statement and the comments were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MEAD

The State of New York, Empire State of the Union, has distinguished itself on many occasions and for many reasons, but its production of many of the foremost leaders of the Nation in every walk of life marks one of its most valuable and enduring contributions. Of all of these men none have excelled in the qualities which reflect greatness the late lamented George Cardinal Mundelein. He was a product of New York City's great East Side. He rose to spiritual and scholastic heights which commanded the respect and admiration of an entire Nation.

The death of George Cardinal Mundelein sorrowed the Nation because he was not only a devout Christian leader but a great humanitarian whose lofty, democratic ideals enriched the lives of all who came within his influence. He will take a place among America's immortals because he served this country with matchless patriotism in spiritual, social, and philosophical fields. He generously served all of society and from his noble deeds sprung a force for good among all his fellow men.

Every American youth is taught of the possibility for his rise from humble origin to distinguished leadership. It is a truthful tradition in this land that helps to weave more tightly the fabric of our democracy. Cardinal Mundelein's career followed the golden pathway of American opportunity. With enthusiasm and zest he grasped each precious advantage. He dearly loved his country and he served it with unselfish devotion. He never forgot his early circumstances nor the plight of those less fortunate than himself.

Cardinal Mundelein was born on July 2, 1872, at 35 Avenue C, in New York City. He was of nine children of an early immigrant family which had come to New York from Germany. His father was Francis Mundelein; his mother, the former Mary Goetz.

He began his educational career at St. Nicholas Parochial School on Second Street in New York. From there he transferred his studies to De La Salle Academy and still later he entered Manhattan College. His application to his studies resulted in his graduation from Manhattan College at the age of 17. He had already established a splendid reputation in scholastic endeavors and his fine physical preparation is evidenced by the fact that, through the interest of friends of his family, President Cleveland offered him an appointment at the United States Naval Academy at this time. The young student declined the honor, however, because he had cherished from childhood the ambition to become a priest.

Without interruption in his studies, he entered St. Vincent's Seminary, in Beatty, Pa. He completed his course there in record time and, thereafter, engaged in 3 additional years' intensive training before entering the priesthood.

The unusual vitality and capacity for knowledge of this immigrant's son from the streets of New York is emphasized by the fact that he was the youngest graduate of the De La Salle Academy; the youngest graduate of St. Vincent's Seminary; and became the youngest cardinal of modern times. This same record held true likewise in his elevations to the posts of bishop and archbishop.

Cardinal Mundelein's distinguished ecclesiastical career began with his assignment as rector of the Lithuanian Church in Brooklyn and as secretary to Bishop McDonnell, of Brooklyn. Later, he became rector of the All Saints Church, in Brooklyn, which he built, and still later he became rector of the Catholic church at Long Beach, Long Island, which he also built.

From 1897 to 1909 he served as chancellor of the diocese of Brooklyn. During that period Pope Pius X appointed him a domestic prelate, with the title of Right Reverend. He also had been appointed censor by the Liturgical Academy. In 1909 he was made Titular Bishop of Loryma, and soon later auxiliary bishop of Brooklyn. He served in this post until 1915, when he was directed to Chicago and appointed archbishop of Chicago. From that date he has been more actively identified with Chicago. He became a cardinal in March 1924.

The barest factual résumé of Cardinal Mundelein's contributions to his church and to the Nation would be an enormous undertaking. His accomplishment in directing the construction of hundreds of churches, schools, hospitals, and orphanages; the tolerance and piety of his numerous religious utterances; and the force of his statements on matters of civic and public interest are best known of his contributions to the betterment of society. But to those who knew him intimately, it seems that, after all, these may not have been his richest contributions to human happiness. He was a man who reaped his riches of happiness from little personal acts of sacrifice and kindliness.

Illustrating the friendships that bound this man of God so closely to his fellow men, I desire to list a few of the recent public tributes to his memory:

President Roosevelt: "A career of great goodness and usefulness has been brought to an untimely close with the passing of Cardinal Mundelein. He served his day and generation with unfailing fidelity to the highest principles of Christianity. As a citizen who glorified in our American democracy, he was an advocate and exemplary of justice and righteousness, whether in the relationship of the individual to the state, or in the field of international affairs. His influence was always potent for peace. My personal acquaintance with Cardinal Mundelein began when he was bishop of Brooklyn, and I mourn the loss of a true friend—a close friend for many years."

William Cardinal O'Connell: "I am profoundly grieved at the news of the sudden passing of my illustrious and revered colleague, Cardinal Mundelein. I have known him since he was a young bishop, and I have always admired and respected him as a truly noble character, a devoted churchman, and a sincere and loyal American. His death is a severe loss to the church and the Nation that he loved and served so well. May his noble soul rest in peace."

Secretary of State Cordell Hull: "I was privileged to enjoy Cardinal Mundelein's friendship over a long period of years. A great American of unusual ability and capacity, he was ever ready cheerfully to give the utmost of his splendid talents to the public service."

Archbishop Francis J. Spellman, of New York: "I am shocked and sorrowed by the news of the death of Cardinal Mundelein. His eminence was outstanding as an American citizen and as a Catholic priest and bishop. His work for God and country was monumental and constructive. Courageously and charitably he labored until the end."

Postmaster General James A. Farley: "The sudden death of His Eminence George Cardinal Mundelein grieves me deeply. For many years he has been an outstanding member of the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church and his work as cardinal and archbishop of the Chicago diocese has done much for the advancement of the church in this country, the benefits of which will accrue through the years to come. He was highly regarded by persons of every religious belief and his passing is a severe loss to the church. Cardinal Mundelein was an outstanding American as well as a great churchman, and he never lost an opportunity to let the people know of his attitude on any great public question. Personally, I knew His Eminence well, and I mourn the loss of a dear friend."

The Most Reverend Amleto Giovanni Cicognani, Apostolic Delegate: "The church has lost not only an outstanding administrator but a truly great churchman. Numerous churches as well as educational and charitable institutions in the archdiocese of Chicago are a monument to his active and fruitful zeal."

Secretary of Commerce Harry L. Hopkins: "Cardinal Mundelein, through deed and work, always served as an inspiration."

Mayor Fiorella LaGuardia of New York City: "The death of Cardinal Mundelein would mean a great loss at any time, but it is an irreparable loss at this time. Few persons had the intimate and accurate knowledge of European affairs that he had. His whole mind and soul were devoted to the cause of clarification of the situation leading toward permanent peace. He was a kindly churchman and a courageous and outspoken statesman."

Hon. Alfred E. Smith, former Governor of New York: "I am shocked at the sad news of the death of Cardinal Mundelein, a friend of mine of many years standing. Born on the East Side of Manhattan Island, he was an outstanding American citizen and a great churchman."

Rabbi Louis L. Mann, of New York: "In the passing of Cardinal Mundelein not only our Catholic brethren but the entire religious world has lost a devoted and consecrated figure. He dared defy nazi-ism in the name of God and humanity."

Brother A. Victor, F. S. C., president, Manhattan College: "The Christian Brothers of Manhattan College faculty and the alumni learned with keen sorrow of the passing of George Cardinal Mundelein, who, marking the golden jubilee of his graduation, was singled out by his alma mater for special honor this year. A brilliant student, a forceful and fearless leader for the right of God, church, and country, we feel his loss profoundly."

Bishop Waldorf, of New York: "I am sure I speak for the Methodist people everywhere in extending our sincere sympathy and expressing our sense of loss to the church universal."

Rabbi I. H. Levinthal, of New York: "Cardinal Mundelein's death is a grievous loss not only to the Catholic Church, of which he was one of the prominent leaders, but to all Americans. He was a religionist, and his death represents a distinct spiritual loss to the forces of righteousness in America. All people, regardless of race or creed, will mourn his passing."

Rev. Alfred G. Walton, of New York: "Cardinal Mundelein has been a powerful and effective leader in the Roman Catholic Church in the direct sense of the word, preaching and practicing in his own life the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man."

World Broadcast on Moral Rearmament—A World Philosophy Adequate for World Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

WORLD BROADCAST ON MORAL REARMAMENT

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, on Sunday, October 29, a world-wide broadcast in behalf of moral rearmament was held, preparatory to a world-wide radio program over the week-end of December 1, 2, and 3. Among those taking part in the broadcast were the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN]; Dr. Frank N. D. Buchman, founder of the Oxford Group and the world movement for moral re-armament; Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd, U. S. N., commanding officer of the United States Antarctic Service Expedition; and Herbert H. Elvin, chairman of the British Trades Union Congress, 1937–38, and fraternal delegate to the American Federation of Labor Annual Convention in Cincinnati in October 1939.

The spirit that moves the sponsors of that which today is called moral re-armament is not new. It is a spirit that has moved the hearts of men for centuries. It was expressed by one great ancient philosopher who taught that in order to have peace in the realm there must be peace in the heart of the ruler. If the ruler shall rectify his kingdom he must first rectify himself. Moral re-armament accepts this theory and assumes that if the hearts of the people of the world are full of peace the world will reflect those heart desires. As the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] took part in this world-wide broadcast, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the proceedings of this great event.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN, OF MISSOURI

It is an honor and privilege to speak to you in this world broadcast on moral rearmament. I speak from the Nation's Capital at Washington, where 4 months ago I first met Dr. Buchman at the great national meeting for moral rearament at Constitution Hall. This great hall was thronged with the leaders of Washington's civic, political, and diplomatic life on that occasion. We were stirred as we had never been before by the evidence from men and women representing nations all over the world from every walk of life who had found in this new, yet old, way a satisfying and constructive answer for themselves and for their Nation.

I had the honor at that time to present the following message from the President of the United States, which opened that great assembly: "The underlying strength of the world must consist in the moral fiber of her citizens. A program of moral rearmament for the world cannot fail, therefore, to lessen the danger of armed conflict. Such moral rearmament to be most highly effective must receive support on a world-wide basis."

This great gathering was sponsored by Cabinet officers and Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives. The invitation to the meeting contained messages from former President Hoover; the Secretary of State; the Secretary of War; the Attorney General; the Honorable William B. Bankhead, the Speaker of the House of Representatives; the Honorable Alben Barkley, the majority leader of the Senate; the Honorable Joseph W. Martin, Jr., the minority leader in the House of Representatives; Senator Capper, of Kansas; and Senator Wagner, of New York. A message was also received from Gen. John J. Pershing, commander of the armies of the United States in the last war, which I quote:

"This moral rearmament should enlist the support of all thinking people. There is a spiritual emotion which underlies all true patriotism, and good citizenship itself is dependent upon the high sense of moral obligation of the people. Today, confronted by conditions so threatening to world peace, we must rededicate ourselves to the faith of our forefathers if we are to be worthy of our heritage."

There was a message from the House of Lords of Great Britain signed by 25 members of that body, and a message from the House of Commons signed by 242 members of that body. Messages also came from the Parliaments of eight other countries, from British industry and labor, and from great diplomats the world over.

During the last 4 months we have seen our people from the farms, in the cities, from the work shop, and in the homes answering this call for moral rearmament. The hope of a new world—united, strong, and free as never before—has come to the hearts of Americans from coast to coast as they have watched this new spirit unite husband and wife, parents and children, employer and employee, statesman and citizen. The battle is for a new world—a world of peace and love. We have been gratified to see this Nation-wide response in America to the challenge of moral rearmament. In every walk of life, our citizens are awakening to those Christian virtues of honesty, purity, unselfishness, and love which form the bedrock of national character, and which enlist the citizens of a democracy in constructive national service.

The World Assembly for Moral Rearmament, which took place on the west coast, began with the gathering of some 25,000 people in the Hollywood Bowl at Los Angeles in July. It brought leading representatives from over 20 nations to its deliberations and closed with the day for moral rearmament at the Golden Gate International Exposition in San Francisco. That assembly marked a great contribution to the life of America and all the world.

The essential condition of any lasting world peace is a new spirit among nations. Without such a new spirit no general settlement will be possible. With it there might be achieved a realistic reordering of world affairs which would endure. A well-known statesman, who with others has taken an active part in furthering the spirit of moral rearmament in his own nation has said: "The battle for peace must be fought in the heart of the individual, and thus throughout the community, if it is to be won in the world. Victory in this battle is the one thing needful for the world in which we live. It implies first of all a change of heart. Experience has proved that such a change can take place, and that it comes to those who turn from judging others and their systems to a sense of their own faults and a determination to live under the guidance of God. The strength of a nation is shown in the courage to admit her own faults. The glory of a nation is to have a creative message for the world."

It is rare in these days to find something which will unite man and nations on a plane above conflict of party, class, or political philosophy. I am sure that I voice the sentiment of all those who are listening, when I express gratification at a response so remarkable to a need so urgent, and I am confident that America will play her full part in this great cause. I believe that the future of civilization must largely depend upon the success of moral rearmament.

ADDRESS BY FRANK N. D. BUCHMAN, FOUNDER OF THE OXFORD GROUP AND THE WORLD MOVEMENT FOR MORAL REARMAMENT

I am grateful for the statesmanlike words in which Senator TRUMAN has referred to the widespread work and influence of moral rearmament in this and other countries. He has struck a brave blow for that realistic reordering of world affairs of which he spoke.

I am speaking today to the millions across the world who in these anxious days are increasingly looking to moral rearmament as the one hope for the future. Especially as I speak I am thinking of the men on the front-line trenches, the men faced with the hard realities, the men who know what war is.

Yet where are the front-line trenches today? Today in many countries every civilian carries a gas mask. Every garden has its air-raid shelter. It is a new phase in war, where everybody is responsible and every home is a front-line trench.

Our arts of reconciliation have not kept pace with the arts of war. The art of destruction is beginning to outpace the art of living. Today we have reached the parting of the ways. Civilization, man-controlled, is faced with collapse. The long-endured cycle of moving from crisis to crisis must end. Nations must move beyond crisis to cure. A new world philosophy is needed, a world philosophy capable of creating a new era of constructive relationships between men and nations. A new statesmanship, a new leadership, will ensue from this heightened quality of thinking and living. A nation's first line of defense is the character of her people. As Maurice Browne, the producer of that wartime drama, Journey's End, so compellingly reminds us, "Never in the known history of mankind has there been such general, clear, and instant need for the application by each one of us to our hourly lives of the four cardinal principles—honesty, purity, selflessness, and love." Here we have the touchstone of moral rearmament.

This world philosophy will emerge as people begin to get their direction from the living God. It will be within the framework of a hate-free, fear-free, greed-free quality of living.

Think of the cost of hate, fear, and greed. Millions of men and women must carry gas masks today because men the world over have been living behind masks for years. Millions of men and women must grope through darkened cities because the nations have been living in a spiritual black-out. Millions of men and women today must listen to air-raid warnings because nations have not listened to the voice of God in days gone by. Yet dark nights of waiting may prove a blessing in disguise, for guidance is a staple necessity that is not rationed.

Man today is ready to believe that human wisdom has failed. A situation is growing up in which people will want God to speak to them. They will have nothing else between themselves and desperation, as they read the changing chimerical headlines that no one wants. Men need some adequate voice to interpret and mold events. All our values are slipping, as currencies slipped after the last war. As my friend, the great Oxford philosopher, Dr. Streeter, said, "A race that has grown up intellectually, must grow up morally or perish." Times of crisis reveal the bankruptcy of our thought and action. Then we resort to feverish improvisation and expediency. Sheer economy of time and energy and ultimate bankruptcy may force us to God-control. Expediency must be supplanted by guidance. These days will see a change in all of us in every nation, a change which will bring a new realization of our need. We cannot permanently go on expecting other nations to repent first.

Moral rearmament was never more urgently needed than today. It stands for a prejudice-free level of living. It stands for a common denominator of immediate, constructive action for everyone above party, class, race, creed, point of view, or personal advantage. The morally rearmed have learned to live under a crisis-proof, fear-free discipline. They are a panic-proof, singleminded, and intelligent trained force at the disposal of all who put their country before selfish interest.

A word of gratitude must go to the men in every nation who have met moral rearmament and for what has been accomplished and for the far-reaching service they have been able to render. These people, far-visioned and sagacious, see that moral rearmament is the highest patriotism.

The aim of moral rearmament is twofold: First, to restore God to leadership as the directing force in the life of nations; and then to work for the strengthening of morale within a country and so build a healthful, national life. In the words of a statement by Lord Baldwin, Lord Salisbury, and chiefs of the armed forces, that has become historic: "Were we, together with our fellow men everywhere, to put the energy and resourcefulness into this task that we now find ourselves obliged to expend on national defense, the peace of the world would be assured."

Moral rearmament will be the focal point for the new national unity where God is the constant and final arbiter in every conflict. This philosophy will become the mainspring of the spirit of the Nation, the magnet that will draw all positive forces together. It will give a new unity to capital and labor, and bring the answer to industrial conflict and unrest. It will give the answer to war in the home and to war in the world. It will train that leadership which is adequate for the gigantic work of reconstruction to rebuild a world on the brink of ruin. As a statesman has said: "What are needed are God-guided personalities to make God-guided nationalities, to make a new world. All other ideas of economic adjustment are too small really to touch the center of the evil."

The chief sin is that we have no adequate philosophy for life. Our conception of living is wrong—easy, soft, protective; indulgent. We need a whole new content and conception of life. The brains, the thinking of the world must have been sabotaged and squandered for a very long time to create such destruction of men and nations. We need a whole new level of thinking about peace. If peace had demanded as much of us as war, war would have been outlawed long ago.

But someone must always make peace. Peace is not an idea. It is people becoming different. You know what it is like at home when there has been a quarrel. You don't just get the idea that peace would be a good thing. Someone pockets his pride and says, "I'm sorry." But most of us want to make peace by repenting of the other fellow's sins. That is how the world would like to do it. The moral rearmament way is to start by being different yourself. Honest apology is the highroad of lasting peace. An army general said to me recently, "Either I sacrifice my selfishness for the sake of my nation, or I sacrifice my nation for the sake of my selfishness. And either we sacrifice our national selfishness for the sake of the world, or we sacrifice the world for the sake of our national selfishness." War is the price of the selfishness of nations. Most people are selfish enough to want a peace that permits them to wage their own private wars and foster their own petty indulgences.

Without this new spirit we shall pay heavily for our selfishness. Taxes will and do overtake us. We grumble and pay, because we would rather pay than pray. Today men share whether they want to or not. We cannot make peace between the nations when the people in the nations are in a state of permanent personal warfare. Strikes, labor difficulties, and war are inevitable until we change our whole thought and quality of living.

We need a national mobilization for unemployment on the same scale and carried out with the same personal care that the warring nations have given to everyone who needed to be taken to a place of safety. The unemployed must have the safety and security that comes from knowing that they are needed and that there is a job for them to do. Our aim should be that everyone has not only enough of the necessities of life, but that he has a legitimate part in bringing about this moral rearmament, and so safeguards the peace of his nation and the peace of the world.

God has a nation-wide program that provides inspiration and liberty for all and anticipates all other political programs. A labor leader says, "I have seen the labor movement triumph and felt, in the midst of triumph, an emptiness. Moral rearmament gave my life new content. I see in its message the only key to the future of the labor movement and of the industry the world over."

Industry can be the pioneer of a new order when national service replaces selfishness and where industrial planning is based upon the guidance of God. When labor, management, and capital becomes partners under God's guidance, then industry takes its true place in the national life.

Here I wish to bring you the message of two British labor leaders, who as chairmen of the Trades Union Congress represented 6,000,000 British workers. I quote first from Mr. H. H. Elvin, who this last month was fraternal delegate from Britain to American labor. He had hoped to be here to speak in person, but urgent duties recalled him to Britain a few days ago. He says in a message sent specially for this program:

"Can we as Christians be really satisfied with our witness in these times? Is there a message of hope for the world? I believe that there is. The keynote of that message is: Repentance, reparation, and regeneration.

"Repentance: Turn right about.

"Reparation: Redress wrongs done.

"Regeneration: Live a completely new life.

"Repentance: The first step must be the recognition that the life already lived is wrong and that a new road must be taken. This can apply not only to the non-Christian but also to the Christian. 'Ye cannot serve God and mammon.' Many are trying to do the impossible.

"Reparation: This applies not only to the individual life, but also to national and international life. If, as Christians, we think objectively, we must admit that wrongs done to nations by other nations are the cause of present international life. Men have failed to act justly, and as citizens we have condoned injustices, although this may be largely due to lack of thought. Nonetheless, our responsibility is there.

"Regeneration: I mean the regeneration of the whole man, not in part. Change of heart is the first essential, but this must be followed by change of outlook and change of life.

"Moral rearmament, if it is to be fully effective, must touch all human relationships. Selfishness must not be the keynote of living. God must enter all departments of life."

The second message has just arrived from Mr. Joseph Hallsworth, present chairman of the Trades Union Congress. He makes this striking statement, "The need for moral rearmament is more urgent than ever. I promise you all the support in my power." Both these men in their official capacity joined with 15 other leaders of British labor in the following statement: "Basically the world unrest is to be found in the root disease of materialism showing itself in widespread selfishness, fear, and greed, not in this nation or in that, but in all. We are all guilty." That is the conviction of great leaders of labor in Britain.

The Catholic Workers Union of a European state met recently in response to the call for moral and spiritual rearmament made by the ruler of that country, "In the whole world," they declared, "and in our own country we are glad to note a leaning toward new spiritual life. This must strengthen in us the consciousness that we have to lead the way to a new and better and solid community, not only with words, but with deeds." And then these workers reached this striking conclusion which I ask you carefully to note, "In the new community there is no room for class war or racial war. In the new community there is no room for strikes and lockouts; in the new community, neither personal interests nor desire for gain have the upper hand; social justice and social love shall be the pillars on which the community of the future will rest."

New men, new homes, new industry, new nations, a new world.

The world must declare a moratorium on hate, greed and fear, personally and nationally. The new peace pact must have as its preamble, that all contracting parties, all nations live on the basis of no hate, no fear, no greed. And the necessary prelude to this happier pact is that every individual, in every nation, begins that new quality of living now, and does not postpone it to some future armistice. Then we shall be true patriots. Then there will be law and order in Europe and the world, within your hearts and within the boundary of your nation. Then we shall be able to say, "Behold how these nations love one another."

As I am speaking here, within a fraction of a second I can reach my friends in many countries. My friends in the front-line trenches, the men in the lonely outposts whose only touch with the outside world is through the friendly radio beam, which meets all alike—my friends in the far Nordic north, on India's northwest frontier, on the African veldt, and in far-off Australia and New Zealand.

We accept as a commonplace a man's voice carried by radio to the uttermost parts of the earth. Why not the voice of the living God as an active, creative force in every home, every business, every parliament?

Men listen to the King when he speaks to his people over the air. Why not also to the King of Kings?

An all-powerful God is the most intelligent source of information in the world today. He has the answer to every problem. Everywhere when men and nations will let Him, He is teaching them how to live.

The world needs a miracle. Miracles of science have been the wonder of the age. But all those miracles have not brought peace and happiness to our homes and nations. A miracle of the spirit is what we need.

There must come a spiritual dynamic which will change human nature and remake men and nations. There must come a spiritual authority which will be accepted everywhere, by everyone, the adequate authority that does not have to resort to war. Only so will order come out of chaos in national and world affairs.

This miracle is undoubtedly the divinely appointed destiny of mankind. Who can believe less than that? Its advent depends on and awaits the emergence in every country of firm and resolute God-guided men with all the conviction, fire, and fervor of early Christians. Their ever-widening influence would be invincible. A new national spirit would soon be born; a new, cooperative relationship between the nations, if in every country there would arise a new leadership free from the bondage of fear, rising above personal and national ambition, and responsive to the direction of God's will. A leading Afrikaans paper in South Africa, Die Burger, expresses the conviction of a nation that is facing her problems with the aid of moral rearmament: "We need supernatural strength, a national unity with united mind, controlled and coordinated by the Supreme Being."

Such a philosophy has been stated as the historic basis for nationhood by the prophets of old and has withstood the test of centuries. The prophet Isaiah says: "And all thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children. Nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee because of the Lord, thy God." The man charged with the foreign affairs of a great nation said: "What we need today are men of the type of the prophet Amos." British labor in conference, sent their message to the American Capital with these words: "We need men who will make real the vision of the prophet Micah."

Moral rearmament is recapturing, revitalizing, reliving the message of the prophets. It is tried, it is true, it is tested. God calling the world is becoming a daily experience in the lives of hundreds of thousands. Now the call is to every man in every last place to be guided by God.

We have tried thinking and living as we want; now try thinking and living as God wants; try living as we want the other fellow to live; try living as we want the other nation to live; then our Nation will be the spearhead of a new world order.

We must now think what God can do through an army of a hundred million men mobilized, taking their daily orders and direction from Him. God has a program adequate for the world and for each nation. Thus each individual who has enlisted in that program can find a job he can do that will affect the civic, industrial, and national welfare. Thus each nation can use all its resources and find its truest security. The program now is for a hundred million people listening to God during the week end of December 1, 2, 3, a program which is being prepared in each country, as the circumstances in that country permit. We are grateful to those heralds of the new world order who have made the radio and press available for these world broadcasts.

"M R A" has this achievement in its favor, that during this last year it has gone with lightning speed throughout the world. It has made friends everywhere—in every nation, among every class. Think of the vast forces available—Catholic and Protestant, Jew and gentile. Think of the spiritually rearmed everywhere who may be the pacemakers for the peacemakers of tomorrow. "M R A" is open to all creeds and bars none. It is a quality of life. You don't register with "M R A"; "M R A" registers with you. You don't join; you can't resign. You live a life. In the words of a miners' leader, "'M R A' provides all men everywhere with an open line to God for guidance."

The world is waiting an answer. A hundred million people listening to God can give the answer. We must have some simple, workable basis available for everyone and one that can be applied by all. We need people trained not only to make an adequate peace but also to keep it. Now is the time to enlist for the duration in this world war against selfishness. We must maintain the whole war conception of peace. We need to be "fighters ever in the battle for peace."

The secret lies in listening to God. A truly united nation comes from a directing God. Man, unaided, cannot make peace. Men and nations must be trained to make peace and maintain it. We must begin to develop the framers of the just and lasting peace of the future. We need to live a quality of life that will change masses of people. It will provide a public opinion that will have the added weight of an irresistible army to maintain a world battle for peace, with a sacrifice as sustained as that which force compels men to make in times of urgent world crisis. The united mind of a hundred million people listening to God will give a new fund of information and source of inspiration that will provide the secret of united action. The Oxford group has been in action since the last war training men for the moral rearmament of the nations. It is bringing a new force into play, an indispensable force, necessary for the lifeblood of every nation. Through lack of this quality nations will sell their birthright.

A general in another army, after a disarmament conference, sent me this program on a post card. It was in the form of a picture of a man's face, and underneath was written, "God gave man two ears and one mouth. Why don't you listen twice as much as you talk?" This is the first step in reorientating our minds to God. Listen twice as much as you talk. Here lies the strategy to win the world from her egocentric ways, for immediately self is the center of the picture, there war has begun, whether in individuals or in nations.

Guidance is when we are in communication with God. Guidance is an absolute necessity and the irreducible minimum to keep millions spiritually and physically alive. It is the nation's lifeblood—without it nations perish. Television points to a great truth. The ordinary man, every man, and the statesman must discover the counterpart on the spiritual plane. Guidance is this counterpart. Just as television is that space-conquering vision on the material plane, guidance is the far-seeing perception on the spiritual. It is limited only by our capacity for discipline. At one time there was one incandescent bulb and now infinitely more than a hundred million enjoy the gift of light. The next great discoveries must lie in the realm of the spiritual. Statesmen living this new quality of life will make it possible for the mind of God to become the mind of nations.

Fear is another kind of guidance. People are afraid and so they will not daily fight the battle for peace. I am reminded of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-Shek's forceful phrase, "If we perspired more in times of peace, we should bleed less in times of war." The program for the hundred million listening over the week end of December 1, 2, 3 is that we perspire in time of peace, that we learn truly how to sacrifice for our country. We are waging the greatest battle of history in this World War against selfishness. Every man to his guns. We must call out the moral and spiritual forces. It is because we had no such adequate action during the last decades that we are compelled to make the costly sacrifice of war. The way to outlive the forces of destruction is to build better and more wisely than we are building now. "If we are not governed by God, we will be ruled by tyrants," said William Penn. The lack of such a program in peacetime has meant that a hundred million and more are engaged in a program of action that no one really wants. Moral rearmament is the great central revolutionary force. I was personally at war. An experience of the Cross made me a new type of revolutionary. Moral rearmament teaches us to sacrifice for our country. Its immediate aim is a hundred million people mobilized in the battle for peace—everyone disciplined, everyone taking part. A statesman spoke recently of the world-wide devastation and sorrows of war. He spoke of hundreds of millions who are called upon to suffer. Is it too much to think of 100,000,000 enlisting to bring the answer not only for suffering men and women but for nations in turmoil. This is our goal.

A national labor leader in San Francisco had a bold vision for an American membership of his organization of 10,000,000. The united forces planning for moral and spiritual rearmament in the world must think in terms of at least a hundred million taking their orders from the living God. Such a force will be an incomparable, unconquerable, irresistible army, with advanced knowledge of tactics and a program that will fire men's hearts and radically alter their thinking and living.

Within the limits of one broadcast it is not possible to give a complete answer convincing and satisfying to everyone. It may, however, cast a light on your path and furnish you with information and direction that will be ready in a time of crisis and put the torch that is available to all within your grasp.

This broadcast is only a trial mobilization in preparation for December 1, 2, 3. Moral rearmament must be a call to all the nations and every individual in the Nation. I hope you will write into station WRUL, or care Moral Re-Armament, Fairmont Hotel, San Francisco, making suggestions for Moral rearmament, December 1, 2, 3. You can each help in this momentous task.

Our instant need is a hundred million planning for the new world peace. Not only a few statesmen meeting, but the united forces of the world backed by daily living and action that will support them—waging the eternal war against selfishness. Then we can begin to approximate to what is needed. The call is to every man, the ordinary man, and the statesman unitedly to carry the burdens of their country. Responsibility has too often been delegated to the few in the belief that the statesman is expected to do the thinking, planning, and living that must become the concern of every man, the ordinary man.

We must re-make the world—the task is nothing less than that. We, the re-makers of the world—is that not the thinking and willing of the ordinary man.

A world philosophy will be brought to power through the cumulative effect of millions of people beginning the experience of listening to God. True, it may be only an initial experience. Enlistment does not immediately make the trained soldier. But we can all begin. God can communicate with man direct. We stand at zero hour on the threshold of a new world order.

It will be an age of happy homes and laughing children, an age from which fear has been lifted like the smoke-pall from an industrial city, when we shall look for care-worn faces and find none.

It will be an age in which mothers and children will know no want, and husbands will not fear that next week there may be no pay envelop for them to take home to their wives.

It will be an age of peace, lasting peace in heart, home, and between nations—a peace which will be not alone the absence of war, but the liberation of all our energies to build a new world.

A world in which society has no enemies because society makes no enemies.

A fear-free, hate-free, greed-free world.

God calling the world is becoming a daily experience in the lives of hundreds and thousands of people in the more than 60 countries where "M R A" is at work.

We need unitedly to recapture the world once again for a program of sanity and security. Events are focusing for us the only program of sane control—God control. The only sane people in an insane world are those guided by God. We have not yet tapped the great creative sources in the mind of God. God has a plan and the combined moral and spiritual forces of the nations can find that philosophy adequate for world crisis.

"A mighty fortress is our God,
A trusty shield and weapon,
He helps us free from every ill,
That hath us e'er o'ertaken."

ADDRESS OF ADMIRAL BYRD, COMMANDING OFFICER OF THE UNITED STATES ANTARCTIC SERVICE EXPEDITION, ON THE EVE OF HIS DEPARTURE FOR THE ANTARCTIC

I speak from Boston. Greetings to all you who are listening, no matter what country you may be in. It was on my lonely vigil during the long polar night that I learned the power of silence—of quiet times. The values and the problems of life sorted out when I began to listen.

I went exploring because I was fired by those pioneers of history who felt the urge of charting uncharted seas and discovering unknown places. However, today, in the crisis which threatens to destroy freedom and civilization, the most important pioneering to be done is in the realm of the spirit.

America's first line of defense is the character of her citizens. Character cannot be taken for granted. If we are going to preserve freedom, it has to be battled for by every man, woman, and child—every day and every generation. Without character, man doesn't deserve freedom, so he loses it. A man of character has a deep sympathy for his fellow man. He wishes his neighbor well. We are all neighbors today.

The building of character is moral rearmament. That is the fight of America and of the world. That is the only armament that can stop armament for destruction. On the eve of my departure for the Antarctic, I want to say that I believe that in this way lies the hope for peace.

Moral rearmament—the fight for a new world—strong, clean, united—should fire the hearts of all red-blooded Americans and stir their wills to action.

ADDRESS BY HERBERT H. ELVIN, CHAIRMAN, BRITISH TRADES UNION CONGRESS, 1938–39, FRATERNAL DELEGATE TO AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR ANNUAL CONVENTION, OCTOBER 1939

Sometime ago I was invited to meet a number of leading persons in France. At that meeting one said to me: "We in France have been trying to bring about an ideal state on the basis of a materialistic conception of life, and have failed."

Does not this apply to other countries, too? The world today contains thousands of disappointed men and women. Hopes raised in 1919 have been dashed in 1939. Aspirations have failed. Disappointment has been followed by despair. The rule of force, said to be destroyed in 1919, has reared its head again in a more terrible form. Another world disaster is on the horizon.

In these days of darkness and depression, is there really a message for a stricken world?

Is it a fact that an ideal society cannot be secured by a materialistic conception of life? France, with its motto of liberty, equality, and fraternity, has not the ideal society. So is it with America, although it proclaims democracy, liberty, union. Also Great Britain is far from being the land of the free.

Humanism has failed, but must we not honestly ask if the organized Christian community meets the bill? Can we as Christians be really satisfied with our witness in these times? Is there a message of hope for the world? I believe that there is. The keynote of that message is repentance, reparation, and regeneration.

Repentance: Turn right about.

Reparation: Redress wrongs done.

Regeneration: Live a completely new life.

Repentance: The first step must be the recognition that the life already lived is wrong and that a new road must be taken. This can apply, not only to the non-Christian but also to the Christian. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." Many are trying to do the impossible.

Reparation: This applies not only to the individual life but also to national and international life. If, as Christians, we think objectively, we must admit that wrongs done to nations by other nations is the cause of present international life. Men have failed to act justly, and as citizens we have condoned injustices although this may be largely due to lack of thought. Nonetheless our responsibility is there.

Regeneration: I mean the regeneration of the whole man not in part. Change of heart is the first essential, but this must be followed by change of outlook and change of life. Too many stop at the first with great loss to themselves and the world. In fact, one cannot stop at the first. Because so many attempt it they come under the condemnation of Matthew 25: "Inasmuch as ye did it not unto one of these ye did it not unto Me."

This is where moral rearmament comes in with its message of absolute truth, absolute honesty, absolute love, and absolute unselfishness.

Absolute truth: The power to face facts, pleasant or unpleasant.

Absolute honesty: Seeking to do the right thing regardless of consequences, leaving these to God.

Absolute love: The highest form of human love possible equally given to God and the world, expressed in—

Absolute unselfishness: "If any man will come after Me, let him abandon himself."

"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as much as thou lovest thyself" means that all the good things we desire for ourselves we must seek absolutely to obtain for others. "Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you" declares that as it is essential that all hindrances to the development of one's personality must be removed, so we must work to the utmost that all human hindrances to divine perfection in others must be removed, such as unemployment, injustices, and inequalities in industrial and social life, bad housing, vice, lack of opportunity to develop one's life to its full, etc.

Moral rearmament, if it is to be fully effective, must touch all human relationships. Selfishness must not be the keynote of living. The policy of "safety first" can only lead to a betrayal of moral and Christian principle and a breaking of solemn obligations entered into. God must enter all departments of life.

It is because those who have experienced moral rearmament know what it means to dedicate themselves to God for service to man, bringing to them not an attenuated but a full, complete gospel covering the whole man and his needs, that they suggest that this is the message which the world needs at this time and ask—urged you to try it.

Annual Dinner of the National Guard Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. HARRY H. WOODRING AND COMMENTS THEREON BY ERNEST K. LINDLEY

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Honorable Harry H. Woodring, Secretary of War, on the occasion of the annual dinner of the National Guard Association of the United States at Baltimore, Md., the night of October 27. I consider the address a sane and constructive analysis of our problem of national defense and commend it to my colleagues.

I also ask unanimous consent to have printed, following the address of Secretary of War Woodring, and as part of the same insertion in the Appendix of the RECORD, the analysis and comment of the Secretary's speech by Ernest K. Lindley, well-known columnist and commentator, as published in the Washington Post of October 28.

There being no objection, the address and the analysis and comment were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The National Guard Association of the United States has convened its annual convention at a most momentous and critical time. In the Far East war covers the countryside with a dark blanket of death and destruction. Across the Atlantic war stalks gloomily over the hills and valleys, blots out the blueness of God's skies, rolls rapaciously the surfaces of the seas, and extends its horrors into the very depths of the oceans. The peoples of our New World stand aghast, fearful that to the shores of the Americas may eventually reach the dread mailed fist of Mars.

War is despised, hated, abhorred by most of the peoples of the globe. Yet war's dismal shroud now enfolds many nations. For even in these days of advanced civilization—or should I say so-called civilization?—war still remains a tool in the hands of ambitious and unscrupulous political stewards for the aggrandizement of their political power and as a weapon of conquest in their expansion of empire.

Americans, since their bitter and disillusioning experiences in the world conflict which terminated some 21 years ago, have advanced materially in their recognition and knowledge of the utter futility of armed conflict. And during the past two decades there has continuously developed in them the determination to avoid completely involvement in war—save war forced upon them in the defense of their own Republic, their own homes, and their own liberties. And in all sincerity and in all honesty let me tell you there is no man in public life today who is more determined than your Secretary of War that your sons and my sons shall not march forth to war.

Dangerously prevalent among some of our people today, however, is the assumption that intervention by the United States—and I refer to overseas participation in the conflict now raging in Europe—is inevitable; that the fates have decreed the youth of America eventually must be transported across the seas to wage battle on the Old World's soil, blood-soaked through the centuries.

Those who in public utterances pronounce the inevitability of our entrance into this second World War do grave injustice to this Republic of ours. They arouse suspicion among our more gullible citizens toward the efforts of the Federal Government to assure complete neutrality. They breed mistrust in the determination of the national administration definitely to assure peace for the Western Hemisphere. Those who preach the inevitability of war are prone to interpret every purely precautionary and defensive measure taken by the Government as likely—if not as deliberately intended—to lead the American people into war. They paint the wholly false picture of American business and industry, in a blind greed for profit, intentionally attempting to involve the United States in the present European conflict.

To create, knowingly or unknowingly, such a psychology on the inevitability of our participation in the war now in progress is to deny that most Americans—the vast majority of Americans—are convinced that our democratic form of government can be maintained and our national destiny assured only through continuance of peace.

The War Department, the Secretary of War, and the personnel of the Regular Establishment, the National Guard, the Organized Reserves—we who are primarily and personally concerned with the slight progress recently attained in the promotion of the efficiency of our land protective forces—we must not stand idly by while amateur strategists pronounce war's inevitability. As a nation we are not prepared for the formation of expeditions to wage offensive war; we do not wish to prepare to wage offensive war; we see no inevitable war, offensive or defensive.

Our Commander in Chief, President Roosevelt, has sounded, and sounded in unmistakably determined beats, the tocsin of peace—peace in the Western Hemisphere. It is the bounden duty of each individual in any way connected with the Military Establishment to exert all his intelligence and all his influence to insure there be no misinterpretation by any single citizen of the United States of the fact that every item in the current program for the augmentation and modernization of our defensive forces, and every thought behind that program has but one object in view—the preservation of peace.

In these days when the ancient and gruesome ideology that "might makes right" again strangles much of the world in a vise-like grasp, how can we best assure the preservation of peace? Only through defensive preparation—military, naval, industrial, economic—which will serve as a very positive and very definite deterrent to any and all aggressive designs.

We American "peace at almost any price" advocates have long since come to the realization that unpreparedness for defense eventually turns out to be far more costly and a far greater menace to our homes, our liberties, and our national existence than a powerful, well-equipped, adequately trained defensive force. We picture our national defense not as a rattling sword but as a protective shield.

The United States does not now require the maintenance of military forces beyond the authorized peace strengths provided by the National Defense Act for the three components of the Army of the United States—the Regular Army, National Guard, and Organized Reserves. We require no considerable augmentation of civilian military-training activities. The Reserve Officers' Training Corps and the citizens' military training camps will suffice for the accomplishment of their primary missions—the production of an adequate reserve of young commissioned officers and the training, on a purely voluntary status, of those patriotic youths who desire to prepare themselves in time of peace to answer the Nation's call in the hour of its need. General Pershing recently told me that the combat casualties among green, unseasoned, untrained American troops during the World War far exceeded those suffered by trained and experienced soldiers. Our defensive requirements demand the maintenance of no huge reserve of soldiers for the permanent establishment. The enlisted reserve established last summer for the Regular Army, which eventually will attain a total of 75,000 men, is ample.

The security of these United States does, however, demand the maintenance of an Army in being at all times—those minimum defensive elements which will permit this Nation to speak with authority for peace and assure the continuance of our national existence. This force must be fully, perfectly equipped, and adequately trained at all times—not only to meet the eventualities of today and tomorrow, but those of the days to come.

These land defensive elements must include an ever-ready striking air force. I refer to a "striking" air component; yet only a moment ago I said that offensive war is not contemplated in our military preparations. There has been some controversy over the term "offensive—defensive weapons." There are but few, if any, instruments of warfare which can be classified as distinctly offensive or distinctly defensive. On the field of battle, with its continuous shifting of the tides of combat, the offensive weapon of today ofttimes becomes the defensive weapon of tomorrow.

However, there are some purely defensive military installations—for instance, the fixed seacoast defense guns which afford protection to the Panama Canal. And as purely defensive as are the roles of those fixed guns would be the missions of heavy long-range bombers employed to disrupt the activities of hostile air or naval bases established to menace the Panama Canal and its defenses. Whatever may be the method of employment of a weapon of war in Europe or Asia, let me assure you that, under our plans, the same type of weapon, in the hands of American soldiers, would be used for purposes of defense, and defense only.

But being potentially strong in men and matériel is not sufficient guaranty for the assurance of peace. We must obtain adequate training of personnel and efficient employment of matériel. We must, from time to time, concentrate our defensive units to practice the plays of the team. Otherwise we expend our efforts and our moneys on the forging of strong links for an unlinked chain, and, unlinked, we have no chain at all.

Hence the recent decision of the War Department to assure the maximum effectiveness of the units of the Regular Army by means of concentrations for extensive field maneuvers during winter months in southern areas. Infantry divisions, now undergoing reorganization as "triangular" rather than "quadrangular" organizations will first be afforded opportunity to familiarize themselves with the modernized formations. They will later be further concentrated for corps maneuvers with special auxiliary corps troops heretofore nonexistent in our peacetime permanent establishment. We thus take advantage of favorable climatic conditions to form an actual and an experienced first-line combat team from the mobile troops of the Regular Army. And in the so doing we correct one of the gravest defects in our present national-defense set-up.

This winter's concentrations, to be fully effective, must be molded into a continuous revolving program covering the next 2 or 3 years. If the commanders of troops and the troops themselves do not become accustomed to operating in large, well-balanced, cohesive units—under conditions as closely approximating war as peacetime limitations permit—the personnel of our Regular divisions, we must confess, will be playing at the soldier game. Our soldiery must be real, not toy.

The National Guard, of course, enters prominently into this picture of an animated, modernized national defense. Our initial protective force comprises the Regular Army and the National Guard. For example, Baltimore's National Guard units are as integral a part of this Nation's first line of land defenses as are the Regular Army organizations stationed at nearby Forts Howard, Hoyle, and Meade. Were it not for the existence of the National Guard, this country would be forced to maintain a permanent professional military establishment of far greater strength than that which we now support. The American public must not lose sight of the fact that in our scheme of national defense the National Guard plays a role of paramount importance from the standpoint of economy in the maintenance of our Military Establishment.

The President, by recent Executive order, has directed—at the discretion of the Governors of the various States—an increase of about 42,000 in the enlisted ranks of the National Guard. Most gratifying has been the progress thus far in the attainment of the allotted quotas. The augmented strengths of units will permit far more practical and efficient organizational training, for heretofore unit strength has been too low to permit the manning of weapons assigned to organizations. Ordinary, unavoidable absenteeism also greatly retarded the effectiveness of units, both in armory and field training. The increase provided by the Executive order promises much for greater unit proficiency; the extra drill periods recently provided will greatly promote individual proficiency. Observance of the winter maneuvers of Regular Army units by National Guard higher commanders and their staffs will not only be an educational factor of no mean importance but will go far toward promotion of that cooperation so essential between the primary elements of the initial protective force.

To the citizen-soldiers of the National Guard, the people of this country are greatly indebted. And I feel I am on very safe ground when I state that never before have the missions of the National Guard been so fully understood by the public, nor the patriotic endeavors of its personnel more fully appreciated.

For 150 years our land defense has been based upon a 2½-mile-per-hour speed of movement. We must now readjust ourselves to the fact—one demonstrated so recently on the plains of Poland, the plateaus of Spain, and the deserts of Ethiopia—that today war on the earth's surface is a 30- to 40-mile-per-hour business, and that the birds of war cleave the skies at 300 to 400 miles per hour. Our Army—Regulars, Guardsmen, and Reservists—must have not only mechanical mobility, tactically and strategically, but also mental mobility.

Let us not overlook that other strong right arm of the Nation's defense—our fine United States Navy, which today commemorates its glorious traditions and its splendid record of achievements in peace and in war. Upon our sea forces devolve the responsibility for the security of long water routes over which our trade is transported to the four corners of the globe, and for the defense of 40,000 miles of homeland and insular coast lines. To our Navy—as to our Army—we must give the means for the accomplishment of its manifold missions.

This program for rearmament—rearmament for peace—is costly. Our people are determined, however, to preserve the neutrality of the United States so long as the dread four horsemen—War, Famine, Pestilence, and Death—ravage Europe and Asia. Our people are likewise determined that the barbaric hoofbeats of those same four horsemen must be confined to spheres other than the Americas.

Not a doubt is there in my mind that the American people—be the financial cost what it may—will render wholehearted support to their Government in its efforts to maintain neutrality and to assure complete security.

Every man and every dollar necessary for the defense of America, but not one man, not one dollar to fight the wars of other nations.

[From the Washington Post of October 28, 1939]

PAX AMERICANA

(By Ernest Lindley)

TWO CABINET MEMBERS SPEAK OUT

For those who believe that this war in Europe is not our war and that we should keep out of it, no matter which side wins or loses, October 27 must be underlined. For on that day two members of the Roosevelt Cabinet—Harry H. Woodring and Henry A. Wallace—crashed through with speeches which committed them to this view just about as irrevocably as words can do.

These speeches are not important as reflections of the President's views. The White House okays, which both of them presumably received, may have been given only because they serve incidentally to allay fears about the ultimate aims of the President's foreign policy, and so help the neutrality bill.

But neither speech was written or delivered for that purpose. Each is a personal testament; each is rooted deeply in convictions which both men have often expressed privately but never before so forthrightly in public.

Secretary Woodring's speech was composed by himself and came as straight from the bottom of the heart as any speech ever made by a responsible Government official. As his colleagues in the Cabinet and his friends know, he was not exaggerating when he said:

"And in all sincerity and in all honesty let me tell you there is no man in public life today who is more determined than your Secretary of War that your sons and my sons shall not march forth to war."

To friends he has gone a little further and vowed: "No American boys will be sent to fight on European soil so long as I am Secretary of War." His speech to the National Guard Association on Friday amounts to saying that.

Woodring shares to the fullest the determination which, in his speech, he ascribed to the American people: "The determination to avoid completely involvement in war—save war forced upon them in the defense of their own Republic, their own homes, and their own liberties."

Woodring did not content himself with saying he hoped we could stay out of this war. He denounced the fatalistic assumption that our intervention in the European war is "inevitable"—"that the fates have decreed the youth of America eventually must be transported across the seas to wage battle on the Old World's soil, blood-soaked through the century." He asserted that our democratic form of government and our national destiny can be assured "only through the continuance of peace." The significant word is "continuance." The peace he refers to is our peace, peace in the Western Hemisphere, not the peace of Europe or of Asia.

Most important of all, Woodring translated the "keep out of Europe" policy into terms of our own preparedness. He is for national defense, but against preparation for fighting beyond our ocean barriers. This means that we do not need to train or to prepare to equip a large army. We do not need a vast plan for total mobilization of our material and human resources based on our experience in 1917–18.

Woodring sees no need for maintaining military forces beyond the authorized peace strengths of the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Organized Reserves. He says we don't need compulsory military training activities. The enlisted reserve of 75,000, authorized last summer to backstop the Regular Army and the National Guard, is, in Woodring's view, "ample."

What we do need for our continental defense, he says, is a highly trained, perfectly equipped, mobile army, accustomed to operating in well-balanced, cohesive units.

The Woodring credo, in his own words, is: "Every man and every dollar necessary for the defense of America, but not one man, not one dollar, to fight the wars of other nations."

In his address to the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco on "Pan America—the Road of Our Destiny," Secretary Wallace was almost as emphatic as Secretary Woodring in declaring our independence from the struggles on the continents of Europe and Asia. Wallace frankly asserts that the efforts of Secretary Hull to revive a world of free-flowing trade have failed, and that the outbreak of the European war compels us to reappraise our economic and political relationships with the rest of the world.

Wallace concludes that our future, at least our immediate future, should not lie in close association with the Old World, but in the Western Hemisphere, which, for the most part, has broken away from the imperialistic systems which dominate Europe, Asia, and Africa. Wallace believes we can achieve and maintain hemispheric solidarity based on "democracy and not on imperialism," regardless of which ideology comes out on top in the European struggle. This is not an off-hand opinion, but the judgment of an intelligent man who has been studying the problems of hemispheric insulation and self-reliance with diligence, and frankly acknowledges that they present some serious difficulties. Wallace is ready to undertake the readjustments in our agriculture and in our whole economy which must come about if we are going to seek our destiny in the New World.

The commitment to a Pan-American policy is the result of a gradual but rather steady change in the thinking of Henry Wallace during the last 5 years. He entered the Roosevelt Cabinet a thorough-going economic internationalist, intent upon reopening the European markets for agricultural products, and in close intellectual harmony with Secretary Hull. He wrote a tract "America Must Choose," which was widely read and discussed, and was extremely influential in persuading many American citizens that the road to continental self-sufficiency would be disastrous, and that our destiny lay in the revival of a world-wide system of free-flowing trade.

But Wallace is no doctrinaire. He has faced the facts as he sees them. He has come to see that his earlier vision was impracticable and to believe that his earlier fears of the perils of continental economic self-reliance were exaggerated.

He now emerges as a wholehearted advocate of Pan-Americanism. There are escape clauses in his speeches. "Our strength is today not equal to the task of composing the differences which exist in Europe and Asia," he says, but we must stand ready "to furnish leadership looking toward international peace and international trade among the peoples of the Old World," and Wilson's dream of a League of Nations will always appeal to us "as an ultimate ideal."

Nevertheless, in Wallace's opinion, our road now points "not east and west, but north and south along the Americas.

"Our task, in cooperation with the 20 Latin American republics is," he says, "to do a first-class job of laying a foundation for democracy on this hemisphere—for the kind of democracy that will conserve our soil and people for thousands of years to come."

Wallace's conclusions are almost on all fours with those of Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, whose speech on American foreign policy was the most comprehensive, the best documented, and, to my opinion, the best thought-out of all the speeches made during the Senate debate on the neutrality bill. Both veer sharply from the policy set forth in recent years by the President and Secretary Hull. While the President and Hull have done more than any of their predecessors to win the good will of Latin America and to work toward hemispheric solidarity, they have also sought to tie us closely to the affairs of Europe and Asia.

Their policy has been international, almost world wide, rather than hemispheric. Neither has ever declared the New World's independence of the Old in language so definite as Wallace's and Woodring's. The lines of policy laid out by these two Cabinet officers run with the main stream of American policy from Washington, through Jefferson, Monroe, and down almost to our costly and fruitless effort to settle the affairs of Europe by armed intervention in 1917 and 1918. Every day there appear more signs that the thoughts and instincts of a great majority of the American people are flowing in that main stream and that it will be far more difficult to divert them into armed intervention on the continents of Europe and Asia than it was in 1917.

Plea to Uphold the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

LETTER BY REV. MARK A. MATTHEWS

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter appearing in the Spokesman Review, of Spokane, Wash., written by Rev. Mark A. Matthews, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Seattle, and former moderator of the Presbyterian Church of the United States.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Spokesman Review, Spokane, Wash.]

SUSPEND CRITICISM AND BACK PRESIDENT AS DUTY

To the EDITOR OF THE SPOKESMAN REVIEW:

Let us declare a moratorium on criticism. We are in troublesome times. In fact, we are in war. The President of the United States deserves your sympathy, your prayers, and your assistance. He is the commanding general. When a general is on his horse leading the force in any conflict, he cannot take time to pay attention to criticism.

It is silly, unpatriotic, disloyal, and disreputable to criticize the President while he is leading the forces for the stability of the Nation, for the safety of the Nation, for the protection of the Nation, and for the security of the Nation. He is doing his best to keep this Nation out of war.

When a madman is loose and running amuck against society and every restraining force, he is a menace. Mr. Hitler is a madman. He is trying to destroy the inherent rights of people and to control their boundaries. Let us keep out of the war. But if he forces himself within our boundaries, it will be just as much our duty to protect the Nation as it would be to protect the family if an insane man were attacking the children.

But in the meantime let us support the President and cease to criticize. This is not a political question. It is a question of self-preservation. It is a question of the inherent right to defend and protect one's nation.

Let us declare a moratorium on criticism. We are all one in any conflict. The President is the President of us all. If we were in a political debate we would have a perfect right to differ from one another. But in a conflict we have no right to discourage our leader or be disloyal to the commanding officer of our forces.

Let us suspend criticism, support the President, defend the Nation, and thus keep our boys out of war. The President is doing his best. He has made honest statements to us. Let us believe him. It is our duty to support him.

I know what they did to my beloved friend, Woodrow Wilson. They assassinated him with criticism. He was the first casuality of the war. We must not repeat that tragedy.

Suspend your criticisms. Support our President. Defend our Nation. Be calm, cool, serene, and remember God is on His throne and the Government at Washington is safe.

MARK A. MATTHEWS,
Pastor, First Presbyterian Church, Seattle.

Plea for Christianity and Americanism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAT McCARRAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY THE MOST REVEREND F. J. BECKMAN

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, when those of us who are either partisan or biased make statements to the public they are sometimes taken with allowances, so to speak, but when a great churchman, a great leader of the Christian faith, an outstanding, world-recognized, and respected man with no partisan views whatever, sees fit to make a statement over the radio so that the people of the country may listen, naturally it has its place in the history of the country and has its place to sway human thought. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a radio address entitled "A Plea for Christianity and Americanism," delivered by the Most Reverend F. J. Beckman, archbishop of Dubuque, on Sunday, October 29, 1931, over the National Broadcasting System hook-up.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My dear fellow Americans, I realize that it is somewhat unusual for a member of the hierarchy to venture as far as have I into the present neutrality debate by our Congress. I want to say that in doing so I have, before God, not been motivated by a spirit of disunity or disrespect for existing authority. I want to say now that I have been motivated in taking my stand against the lifting of the embargo by two vitally important reasons, the first being that I could stand no longer to see the Catholic Church of America being used for private and political ends; the second reason being that I am firmly convinced of the fact that the present European war is a most unjust and un-Christian conflict—an economic war based on greed which will only benefit international communism. Convinced of this fact, I could not do otherwise, in conscience, than to condemn, for my flock, at least, any governmental action which would contribute to the continuation of that war.

The present war is not, in my well-advised opinion, a just war, much less a "holy war." It is propagandized as such by the sinister forces of international communism. The Communist anti-Christs want America and all Christian nations to engage in this war. Their agents here will stop at nothing to involve us, for well do they realize that a war-exhausted America is the only hope of communism for America. Some of our would-be Catholic leaders have already succumbed to the propagandists and taken recent occasion to proclaim with them, "This is a holy war! Stop Hitler! America with the Allies! Christianity against communism," etc., etc. To these misguided individuals I would say (and, I trust, with the full approval of thinking Americans): "We Catholic leaders are not by any stretch of the imagination in sympathy with Hitlerism; we detest the antireligious implications in that word; we abhor with our Supreme Pontiff, Pius XII, the spread of pagan ideologies and materialism throughout the world, but we cannot as Christians be in sympathy with an internationalist, godless group which has provoked and is endeavoring to sustain this war. It is only the international Communist who, entrenched in high governmental positions of many nations, could so cleverly mask a plot to destroy Christian civilization with the slogan, "This is a holy war."

Communism, my friends, like a cancer in the vitals of Christianity, depends upon growth for its survival. It feeds and fattens on international chaos, and war is its choicest bread, war with its unspeakable horrors, which tears to pieces not only mortal bodies but, what is most terrible, destroys the spiritual in the soul of man; war with the ensuing hatred and bitterness of peoples against the false leaders who betray them into it.

If there could be a prayer on the lips of the Communist, rest assured, my dear Christian friends, that prayer would be: "Lord, give us war! Give us the chaos of hell! Away with reason and order! Give us war!" That is the private cry of the godless horde today. It is the Communist hymn of hate. If we listen well we can hear that hate theme running through all the pretty phrases of the propagandists who shout for our distraction: "This is a holy war!"

There is an old saying, "Fool me once, shame on you; but fool me twice, shame on me." Many of us were tricked and fooled by the propaganda in the last war. It was simpler then for we were easily won over on the slogan "Make the world safe for democracy." It should not be so simple this time. I, as but one member of the hierarchy of the Church in America, am standing at this microphone today because I know, with good Christian people everywhere, that our religious leaders cannot afford to be duped again. Our people demand, and justly so, that we take the leadership in preventing any possible encouragement by the United States of that frightfully unjust and immoral war in Europe. Our people demand that we, as their spiritual shepherds, uphold the right, clarify the issues, and fight to the last man of us against any attempt to make this glorious America an ally of internationalism. Our people demand that with one united voice, and courageously throwing off the shackles of those who would encumber us—they demand that we rise up and brand the Communist traitors in our midst for what they are. With all our strength we are morally obligated to cry: "This is no holy war, people! The Holy Father has not proclaimed it as such! Look well! This is the Communist war. This is an economic war based on greed and under no circumstances may we lend comfort to either party in the conflict."

Why has not Great Britain declared war on a Russia which invaded poor Poland? Why do we read so little in the secular press about the persecution of religion already underway in sovietized Poland, 13,000,000 of whose population Great Britain and France mercilessly handed over to Soviet Russia? Why, in the near past, was an embargo on arms good enough when the so-called Loyalists had the upper hand, but not good enough when the tables were turning in favor of Christian Spain? These questions all merit the same answer: Look for the Communist motive. And if in the face of any altruistic reasons which may be advanced for such action—if we, the spiritual leaders of America, yield to this "holy war" propaganda a second time, and lend any sanction whatsoever to the parties of this conflict—if we do these things, then shall we be delivering Christ himself into the bloody hands of the international Communists.

We hear any number of cries today that the church is in politics. If a clergyman talks for the Government, it's not politics; but let a clergyman talk against the Government, no matter how wrong it may be on a given issue, then immediately the cry, "The church is in politics." How my Christian blood does boil when I hear such. The answer to this charge must be clearly given: The church is not in politics; but politics is shamelessly attempting to use certain churchmen. As Christ, in anger, drove the money changers from His temple so must and shall we drive the politicians out of the church they would use for their own ends. Christ through all His ministry rarely demonstrated anger, but there came a day when even His patience with the hypocrisy and the effrontery of the times was exhausted. Then in a righteous rage He set an example of courage for spiritual leaders the world over to defend with physical force, if need be, the principles of right.

Taking our precedent from Him who so nobly set it, we are today fast growing out of patience with those who would use us for their ignoble ends. There are individuals aplenty who need a retreat from the glamor of government and governmental patronage. There are those aplenty, my dear friends, who call themselves Christians and disgrace their God-given religion by employing it as a "front" for questionable activities! To these individuals we would say: Where is the integrity we taught you to respect and cherish? In the name of Heaven, what has happened to your perspective of the right? If you have not the vision to see the right, at least have you the courtesy of remaining silent while others fight your battle for you? You have no right before God to deliver the church at the back door of politics. Be a credit to us, not a debit. Keep faith with those to whom you owe everything. Keep faith with God, yourself, and your fellow man.

We all love America. We have a solemn obligation to support our leaders in all measures which are just and good. But we also have a grave obligation to fight fearlessly any measures which are clearly not based upon a Christian morality. Our people look to us for a constant defense of truth; they expect that we will at all times vigorously espouse the cause of right as against wrong. Further, they have a right to expect that we will stand united for the right despite abuse, criticism, or persecution. Our religious leadership should be of such strong character as to insure proper governmental leadership by inculcating in a people the desire for such. But if and when the spiritual leadership of any nation becomes forfeit to governmental leadership regardless of right or wrong, then indeed is the beginning of national catastrophe.

It was the great John Henry Newman, who later became the outstanding Cardinal Newman, who said, "There can be no safety for religion except under constitutional government." That statement has certainly proven itself through the wreck of religion in Communist Russia and the suppression of religious liberty in Nazi Germany.

In our beloved America only, today can it be said that the fires of constitutional government are still alight. But many things have happened lately to give us cause for worry. I say, and I firmly believe, that unless the spiritual leaders of this country are quick to act in unitedly demanding with their people that representative government be representative, that democracy be democratic, that right be recognized and clearly cited to those who are the servants, not the masters, of the people—I say that unless we act quickly in the proper discharge of our moral obligations, the causes of constitutional government in this country will be seriously endangered. The embargo issue now before Congress has many deeper implications than most of us realize, among them being the recent disgraceful repudiation of the American people, the pleas of whom for the retention of the embargo have been scorned publicly as coming from "inspired sources." In my opinion, this action constituted an unprecedented threat to representative government.

Our eyes now turn to the House of Representatives, where we have good reason to hope are the men of the people—men who have stood aghast and watched one legislative group ignore the voice of America; men who are and should be weary of "being told" and who now prepare to do a little telling on their own account; men whose every decent, democratic impulse cries out against those who are attempting to belittle them as legislative Members. These are the people's representatives, the last guardians of democracy. They will not break faith with us, if we are clear and firm in our expression to them. We have a solemn obligation to call for and register conscientiously, immediately, that expression with our representatives. That expression, my dear American friends, will be our only defense if the youth of this country will not be betrayed again into the European trenches. That expression we pray will be entirely consistent with the recent words of a young man who brought a typical message to our attention. I readdress it direct to the Members of our House of Representatives. It concludes: "Remember, our blood is not for Europe; it is for America only. But in the warmth of our young hearts there is love enough for all men. Please extend that love by keeping and extending the embargo on hate."

In response to that message, I tell my people now that they can never expect to keep faith with their youth if they do not keep faith with Christian morality as pointed out to them. I tell my people now that the time is near when, unless they act quickly, democracy and communism will be at swords' points in America. If war comes (and we may apply it as coming to us), in the words of our Holy Father, "All may be lost." If that time comes, let it not be said that my voice was inarticulate for the right.

Courage now. Do the right thing fearlessly. God bless and keep the America we love.

Peace Proposals of Pope Pius XII and President Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

NEWS RELEASE FROM THE NATIONAL CATHOLIC WELFARE COUNCIL NEWS SERVICE

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD a news release which is a comment on an editorial from the L'Osservatore Romano with reference to the similarity of the peace proposals of Pope Pius XII and those of President Roosevelt.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the National Catholic Welfare Council News Service]

COMMENT ON AN EDITORIAL FROM L'OSSERVATORE WITH REFERENCE TO THE SIMILARITY OF THE PEACE PROPOSALS OF POPE PIUS XII AND PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

(By Msgr. Enrico Pucci)

VATICAN CITY, October 9.—In his editorial in which he pointed to the "almost literal identity" of the peace proposals put forth by the Holy Father and those suggested by American statesmen, Count Giuseppe Dalla Torre, editor of L'Osservatore Romano, began by saying:

"Every country, large or small, rich or poor, is recognized in the 'family of nations' of America with full equality of rights, of consideration, of relations; discipline for all, individual liberty; the sovereignty of the state, international law, civilization based on justice, inviolability of signed pacts; their revision or reform admitted only through peaceful negotiations."

Then, after mentioning that President Roosevelt in his message to Congress had completed the program enunciated by Secretary of State Cordell Hull with a noble appeal to religion, Osservatore's editor said that this vade mecum of peaceful consortium expressed in the simple and sober style of practical men cannot but recall other words—the words of the Pope.

"Pius XII," he wrote, "in his Easter allocution, in those to the Sacred College and to the Venetian pilgrims, in the message of August 24, in reply to the Ambassador of Belgium, placed, as a basis, individual order as well as collective and international; the sacrosanct rights of human dignity and the liberty of all creatures; respect for and the teaching of religion; cooperation among individuals, among classes, and among peoples in the proper distribution of the goods and riches that God has profusely given to the world; a mutual understanding among the nations on the common way of civil progress; the safeguarding of the honor and liberty of peoples; the observance of pacts; a policy inspired by morals; justice rendered to the weak no less than to the strong; justice that is affirmed by the force of reason and not by recourse to arms."

"It is impossible," the editorial continued, "not to perceive the almost literal identity of the essential points enumerated by the statesmen of one of the most powerful nations in the world and the principles exposed by the highest spiritual authority on earth. For the sovereign pontiff, teaching springs from revealed truth; for the man of government it springs from concrete experience."

The editor of Osservatore then called upon men in politics to meditate upon this comparison of the two peace proposals, saying that in decisive hours, in times of extreme evils, at the turning point of history, rather of the preservation of civilization and humanity, life, experience, practice has in its cry the accent of the Lord, has in its word the very admonition of God.

The editor then quotes the Holy Father, saying that the Church of Christ is "the inexhaustible source of life for souls," and "the illustrious benefactress of civil consortium."

Attitude of Flint Glass Workers on Reciprocal-Trade Agreements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

LETTER BY M. J. GILLOOLY

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a letter in protest against reciprocal-trade agreements written by Mr. M. J. Gillooly, president of the Flint Glass Workers' Union of North America.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the National Glass Budget of October 14, 1939]

FLINT GLASS WORKERS FILE BRIEF AGAINST TRADE TREATY

A vigorous protest against the sacrificing of the best interests of flint glass workers by the creation of a reciprocal-trade agreement between the United States and Belgium was registered in a brief filed by M. J. Gillooly, president of the American Flint Glass Workers Union, on September 26 with the Committee on Reciprocity Information. Text thereof follows:

SEPTEMBER 26, 1939.

COMMITTEE ON RECIPROCITY INFORMATION,
United States Tariff Commission, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: On behalf of the 35,000 American citizens, dependent for their livelihood on the continued operation of American glassware factories, we most respectfully protest against the reduction of any of the present rates of tariff duties levied on imports of glassware produced in Belgium, Japan, Germany, or other countries, through our entry into a trade treaty with Belgium.

The purposes of the Trade Treaty Act, which provide that through our entry into a trade treaty with a foreign nation such foreign nation will accord the products of the United States of America such additional opportunities for sale in such foreign nation that employment opportunities will be promoted in the United States, cannot be complied with under existing world conditions, especially in Belgium.

The action of those entrusted with the carrying on or the negotiation of trade treaties in alleging or assuming that they believe, through our entry into a trade treaty wtih Belgium, a nation interested at the present time in maintaining its very life, they can increase job opportunities for American workers, only through securing a reduction in our present tariff duties on imports from Belgium, to our mind, well illustrates the hypocrisy which underlies our present trade-treaty policy.

Any reduction in the present tariff duties on glassware articles, through our entry into a trade treaty with Belgium, will benefit only the products of Japan and will enrich only those distributors of Japanese glassware in the American market by depriving American glassware workers of their means of a livelihood.

With Belgium worried about its very existence as a nation, properly fearful of a repetition of what happened in 1914, with almost every European nation bending every effort to enlarge its war machinery, we respectfully protest against our governmental officials, assured of a substantial sized pay check every 2 weeks, inflicting worry, distress, and possible privation upon those American workers dependent for their jobs on the continued operation of the American glassware industry. Our workers have every right to fear that through reduced tariff duties levied on imports of glassware products of Japan, delivered into American stores at total delivered costs which are less than our costs of delivering comparable American glassware articles into the same American stores, they will be deprived of the scant job opportunities they now have.

The interest of American workers, dependent for their job opportunities in the American glassware industry, in tariff matters is not one of theory or possible world peace. With the workers this is a question of bread and butter for the workers and their families. Further, as home owners in many of the small communities wherein these American glassware factories are located, it is a question which vitally interests them as citizens. In many communities the existent glassware factory is the sole means of employment for the workers, the wages of the workers the sole dependence of the local merchants, and, the continuance of the community itself, as such, the continued operation of the glassware factory.

A few years ago the newspapers of the Nation were filled with heart-rending stories of how the coal miners of Pennsylvania, unable to secure work at their trade, resorted to bootlegging coal in order to secure the funds necessary to maintain their families. Many of these workers sacrificed their lives through their ignorance or their inability to properly protect themselves from the caving in of some of these bootleg mines.

The transfer of jobs of American glassware workers to workers in foreign countries, as a result of inadequate tariff protection, has resulted in the creation of a similar, but, thank God, a less dangerout condition among glassware workers in some communities.

Unable to secure work and conversant with their skill and ability to produce hand-blown glassware, comparable to any produced in any country in the world, and desperate to secure work, these unemployed workers, in several cases, have banded together and formed what is termed "cooperative glass companies." In order to get started these workers have drawn from the banks and life-insurance companies their life savings and invested in such cooperative factories. After a short time these workers have found that they cannot secure even a decent wage for themselves because of the low prices at which glassware distributors can purchase comparable articles, the products of workers of foreign countries. In many cases these workers have been disillusioned and have found that the products of their labor, for they have received or taken in wages less than one-half what they would have been paid for the production of similar products in regular glassware factories, must be sold for less than actual costs of production in order to meet the competition of imported articles.

Naturally, when workers themselves find that the products of their skilled labor are not salable in the American market, in competition with the low-wage-produced products of Belgium and Japan, they realize how dependent they are on adequate tariff protection.

We have quite often heard the theorists and well-paid Government officials refer to the small percentage of imports of products of foreign countries compared with what they term "the domestic production," thus, the necessity, to their minds, for reduction in present tariff rates. However, we have never heard either these theorists or well-paid Government officials state what percentage of the American market should be turned over to the control of foreigners while able and willing American citizens are unable to find employment in the production of comparable articles or products.

The American glassware industry is located, for the most part, in small communities in our Midwestern or Central States. The products of the glassware workers are necessarily fragile, and the costs of transportation to the principal consuming markets, especially along the Atlantic coast, are much higher than costs of transportation of comparable glass products of Belgian and Japanese workers to the same markets.

It is our belief that the only item in which the Belgian glassware industry can justly, or should, ask for reductions in tariff duties is on imports of hand-blown ware. From our calculations, taking into consideration the Belgian-declared foreign values of such imports, adding to it the tariff duties levied on such declared foreign values, and adding thereto what we believe is a fair cost of delivering such articles into American markets, we have every reason to believe that at the present time imports of Belgian hand-blown glassware control more than 35 percent of the sales of such glassware in the American market.

Is it fair to contend that with the products of Belgian glassware workers controlling the sale of 35 percent of the American glassware market, in any item that American citizens, dependent for their livelihood on their ability to secure work in American glassware factories, have no reason to worry about the possible reductions which might be made in tariff duties through our entry into this proposed trade treaty with Belgium?

The American glassware workers have reason to question the sincerity or the ability of those handling the negotiating of trade treaties to properly care for their interests. Some 16 months ago those governmental officials handling the negotiation of trade treaties issued an analysis of their work in consummating a trade treaty with Czechoslovakia. They attempted to show that American production of glassware is largely machine-made, while the competing imports were the product of hand labor. This statement is not only false but, to the American glassware workers, indicates either the lack of interest in or the ignorance these officials possess as to what constitutes American industry today.

The workers in American glassware factories, conversant with the ignorance or lack of interest of those who would issue such a false and deceptive finding of fact, have very little confidence in the willingness or the ability of such Government officials to properly protect the job opportunities of those American workers, many thousands of whom, when employed, produce hand-blown glassware exclusively.

In addition, it might be well for those handling the negotiation of these trade treaties to know that considerable high-grade American pressed glassware, the product of American glassware workers, competes in the American market with the products of workers of foreign countries.

Thousands of our workers have contended that one of the principal purposes of our entry into these trade treaties with foreign countries and the seemingly exclusive policy of reducing our present inadequate tariff duties, is to reduce the wage standards of all American workers.

While President Roosevelt very properly calls upon all American citizens in these troubled times to lend every assistance to their Government, we find the officials of the Department of State inflicting worry and distress upon those American workers dependent for their livelihood on the production of articles which compete in the American market with manufactured products of workers in foreign countries, and, which foreign-made articles may deprive our American workers of their job opportunities, if our present tariff duties are reduced.

When the farcical public hearings were held on the question of our entry into the trade treaty with Czechoslovakia our organization, through Vice President Harry H. Cook, appeared and presented glassware products of Czechoslovakia and comparable articles produced by American workers. He very vividly displayed the difference in delivered costs and demonstrated beyond any reasonable doubt that glassware products produced in foreign countries, comparable to products of American workers, were delivered into American stores at total costs which were less than the costs of producing and transporting comparable American-made articles to the same American stores. Those samples were turned over to your committee.

While those foreign-made articles were the product of Czechoslovakia, similar and comparable samples of Belgian and Japanese glassware articles would tell the same story today.

It might be well for your committee to bear in mind that the wages paid to American glassware workers in the production of hand-blown glassware articles represent some 60 percent of the cost of production of such articles.

We sincerely trust that your committee, in view of the present unsettled world conditions, realizing that the purposes of the legislation which authorizes our entry into trade treaties with foreign nations, cannot now be secured, will have the courage to publicly recommend the indefinite postponement of our negotiation of any more trade treaties, including the present proposed trade treaty with Belgium. By so doing we can assure your committee you will relieve the minds of many thousands of American glassware workers at the present very fearful of the possible loss of their job opportunities.

Respectfully submitted.

AMERICAN FLINT GLASS WORKERS
UNION OF NORTH AMERICA,
By M. J. GILLOOLY, President.

Foreign Trade Committee—Tampa Chamber of Commerce

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES O. ANDREWS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

ADDRESS BY MARTIN CARABALLO

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered on September 12, 1939, by Martin Caraballo, Esq., before the Foreign Trade Committee, the Pan American League, and the League for Inter-American Relations. Mr. Caraballo is a very distinguished and able lawyer of Tampa, Fla.; he comes from a very distinguished Latin American family, and if there is anyone in that section of the country who is familiar with the question of inter-American relations and how they may be improved, it is Mr. Caraballo. He was recently president of the State bar association and has held many other honorable positions in Florida, to which State he came in his early childhood. I ask that the address referred to be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I could begin this talk by using the time honored formula which goes something like this, "Once upon a time the Western Hemisphere," and go on from there because my talk will deal primarily with this part of the world. But as its history is well known to all of you, that part may be omitted. We know that at one time various nations of Europe dominated, if not entirely controlled, the Western Hemisphere. As time went on and men realized more and more that they should be, and actually were, something higher than slaves or beasts of burden, the first cry of their souls was the cry for liberty. The cry for freedom, for the right to live, and for the right to think, gathered momentum, and one by one almost all the nations of the Western Hemisphere secured for themselves the right to live their lives as they saw fit. With the throwing off of the parental yoke came the freedom to trade in the most favorable markets, and at the same time there arose the necessity, on the part of the former "bosses," of wooing these markets, since they were no longer able to force their merchandise down the throats of the liberated people. This courting process, if I may so call it, has not been uniform nor constant but it has steadily progressed. At one time, because of our proximity, we were the favored ones, and while, for the same reason and for others that could be mentioned, we still retain a large part of this trade, we have by no means retained all. When times were good, our merchandise practically sold itself. All we had to do was display it and buyers surged from everywhere with the wish to buy and the money to pay for what they bought. Then came hard times, as hard times have a habit of recurring, and no longer were sales automatic. A buyer's market necessarily resulted with the consumer holding the purse strings. In this situation European countries, and particularly Germany, renewed their assaults upon those markets and by the use of numerous devices increased the infiltration of their merchandise in what we smugly had called our market. And then the pinch began to be felt. No longer were we able to say "take it or leave it" because we had to meet strong competition, a competition carried on, it is true, with merchandise produced with what amounts to slave labor and at other times with merchandise of inferior quality. No one, and least of all myself, would like to lower the standards of living which obtain in our country and, hence, if the people to the south of us considered price more important than quality, then there was nothing we could do about it unless we intended to embark on a program of education which, besides being costly, was rendered very difficult because of the diversity of language. Awakened to the situation, we continued to fight for our markets, with here and there a victory, here and there a loss. And this brings us down to September 3, 1939.

On that day a new and alluring vista appeared in the horizon of our commerce. You have no doubt read of the discontinuance of the services to South and Central America by certain European air lines. You, of course, know that the superiority of the British and French Fleets of war have driven German commerce from the seas. No longer will it be possible for Germany to continue to exploit those markets. Great Britain and France have their troubles and need their ships for other purposes. Internal conditions being what they are in a country at war, all efforts must be bent to the production and importation of war material; there is little or no time to produce merchandise for sale.

This then is the picture today and this then is our opportunity today. Argentina finds a ready sale for its beef and wheat, and other countries for their minerals and foodstuffs. It is reasonable to assume that, at least for the duration of the war, prosperity will descend upon our southern neighbors. They therefore will have the means with which to buy what we produce. The question that arises in my mind is, Are we going to tackle this new opportunity in the same way in which we mismanaged those we have had before? The answer to this depends upon whether we have learned to understand our Latin neighbors or whether we are going to sit back and depend upon a seller's market where our goods will again sell themselves from sheer necessity. If we follow this latter course, rest assured that we will prosper only for as long as war exists and just as surely go back to the doldrums when the war is ended. On the other hand, if we have learned our lesson, or even if we simply desire to learn what we overlooked before, then there is hope, in fact almost a certainty, that we will be able to keep our markets after the war is over.

I think the first lesson that we should learn is the fact that each nation has the inherent right to live its own life as it thinks best. We do not look with favor upon Russia in its attempt to force communism upon the world, nor those of Germany to force its Nazi doctrines outside of its own borders. If this is so, are we consistent when we try to force the Latin American republics to do business our way, to think our way, and to act our way? No; decidedly no. In my own feeble way I shall attempt to show you some of the particulars in which we have failed to understand our Latin neighbors.

Let me sketch for you two of the leading members of your club. There is Smith, an able man, a man of sound principle and ideas, who has made a great success of his business. Smith, however, is so imbued with his own importance that he is constantly extolling his shrewdness and successes. He is afraid that you may not have heard the things that he has accomplished so he embarks on their description with slight or no provocation and his talks revolve around the vertical pronoun. On the other hand there is Brown, a man equally as capable, just as successful, or perhaps more so, than Smith. It is difficult to draw out of Brown anything pertaining to himself. He has the rare attribute of modesty, not the modesty that is sometimes confused with an inferiority complex but the modesty of the strong, the modesty of a man who is sure of his ground but who believes that there are many other men as capable as he, a thing which Smith is not willing to concede, except for the grudging admission that, if there are other such men, he has not heard of them. You know both of these men, they are prototypes of their respective schools of thought and you will find them in all the walks of life.

With that picture before you, is it any wonder that the crowds around Brown are larger and more respectful and attentive than the numbers that congregate around Smith? Perhaps one of the greatest reasons why we have not been able to capture the South American markets is that we, as a nation, are suffering from the same inflated ego of our friend Smith. Because our mode of living is different, because we like our way of doing business, and because we are rather pleased with ourselves, we have not stopped to consider that the ways of the Latin businessman are just as dear to him as ours are to ourselves. We become impatient at what we are pleased to describe as their slowness, their "mañanas." Did it ever occur to you that they can think and reason as well as we, and that perhaps the terrific pace that we have established for ourselves is considered by them as a mild form of insanity, pathetic in its own futility? They live and love and progress, but above all they lead happier lives than we do, since they are not obsessed with the idea that money is made only to be piled up, and believe that it should be made for the happiness it will bring to themselves and to their fellow man. To one who knows both points of view, theirs is the saner existence.

One of the finer qualities of our southern neighbors is their unfailing courtesy, something which, at least in our larger cities, is fast disappearing. Some of us go to the point of believing that courtesy is a sign of weakness. I have no quarrel with those who hold such a belief so long as they keep it to themselves or exhibit it only toward those who are themselves lacking in courtesy. Our fatal error is in crediting the Latin courtesy to weakness instead of giving it its true value which is that this sign of good breeding is the outward manifestation of a desire to live at peace with others. In this sense our friend Brown is courteous while I am afraid that Smith falls far short.

From a purely commercial point of view, is it wise to mock those who buy from us? You can find the answer to this question by asking yourselves another one; how long would you continue to deal with your grocer if he would let you see that in his opinion, you are a weak sister? How long would you continue to deal with such a man if he went to great pains in telling you how far superior to you he considered himself? It didn't take you 10 seconds to answer those questions, did it? Why is it then that our businessmen have not found the same answer in the many years that they have been dealing with Latin America? They appear not to be acquainted with a Latin proverb which, as most of them are, is a mirror of truth, and I quote, "Courtesy does not detract from valor."

Another of our pet peeves with the Latin businessman in his generosity with his friends, and we sometimes lose patience with them when we see that they have not chosen to buy our product but have purchased from a friend what is perhaps inferior merchandise. Our very souls rebel at the thought that we have lost a sale to such a rival. Friendship counts but little in our business life; it is the mainspring of the Latin temperament. How much wiser would it be to cultivate his friendship and thereby gain his good will than to stand on the side lines watching our sales fall off and venting our chagrin in mental castigation of the man who dealt with his friend at a monetary sacrifice. Wise men have said that it is only the truth that hurts and of course any criticism of ourselves is unpopular, as unpopular as I am perhaps making myself at this moment, but we must be made to understand that we can never expect to have the friendship of the people to the south of us until we ourselves become friendly. If this be treason, then make the best of it. Not long ago I was a guest in a very prominent club in the city of New York and heard a man boast of how he had cleaned out his friend. "I took him to the cleaners" were his words, and yet the victim was a man who had called upon this vulture in a social way and whose families were very friendly with each other. Is this business? If so, the Latin man wants none of it. We are an able and intelligent people, of this there can be no doubt, and yet we close our minds to the many admirable qualities of the Latin people.

A question may arise in the minds of some of us as to how we are to obtain knowledge of the customs, habits, likes, and dislikes of the Latin people without going to South and Central America. The answer is in your own community. It can be just as truly found here as in any other American city where Latin people congregate and live. The book is open to you; you have but to glance at its pages. We are prone to criticize these people because they live together forming their own communities and do not freely mingle with our people. This, however, is only true of the older generations, for the younger generations have been assimilated into our life and we are just as familiar with the names of Fernandez, Garcia, Gonzalez, and numerous others as we are with Brown, Smith, and Jones, and as the offspring of these younger generations increase more and more will these names be written into the pages of our history. Turning then to the older generations, is it strange that they should congregate together? They came to America as the land of promise, loving its liberty and freedom, mainly because it did not exist where they came from, but they spoke a different language, their habits and customs were different, and they found a friendlier greeting among their own kind than they found among the rest of us. Their living together is not strange; what is strange is that they have not become embittered. Having an understanding mind they have overlooked our deficiencies, conceding us the right to make mistakes, something which apparently we are not willing to concede to them. The younger generations born and raised in our country are not different than your children or mine. Study, then, their fathers and mothers if you really wish to know what the Latin people are like.

The Latin business and professional men possess a certain amount of innate dignity, and because we are a more democratic people and dislike anything that savors of stiffness, we are apt to classify them as "stuffed shirts," and we are wrong. The native dignity of the Latin is a concomitant of his courtesy and is the natural result of his desire to avoid the unseemly. Properly understood and treated, it adds charm and stature; treat it lightly or sarcastically and you have lost a friend.

Let me draw you another picture. Your doorbell rings, and when you answer it you find a man holding in his hands something which it is apparent to you he is trying to sell you; but lo! and behold! when he opens his mouth, strange sounds come from it indicative of a foreign language. He speaks no English, although, perhaps, he can say, "Best in the world," or at least something that sounds like that to you. Are you likely to buy what he has, when around the corner there is a man who speaks your language and who keeps merchandise somewhat similar to what this man is selling, but with which merchandise you are more familiar? The answer is obvious, isn't it? You will, of course, tell him "No" in such a tone of voice as his good looks, or lack of good looks, prompts you to use; but just the same it will be "No." Isn't it strange, then, that a number of our large national commercial enterprises send to Latin America managers—and, yes, even salesmen—who have no knowledge of Spanish or, at best, a very imperfect rudimentary knowledge of that language? This is not a new situation. It has been going on for decades. Yet we have not taken the trouble of teaching our emissaries the language of the people whose business they are going over there to seek.

By this time most of you will have come to the conclusion that I am holding a brief for the Latin people. Frankly, I am. Apart from the fact that I can never forget that those to whom I owe my very existence were and are Latins, and that I am just as proud of my Latin ancestry as I am of my American citizenship. I recognize their virtues, without thereby overlooking their faults, for perfection in humanity has not yet been reached, and the happenings of recent weeks in Europe can well cause one to ponder if it will ever be achieved, even in a relative sense. I have merely given you the benefit of my observation of some of the particulars in which we have failed to understand the Latin temperament.

The above is not all. Even the most strict observance of all that I have pointed out will do nothing more than give you the social approach to those markets. Cuba, Mexico, South and Central America jointly form a vast country, one republic alone, that of Brazil, containing approximately three and a quarter million square miles with a population of over 40,000,000 inhabitants. Out of a total population of over 100,000,000 perhaps only 15 or 20 percent are able to consume a share of all of the goods we manufacture, but even a complete market of only fifteen or twenty million persons is something to think about. On the other hand, all of them need some of our products. The first and perhaps the most important thing is the development of their resources, thereby increasing their purchasing power. Their vast natural resources are almost untouched. The crying need is for the capital to exploit them and the experience to direct such enterprises. Here is where we can be of help to them and thereby of help to ourselves. This, however, is not as simple as it sounds. The shrewd investor demands security for his capital. Because the last American frontier has been crossed, pioneering work has been completed, and hence we have settled down to doing business on a solid businesslike foundation. If we desire this form of ironclad security, we will lose those markets more and more to other powers who are content to pioneer. European powers, notably Germany, have not hesitated to penetrate that country with a system of barters and of development work. Are we to lose our most natural geographical markets simply because they are not yet ready to do business our way?

We have sustained losses in foreign investments, it is true, but have we not likewise sustained losses in domestic development work? Does not the so-called ironclad security at times become mere scraps of paper? Are not our courts crowded with litigation of investors trying to save something from the wreck? No one can deny this, but there is this distinction; we take our home losses in our stride but when we lose on foreign investments we set up a hue and cry for the Federal Government and the marines. I fully believe that more intelligent management, a better cooperation with the native officials, a genuine desire to understand their problems, and a toning down of our superiority complex will keep down those losses to the level of the normal hazard of such enterprises. After all, it is axiomatic that greater risks go hand in hand with greater profits.

There is another reason why we should try to be on good terms with our southern neighbors and it is by no means a commercial one. We cannot act as an international policeman nor can we, as did Don Quixote, set out to right all wrongs. We, therefore, must come to the conclusion that our national safety lies in the close cooperation of the people of the Western Hemisphere. The isolation provided by the oceans will mean nothing if warlike European nations establish a foothold in the Western Hemisphere, thereby bringing to our doors their brutal and barbaric methods of conquest, conquests not dictated by the will of the people but by the whim of an arrogant lunatic whose mere existence is proof that our vaunted civilization is still in its infancy. The American Republics to the south of us look upon us as their natural leader, not only because of our commanding position as a world power and our leadership in the world of finance and commerce but also because of our genuine love of freedom, a love of freedom which they know is not just a catch phrase, a love of freedom which is separated by a vast gulf from the so-called "liberation of minorities" of which we hear so much at present. Because we are powerful the greater the necessity of enlightened cooperation with those nations, thereby earning not their fear and the hate which it engenders, but the love and respect of brothers united by a common cause. We can earn the respect of these nations by eschewing all intolerance and by exhibiting the desire to understand.

I have heard the question asked, Where does all this help Tampa or even Florida? I cannot say, of course, what benefit we may derive in dollars and cents, except to say that because of our geographical location we are bound to receive our share of such commerce. But I feel that even if we profit not one cent in money we will receive a vastly greater benefit from such improved relations. In common with the other States of the Union, we will share in the security, peace, and contentment of the Western Hemisphere. Let us as a Nation so comport ourselves toward our southern neighbors and toward the world that whenever anyone puts together alternate stripes of red and white and sews upon one corner a square of blue sprinkled with five-pointed stars, a transformation will immediately occur. Gone will be the bunting lately held in his hands and there shall arise from his labors a symbol of freedom, of peace, and of harmony. A symbol under whose protecting folds the harassed and worried sons of man can find a haven of rest, a symbol of what is good to live for, a symbol of what is worthy of dying for.

National Nonpartisan Committee for Peace Through Revision of the Neutrality Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

TELEGRAM BY WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE AND LIST OF MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a telegram by William Allen White inviting participation in the National Nonpartisan Committee for Peace Through Revision of the Neutrality Law, and a list of those who have joined the organization.

There being no objection, the telegram and list were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Will you join with me and several hundred others in a National Nonpartisan Committee for Peace Through Revision of the Neutrality Law?

The present Senate bill to revise the neutrality law goes as far as human ingenuity can to lessen the danger of American involvement. Moreover, by repealing the arms embargo our country is no longer aiding Hitler to the disadvantage of the democracies who are resisting the spread of dictatorship.

Obviously debate may reveal places where the present Senate bill may be improved but we are inviting you to join us on the principle of this bill and the international aims which will be secured by the application of that principle.

The American Union for Concerted Peace Efforts will act as the committee's secretariat. Address me at 8 West Fortieth Street, New York City.

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE.

NONPARTISAN COMMITTEE FOR PEACE THROUGH REVISION OF THE NEUTRALITY LAW, WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE, CHAIRMAN

James Truslow Adams, Southport, Conn.
Cyrus Adler, president, Jewish Theological Seminary of America.
Allen D. Albert, sociologist and past president, International Association of Rotary Clubs.
Gordon W. Allport, professor, Harvard, University.
Mrs. Larz Anderson, Washington, D. C.
Henry A. Atkinson, general secretary, World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches.
Frank Aydelotte, president, Swarthmore College.
Mrs. Dana Converse Backus, Port Washington, L. I.
Tallulah Bankhead, New York, N. Y.
George Gordon Battle, New York City.
James Baxter III, president, Williams College.
Harry Best, professor, University of Kentucky.
Charles E. Beury, president, Temple University.
Mrs. Emmons Blaine, Chicago, Ill.
Frank G. Boudreau, Milbank Memorial Fund.
Raymond D. Bragg, First Unitarian Society.
Mrs. Henry Breckenridge, New York City.
Mrs. Arthur Brin, past president, National Council of Jewish Women.
Arlo Ayers Brown, president, Drew University.
Mrs. Edward Browning, Philadelphia, Pa.
John S. Bryan, president, William and Mary College.
Henry M. Busch, professor, Cleveland College, Western Reserve University.
Robert H. Cabell, Chicago, Ill.
Henry Seidel Canby, professor, Yale University.
Newcomb Carlton, chairman of the board, Western Union Telegraph Co.
Carrie Chapman Catt, honorary chairman, National Committee on the Cause and Cure of War.
Zechariah Chafee, Jr., professor, Harvard University.
Harry Chandler, publisher, Los Angeles Times.
Harry Woodburn Chase, chancelor, New York University.
W. L. Clayton, Houston, Tex.
Rufus E. Clement, president, Atlanta University.
Robert C. Clothier, president, Rutgers University.
Henry Sloane Coffin, president, Union Theological Seminary.
Martin J. Collins, president, Graham Paper Co., St. Louis.
W. W. Comfort, president, Haverford College.
Frederic R. Coudert, New York City.
William H. Cowley, president, Hamilton College.
Paul Cruikshank, head master, Taft School.
George B. Cutton, president, Colgate University.
Harvey N. Davis, president, Stevens Institute.
Rufus C. Dawes, Chicago, Ill.
Munroe E. Deutsch, provost, University of California.
Robert C. Dexter, secretary, Department of Social Relations, American Unitarian Association.
Hoyt M. Dobbs, Episcopal bishop, Birmingham, Ala.
Melvyn Douglas, Hollywood, Calif.
Paul H. Douglas, professor, University of Chicago.
Michael Francis Doyle, Philadelphia, Pa.
J. Roscoe Drummond, editor, Christian Science Monitor.
Stephen Duggan, Institute of International Education, New York City.
J. Stanley Durkee, Plymouth Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Clyde Eagleton, New York University.
Frederick H. Ecker, chairman of the board, Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.
Sherwood Eddy, New York City.
William A. Eddy, president, Hobart College.
Frederick M. Eliot, Boston, Mass.
Samuel A. Eliot, Arlington Street Church, Boston, Mass.
Haven Emerson, Columbia University.
Silas Evans, president, Ripon College, Ripon, Wis.
Frederick L. Fagley, General Council of Congregational and Christian Churches, New York City.
Geraldine Farrar, Ridgefield, Conn.
Samuel S. Fels, president, Fels and Co., Philadelphia, Pa.
Charles G. Fenwick, Bryn Mawr College.
Marshall Field, New York City.
Thomas K. Finletter, New York City.
Morris Fishbein, editor, Journal of American Medical Association.
Edgar J. Fisher, Institute of International Education.
Dorothy Canfield Fisher, Arlington, Vt.
D. F. Fleming, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn.
Guy Stanton Ford, dean, Graduate School, University of Minnesota.
Douglas S. Freeman, editor, Richmond News-Leader, Richmond, Va.
Alfred C. Fuller, president, Fuller Brush Co.
Helen Gahagan, Hollywood, Calif.
Francis P. Gaines, president, Washington and Lee University.
Frank S. Gaines, Berkeley, Calif.
James W. Gerard, New York City.
Mrs. Douglas Gibbons, New York City.
Virginia Gildersleeve, dean, Barnard College.
Arthur J. Goldsmith, New York City.
R. K. Gooch, professor, University of Virginia.
Mrs. Henry F. Grady, Washington, D. C.
Frank P. Graham, president, University of North Carolina.

John Temple Graves II, the Birmingham (Ala.) News.
Clifton D. Gray, president, Bates College.
Samuel R. Guard, editor, the Breeders Gazette.
John Gunther, Washington, D. C.
William B. Hale, Chicago, Ill.
Grover C. Hall, editor, Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser.
Helen Hall, Henry Street Settlement, New York City.
Roswell G. Ham, president, Mount Holyoke College.
Henry I. Harriman, chairman of the board, New England Power Association, and past president United States Chamber of Commerce.
Arthur A. Hauck, president, University of Maine.
Arthur Garfield Hays, New York City.
Victor G. Heiser, New York City.
A. D. Henderson, president, Antioch College.
Mrs. Elinore M. Herrick, New York City.
Mrs. William G. Hibbard, Winnetka, Ill.
Melvin D. Hildreth, Washington, D. C.
Hamilton Holt, president, Rollins College.
Ernest Martin Hopkins, president, Dartmouth College.
Walter M. Howlett, secretary, Greater New York Federation of Churches.
L. H. Hubbard, president, Texas State College for Women.
Walter Hullihen, president, University of Delaware.
Wiley Lin Hurie, president, College of Ozarks, Arkansas.
Franklin W. Johnson, president, Colby College.
Fannie Hurst, New York City.
S. Shepard Jones, World Peace Foundation, Boston, Mass.
Paul Kellogg, editor, the Survey Graphic.
Paul B. Kern, Methodist Episcopal bishop, Nashville, Tenn.
Frank Kingdon, president, Newark University.
Freda Kirchwey, editor, the Nation.
Col. Frank Knox, publisher, the Chicago Daily News.
Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw, New York City.
James M. Landis, dean, Harvard Law School.
William Lassiter, major general (retired), United States Army, Santa Barbara, Calif.
Roberta Campbell Lawson, former president, Federation of Women's Clubs.
Morris S. Lazaron, rabbi, Baltimore, Md.
Max Lerner, professor, Williams College.
William Draper Lewis, director of American Law Institute.
Irene Lewisohn, New York City.
Arthur O. Lovejoy, professor, Johns Hopkins University.
William T. Manning, Episcopal bishop of New York.
Daniel L. Marsh, president, Boston University.
Mrs. Eleanor Wilson McAdoo, Santa Monica, Calif.
Frederick C. McKee, Pittsburgh, Pa.
Peter Molyneaux, publisher, the Texas Weekly.
Hugh Moore, chairman of the board, Dixie-Vortex Co.
Walden Moore, professor, University of Rochester.
George W. Morgan, St. Paul, Minn.
Felix Morley, editor, Washington Post.
Mrs. Dwight W. Morrow, acting president, Smith College.
Mrs. E. K. Morrow, Salina, Kans.
J. L. Newcombe, president, University of Virginia.
G. Bernard Noble, professor, Reed College, Portland, Oreg.
G. Nollen, president, Bankers Life Co., Des Moines, Iowa.
J. S. Nollen, president, Grinnell College, Grinnell, Iowa.
George Norlin, president emeritus, University of Colorado.
G. Ashton Oldham, Episcopal bishop, Albany, N. Y.
William Church Osborn, New York City.
Marion Park, president, Bryn Mawr College.
James G. Patton, member executive committee, Farmers Education and Cooperative Union of America.
Lewis Perry, principal, Phillips Exeter Academy.
Joseph H. Proskauer, former justice of the Supreme Court of New York.
Mrs. Ogden Reid, New York City.
Aurelia Henry Reinhardt, president, Mills College.
F. D. G. Ribble, dean, University of Virginia.
Edward G. Robinson, Hollywood, Calif.
Henrietta Roelofs, president, National Peace Conference.
Chester H. Rowell, San Francisco, Calif.
George Rublee, Washington, D. C.
William F. Russell, dean, Teachers College, Columbia University.
Monsignor John A. Ryan, professor, Catholic University, Washington, D. C.
George C. St. John, headmaster, Choate School.
Harry Scherman, president, Book-of-the-Month Club.
William Jay Schieffelin, New York City.
Walter Dill Scott, president emeritus, Northwestern University.
Ellery Sedgewick, Boston, Mass.
Henry D. Sharpe, president, Brown & Sharpe Manufacturing Co.
Guy Emery Shipler, editor, the Churchman.
Father Maurice Sheehy, Catholic University, Washington, D. C.
Robert E. Sherwood, New York City.
James T. Shotwell, professor, Columbia University.
Kenneth C. M. Sills, president, Bowdoin College.
Minot Simons, All Souls Unitarian Church, New York City.
Robert G. Sproul, president, University of California.
Anson Phelps Stokes, Washington, D. C.
Clarence K. Streit, New York City.
Herbert Bayard Swope, New York City.
Horace D. Taft, head master, Taft School.
Ida M. Tarbell, New York City.
Dorothy Thompson, New York City.
E. B. Tucker, president, Austin College.
Clifton M. Utley, director, Chicago Conference of Foreign Relations.
Tertius Van Dyke, head master, Gunnery School.
George E. Vincent, former president, Rockefeller Foundation.
Sarah Wambaugh, Cambridge, Mass.
W. W. Waymack, editor, Des Moines Register.
Herman B. Wells, president of University of Indiana.
Stephen S. Wise, rabbi, Free Synagogue, New York City.
A. F. Whitney, president, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen.
C. C. Williams, president, Lehigh University.
R. E. Wood, chairman of the board, Sears, Roebuck & Co.
Mary E. Woolley, president emeritus, Mount Holyoke College.
Quincy Wright, professor, University of Chicago.

Farmers Union Convention, Glasgow, Mont.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

ADDRESS BY M. W. THATCHER

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the address delivered by Mr. M. W. Thatcher, national legislative representative for the Farmers Union. Mr. Thatcher spoke to the Farmers Union Convention in Glasgow, Mont.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, my friends and delegates to the 1939 convention of the Farmers Union of Montana, ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, I wish you could know how pleased I am to be back here again with you and thus enjoy the opportunity to talk as frankly and realistically as I know how about things as they have been and are today. The only reason conditions in this farm State and other farm States are not better than they are is because too many people are too lazy to think.

We could feel differently about this if nearly all of the people of this State belonged to some organization trying to do something about the intolerable state of affairs. But the cold fact is there is only one farm organization in this State, and out of some 50,000 farmers only 5,000 farmers belong to that farm organization. Put it another way—this means that 45,000 farmers out of 50,000 are not paying dues into an organization which is giving all of its time and energy trying to meet the problems of this State and all the other States of the Union. Maybe the Farmers Union is not the organization they want; maybe a better one can be set up. If so, it ought to be done.

The only point we are trying to make is that no individual can be worth a whoop in meeting a national calamity. He must join an association with other people, accept chosen leadership to carry on the battle for reforms that are required to protect him in his industry as a farmer, a storekeeper, a professional man, or what have you. To put it another way, individualism is not only impotent, it is dead as a door nail.

Conversely, the people organized can have anything they demand. No sympathy can be wasted on the individual who cries, "They have done me wrong." He is only entitled to sympathy if he is awake, studies, and participates in joint movement with his class to demand corrections in the national economy that are required if the farmer, or the banker, or the businessman, or the professional man is to survive. That's the essence of democracy. For those who do not want a democracy, who do not want liberty, free speech and those blessed things which have been lost in most of the world, of course, they are doing the proper thing by remaining individualists and not belonging to any organization.

There can be no purpose of a convention such as this if we don't frankly and realistically deal with the problem we have tried to present in these opening remarks. We challenge any man in Montana; we challenge any woman in Montana; we challege any adult anywhere in the United States to ask the question, "How are we to get out of the economic mess in which we now find ourselves, except in joint action?" We study the problems, debate the problems, and agree, under a majority-rule system, what is likely to be the best for the country. Individuals must support such an activity by being a part of such an activity, if there can be any hope of correcting what is admittedly unbearable in this Nation today.

Farm prices below the cost of production; ten to fifteen million people unemployed; farmers continuing to go busted over the Nation, being dispossessed of their farms; unemployed people being dispossessed of their homes; college graduates and professional people forced onto the relief rolls; business stagnant; money afraid to go into circulation; fear all over the land; war all about us—what in the world is required to shake the sense of people to bring them to a realization that they can no longer remain individualistic or aloof from these wrecking problems; make them realize security for each depends upon his joining the other in joint action for correction.

Now, these statements are true and everyone who listens to them knows they are true. Everybody accepts them as being true, but too few people have energy enough to think and join in common action to work out the required corrections and insist upon their being put into operation. Now, what group of people have been doing something about this national calamity? What people have been doing something about it? Who has not done anything about it? What has been done and what is to be done?

Now, we are going into that. That's why we are here. That's why we have a farmers union. That's why it holds a convention. That's what it is all about. If you people of the radio audience will give us 1 hour of your time out of the year, you still may not feel like urging farmers to join our organization, but you will learn something about what has been done for your State and what we intend to do during the next year for the State of Montana, all its people, and the people in the other States. Just be patient with us for a few moments.

Did you know, or did you realize, that when that little fellow with the little mustache carried a keg of dynamite into Poland on September 1 that you probably said goodbye to one-quarter of the market for your wheat? Does it mean anything to cut your wheat production from 60,000,000 bushels down to 45,000,000 bushels? Does it mean anything to the State of Montana to lose a market for 15,000,000 bushels of wheat? Does it mean anything to the State to have lost ten to fifteen million dollars of wheat income? Did you realize that when that little fellow with the little mustache started blowing up Poland that it caused the tobacco market in the United States to close up? That thousands of farm families in the tobacco States who depend upon the sale of their tobacco, all in one day found they could not sell 1 pound of their tobacco? Did you know, or do you know, that one-third of our tobacco crop is annually bought by England and on that one day in September England blandly announced that she would buy no more tobacco?

To put it another way, hard-working, persevering farm families, growing their hazardous crop of tobacco, which requires so much work and for which they have been so pitifully paid, in one day found themselves confronted with closed tobacco markets and not a pound could they sell. Down on their arms went their heads, fathers and mothers and children, weeping, wondering from where would come the money with which to keep alive, to keep the home. Through the years they have built up the farm home, cared for their soil, been doing what they thought was right. Then, in a single day, one man, with one thought, with one purpose, moved a great nation over into another nation and began blowing its people out of their homes. The people who were fighting were losing. The people who were shelled were losing. The tobacco farmers were losing.

The same is true of cotton for over half of its crop. It is true in corn and hog production for parts of its crop. It is true with all of our surplus crops including wheat. Does that mean anything to the United States? Does that mean anything to the tobacco States, the cotton States, the corn States, the wheat States? What is to be done about it?

Well, a great deal has been done about it by organized farmers and a friendly New Deal government. Just this week the tobacco market has been opened for those poor tobacco farmers, thousands and thousands of those farm families, because of the farm legislation which organized farmers had carried through Congress. There is a Commodity Credit Corporation because we supported the appropriation for its operations. It has money to work with. The Commodity Credit Corporation, with that money, has gone to the relief of the tobacco growers. It is too long a story to tell over this radio. It is real life's story for those poor tobacco growers. It is a human story of the fight made through the years, to put on the statute books the laws that could meet any impact suffered from the action of an international bandit.

The Commodity Credit Corporation, with its millions and millions, has now worked out an agreement with England and in this country, so that the farmers now can store away their tobacco and receive for it a higher price than was being paid for it just before their tobacco market closed. If the international mess continues, we will have to use these national programs and the funds appropriated to meet the continuing distressing problems of the cotton farmer also, and that problem is now worse because of the war situation abroad. It is going to be true of the other surplus commodities, and here I should pause to call the roll and I am going to be what some people might call mean about it. What have the private grain and livestock commission firms been doing about this through these years? What have the "line elevators" been doing about these problems through these years? What have the unorganized farmers been doing about these problems through these years? It is only the organized groups that have been busy through these years. It is only the organized farmers, through their spokesmen, who have done anything about it through these years. The Farmers Union has been in the forefront of that work and development through these years. What if there had been no farm organizations? What if there had been no cooperatives to carry on this work? Where would we find the wheat farmers of the spring-wheat area today? Where would the cotton farmers be today? Where would the tobacco farmers be today? Where would the dairy farmers and all the others be today? They would be far worse off than they are. Thousands upon thousands of them would have been off the farms. To be frank about it, no one dare deny that except for this work of the national farm organizations and the cooperatives, we would have had revolution all over this country.

In view of all this, I ask, "Why do farmers continue to support systems of marketing which are either unfriendly to the things we are here discussing, or are neutral or indifferent and do nothing about these problems?" I can stand here before you and talk to the people over the radio and testify as to the facts, because I have been at the arena where for many years this battle was being fought out, and that fight is in the arena at your National Capitol, Washington, D. C. Through these years, there have been the different farm programs proposed. These programs have been brought before the committees of Congress, where those who wish may testify for the program, or against it. Never once in all these years have the representatives of the private grain or livestock commission companies, or the "line-elevator" companies, or any other of them, appeared before these committees of Congress in support of any of these national farm programs that are now more than ever needed to protect agriculture against complete collapse.

Is it unfair to state the truth? The only time that any of these groups have ever appeared before committees, their testimony has been in opposition to the corrections which we were seeking. They fought us for 3 years against the enactment of the Commodity Exchange Act, which now, today, most members of these grain exchanges admit has brought great improvement and greater integrity into the market places. That was the National Farmers' Union fight, and I know because I lived with that legislation for 3 years, and I know about some of the money that was collected and sent to Washington to defeat that legislation; I know that you put up your money year after year to support it. Your good money won the battle against their foul money. The only grain organization in the whole Northwest that has been putting time and money into this program for national legislation is the Farmers Union Grain Terminal Association and its affiliated farmers' elevators out over the Northwest. The only livestock house which has been supporting this program for national legislation is the Farmers Union Livestock Commission Co. The only cooperative sales agency doing business with the farmers, in carrying supplies to them, which has supported this national program for agricultural improvement, has been the Farmers Union Central Exchange, and its affiliated cooperative oil companies. Put it down in your notebook because that's the actual history. In this whole spring-wheat area, the three organizations I have enumerated, that is, the Farmers Union Grain Terminal Association, the Farmers Union Livestock Commission Co., and the Farmers Union Central Exchange, together with their affiliated cooperative elevators, livestock-shipping associations, and cooperative oil stations, are the ones—and the only ones—which have contributed their energy and their funds to the enactment of the group of laws now on the statutes of the Federal Government; laws to help the farmers through the past few years, and to help farmers meet the international and national impacts which now threaten so much destruction to their annual income account.

Now, this being true—and it is true—will you people of Montana tell me one reason why there is any farmer who is thinking in Montana who would fail to belong to the Farmers Union and to support the cooperative grain-marketing and livestock-marketing agencies, or who would fail to support the cooperative bulk-oil stations, operated under the banner of the Farmers Union Central Exchange? If what we have stated is true—and it is true—why can't we expect to treble our business in the next year? Professional men of Montana, businessmen of Montana, where do you get your money? Our organizations are working as much for you as anyone else because you receive the farmer's dollar. Why aren't you all supporting this movement? If it needs improvement, why don't you tell us what to do to improve it? If you don't like its name, maybe it ought to be changed. If you don't like its leadership, help the farmers correct the leadership and get those who are better able to serve. All we are attempting to do is to pose the question: How can Montana improve its economic situation? How can any State improve its economic situation? How can all the States improve their economic situation? There can be only one way, and that's through organized, intelligent effort; through study, debate, concluded judgment, and backing leadership to represent that judgment, and furnishing funds to carry on the work. That's just all there is to it. You will live or decay, as you meet that proposition.

Now, let's analyze that a little further. Net earnings from our cooperative institutions are used for just two purposes, and those are, to expand the usefulness of cooperative distribution on the one hand, and to use some of the earnings to carry on our educational and legislative work to improve the economic conditions of all. We covered this in our address last year. We mentioned the portending things that were hanging over us. There is no need to repeat it here, but the fears we expressed in our appearance before you a year ago are now realities, and we are threatened with a new type of ideology, just as we discussed it a year ago.

Now, let's review the year's work. This is the time we give an accounting of our year's work. Last year this convention of the Farmers Union of Montana adopted specific resolutions to guide the work for the ensuing year. Other Farmers Union States did the same thing, and, finally, the National Farmers Union, in its annual convention, adopted resolutions to guide its work for the ensuing year. It is those adopted programs of a year ago which directed our work during the year. Now, let's quickly review the high spots of that program you adopted a year ago and let's account for what has been done about it. Your organized folks did the only thing that can be done. First, you paid your dues, and then as you worked through your locals and counties you came up finally to your State convention a year ago. There you adopted your program. Then you folks contributed your pennies and your nickels and your dimes to a legislative fund, and our local cooperative associations over the Northwest contributed their dollars, and then our business activities, with headquarters at St. Paul, contributed their large sums, and out of it all we had a working force working on a definite program, and the funds with which to carry on the work; and that's the way we get things done.

So, again repeating, let's account for your orders as to what you wanted done. Now, you people of the radio audience, please be patient with us and follow a 13-point program adopted by the farmers of your State a year ago and which we have worked on during the past year, and let's see what's been done about it.

No. 1. Continued relief payments until required corrections are effectuated: Well, it took a great deal of hard work and a lot of money to get the appropriation for the Farm Security Administration to continue its good work. The lower House of Congress was very niggardly about this, but we fought it out in the Senate and in the end won our fight for the full appropriation, and that was an amount of many millions of dollars in excess of the Government's projected Budget. So we completely won on point No. 1. That means that during the past year, and during the coming year, thousands of farm families in the State of Montana without funds will continue to receive help from the Federal Government, and they will take that money down on Main Street and buy food and clothing, medical supplies, etc. Main Street, as well as the farmers, should rejoice over this. Some of that money even gets into the State treasury and helps carry some of the tax load that otherwise would be imposed on the more fortunate farmers who still can pay taxes.

No. 2. Debt adjustment based on ability to pay: As you well know, I was designated by the National Board of the Farmers Union to act as chairman of a committee to deal with this question, and I was ably assisted by our North Dakota president, Mr. Glenn J. Talbott, and Mr. K. W. Hones, president of the Farmers Union of Wisconsin. It was not long after this job had been committed to our committee that our debt-adjustment bill was introduced in the Congress of the United States, known as Senate bill No. 2549, by Senator BURTON K. WHEELER. Of course, there was a great deal of work incident to the preparation of this bill and, of course, we had our 4 years of debt-adjustment work to fall back on as a basis for preparing the bill. There have been no hearings on that bill as yet, but oh, what has happened since? Shortly before Congress adjourned and while the Senate was considering Senate bill No. 2864, generally and better known as the spending-lending bill, we stopped in to see Senator WHEELER and submitted to him an amendment to be offered in connection with that huge financing bill. This amendment is known as farm-mortgage refinancing and it became section No. 21 of that bill. Senator LA FOLLETTE of Wisconsin joined with Senator WHEELER, and our bill, by amendment, became known as the Wheeler-La Follette amendment. Senator SHIPSTEAD made a real contribution in connection with this same important amendment.

To simply state it so that you will understand it, it provided over a billion dollars as a revolving fund to go to the rescue of farmers who were losing their farms by foreclosure, or were in imminent danger of such loss because of their failure to pay taxes, interest, and principal, and for which they had no money available. The Senate engaged in long debate on this subject and they really painted the picture on the floor of the Senate to the full satisfaction of ourselves, and when the debate was ended and the vicious processes of foreclosure were fully made known, the United States Senate, by a vote of 74 to 8, adopted the substance of our program for farm-debt adjustment.

The Senate finally passed the whole bill, and it went over to the lower House of Congress, and over there the Banking and Currency Committee unanimously approved our program. The House of Representatives never acted on the big bill because of the chicanery of handling legislation in the House, and simply stated the big, powerful Rules Committee refused to give a rule to permit the bill to come out on the floor of the House for discussion, and, to put it in very simple terms, that meant murder. But a very interesting and happy sequence follows that successful effort of ours through the United States Senate. Not long ago Governor Hill of the Farm Credit Administration put out a release, which amounts to a temporary moratorium, which has stopped Federal farm mortgage foreclosures in the United States. They have just quit foreclosing on Federal Land Bank farm mortgages. I think that's the outstanding contribution that has been made by the Farmers Union in all its history. I think the No. 1 job of the Farmers Union is to battle until we are successful in creating and gaining, by action of the Federal Government, a brand-new philosophy of agricultural credit. I think it is the job of the Farmers Union, and it is my personal determination as chairman of your debt adjustment committee, to try to successfully lead in this fight to provide that a farmer's inability to pay his debt to the Federal Government because of crop failure, or price failure, can no longer be used as a basis for a mortgage foreclosure; that when confronted by uncontrollable and unfavorable circumstances, the farm family can live at home and not be forced into the middle of the road, headed for hopelessness and despair.

I think the No. 1 job of the Farmers Union is to protect the farmer in his little castle. That must be his kingdom and that's where he must have his queen and his princes and princesses. There can be no satisfied and contented people unless the Government, with its power to tax and get money with which to protect, declares that honest, industrious people shall be protected in their homes when their inability to pay arises because of lack of opportunity to work, lack of crops, or lack of prices. That must be the first line of defense for democracy. The first trench to dig is home security for honest, industrious people. That must be the No. 1 job of the Farmers Union. I accepted it as my No. 1 legislative job, to fight for such an agricultural credit philosophy until it becomes the law and the understanding and the will of the Nation. If we can be protected in our homes, we will in some way be able to eke out food and clothes to keep the wife and the brood together. But we can't do it by being dumped out in the road or in the middle of Main Street. The policy of the national administration up to date has been to protect the man who bought the mortgage bonds, almost at all costs, and to let the farm family take their chance and unhappiness out of such a policy. That is unendurable. It is unbearable. It cannot last. It must be stopped. It must be replaced by the philosophy of protecting people who are doing their best to meet their debts.

I firmly believe that with the record we have made in Congress and with the present attitude of the Farm Credit Administration, as expressed by their moratorium on debt foreclosures, and with the sympathetic attitude of the Secretary of Agriculture, who now is responsible for the Farm Credit Administration, that we will be, within the next year or two, successful in attaining this goal for protecting our honest farmers in a program that will provide their security in their home. When that day shall have arrived, we shall have a more contented farm people; there will be less suicides; there will be less broken hearts; and there will be more security in the Nation.

No. 3. Cooperative distribution of farm products: We have gained the sympathetic consideration of the Farm Security Administration and the Farm Credit Administration, and, as most of you know, we have really established the Farmers Union Grain Terminal Association as the largest cooperative grain marketing organization in the United States, a very successful institution, a rapidly growing institution. During the past year we set up 75 new cooperative elevator associations, affiliated with the Farmers Union Grain Terminal Association. Beginning on June 1, 1938, and up to September 30 of this year, we took the Farmers Union Grain Terminal Association from zero to a net worth today in excess of $600,000. We couldn't have hoped to have done that without first the approval of the President, which we got, the approval of Secretary Wallace, the support of the Department of Agriculture, particularly the Farm Security Administration, and the very generous treatment that we have received from the Farm Credit Administration. I want to state here that the Central Bank for Cooperatives, a branch of the Farm Credit Administration, at Washington, D. C., has given us every cooperation and financial assistance that any Farmers Union member could hope for.

To illustrate, very recently when the demands were heavy upon us in facilitating the wheat-loan program, we needed a very substantial amount of additional unsecured capital, and, by telephone, they thought enough of our operations and our management to give us an additional $500,000 without any security and at a low rate of interest. You will also be glad to know, in this direction, that our net earnings in our first 16 months of operation have now passed the quarter million mark; that is, in excess of $250,000. That isn't for privateers' trips to Europe, Florida, or California; it is to expand the cooperative movement and to carry on our national legislative work.

You will also be glad to know that the Farm Security Administration approved for another year a continuance of our development of cooperative elevator associations here in the spring-wheat area. What we secured for ourselves from the Federal Government we secured for other regional cooperative grain-marketing associations. You will also be glad to know that last February we federated these regional cooperative marketing organizations in the West into what is now known as the National Federation of Grain Cooperatives. We have the pleasure, as president, to represent them and are authorized by them to cooperate with our National Farmers' Union, our Northwest Farmers Union legislative committee, and our wheat conservation conference. You will also be glad to know that all of these regional grain cooperatives are now operating very successfully and are expanding their membership at a rapid pace.

No. 4. Minimum futures price at fair exchange value below which no one may trade in futures: We have not gained our attainment on that No. 4 problem, but you are all aware of the fact that the loan program has held the future prices anywhere from 30 to 40 cents a bushel higher for wheat than prices would have been without the loan program. Put it another way: With the huge wheat surplus as a part of the world market our prices have run 30 to 40 cents above what we would have received in shipping our wheat under the old system, dependent upon the Liverpool price.

No. 5. Processing taxes to provide funds for benefit payments to equalize parity income: Well, you are all familiar with our wheat income certificate bill, known as Senate bill No. 2395, that meets this problem in a very realistic and practical way. That has been introduced by Senator WHEELER, and we have had our first hearings on it. We will prosecute that legislation in the next session of Congress, and we will do all we can to secure its favorable passage. Secretary Wallace is behind it, and I am glad to state that Senator

RUSSELL, from Georgia, has introduced the same type of bill for cotton. The same type has already been introduced by Senator ELLENDER, of Louisiana, for rice. The millers are deadly against our bill. If, as, and when our wheat income certificate bill is passed, we shall have little use for some of the Federal farm programs now in operation, and it will put an end to calling upon the Federal Treasury for many hundreds of millions of dollars a year which is now being appropriated as a subsidy to agriculture.

No. 6. Continuation of present use of custom receipts to relieve market of burdensome surpluses: In that we have not only been successful but we participated in a program to increase the amount by $113,000,000, and after a real fight, in which we spent a lot of money, we were able to see it come through the Congress and the appropriation made available. As the result of this large appropriation, we now have what is known as the "stamp plan." That simply means that the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, with the large amount of money available to it, is furnishing food stamps to relief people and needy people so that they can buy twice as much with these stamps as they otherwise could buy with money, and the things that they may buy are listed as surplus farm commodities. We, therefore, now have unfortunate people eating bread, biscuits, butter, milk, cheese, fruits, vegetables, etc., that they otherwise could not have bought, and which, of course, otherwise the farmers couldn't have sold nor the stores handled. Fortunately, this is having the general approval of the Nation and particularly the Congress and the stores on Main Street. You will also be interested in knowing that, based on the additional consumption in cities where this "stamp plan" is now being used, if all the cities and towns in the United States were enjoying the "stamp plan" system of getting rid of surpluses, our present farm output could not supply the total products required. To put it another way, there is such a tremendous underconsumption in this country that if it were properly met in furnishing all families just a reasonable diet that they should have it would take more than the present output of all the acres in the United States under cultivation. Maybe we have something there. Maybe we have found something more important than many of us first thought. You will read more about this from articles in our Herald.

No. 7. Soil-conservation practices: We received an appropriation again for $500,000,000 for this character of work in our total program. Of course, this program will be improved as time goes on. One important improvement that we secured during the year to help you people out on your acreage for the soil-conservation program is in connection with flaxseed. As you now know, we were able to get flaxseed taken out of the list of soil-depleting crops, and thus, under certain conditions, permit you to put to use more of your acres in the production of flaxseed. This added thousands of acres to flaxseed production and brought a tremendous additional income to the farmers of the Northwest. Everybody ought to let us take a bow on that one.

No. 8. Adjustment of acreage to yield domestic and worth-while world requirements: This simply means an adjustment of production and distribution to lift prices. Of course, everyone knows that we are working on that and the National Government is working on that.

No. 9. Ever-normal granary in control of producers and Federal Government. We have that in full force.

No. 10. Exports in control of producers and Federal Government: Nobody would question that we have that in full operation.

No. 11. Marketing quotas to protect cooperators and punish noncooperators: That's being applied in many industries, notably in milk, vegetables, nuts, etc. It has been applied in tobacco, and the tobacco people have just now put it into use again. In the forepart of our statement, we pointed out the pitiful plight of the tobacco growers. Just this week they voted to again invoke the quota system to protect them in the supply of their production and the price thereof for the next year.

No. 12. Credit to bankrupt farmers to aid them in taking out first-year crop insurance: We got our bill through in March of this year to meet that problem, which simply means, as you all know, that the Secretary of Agriculture, through the A. A. A., loans the money without interest to the farmers to pay their premium on crop insurance. We got it in time for this last spring-wheat crop and, as a result, North Dakota became the No. 1 State in crop insurance in the entire United States. The Southwest winter-wheat growers certainly went for it this fall, with a bigger sign-up than ever, and 85 percent of those payments for crop-insurance premiums in the Southwest this fall were made on the basis of this credit from the Triple A. The Farmers' Union certainly can look upon that as a signal victory and a part of its year's work. Now, I know the Farmers' Union did it, because I handled the legislation in Washington that brought this program about. No other farm organization in the United States had anything to do with it. Senator Wheeler handled this bill for us and, with his usual diligence and skill, put it through the Senate.

And now, really, ladies and gentlemen of Montana and the United States, let the Farmers' Union take a real bow for making credit available to farmers to enable them to pay their crop-insurance premiums, which meant the taking care of something over 40,000 farmers in the spring-wheat area this year. Now, let's see what it is doing this fall for the winter-wheat farmers. Last year we had 170,000 wheat farmers participate in crop insurance. We now have 270,000, all in the area where winter wheat is produced, who have taken out crop insurance. It covers 7,500,000 acres; it has put 10,000,000 bushels of wheat away in store, in reserve; and means that these 270,000 farmers are guaranteed a crop next year of over 70,000,000 bushels, let come what may. No, 85 percent of all these 270,000 farmers took advantage of our crop-insurance-credit bill. That is to say, our bill enabled them to borrow against their future Soil Conservation payments and, without any interest, the money with which to pay for their crop-insurance policies. Putting it another way, 230,000 farmers have already taken out loans against future Triple A payments with which to insure themselves against crop loss in 1940. When the spring-wheat farmers come into the program next spring, it is likely we will have considerably in excess of 300,000 wheat farmers in the United States in the wheat-crop-insurance program.

Sure, it isn't all you want of it, but the poor kid is only a year old. Let's treat it halfway right until it gets on long pants. It is one of the real, fundamental laws that have been passed by Congress. We confidently believe that the Congress is going to put cotton under crop insurance at the next regular session of Congress. When the day comes that wheat and cotton have crop insurance, we then will have a bloc formed in Congress that will keep crop insurance for posterity.

No. 13. Commodity Credit Corporation controlled within the Department of Agriculture: Well, we certainly worked hard on that one and on the first reorganization order put out by the President within his powers under the reorganization bill passed by the Congress this year the President transferred from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Department of Agriculture the Commodity Credit Corporation. The Farmers Union, at least, ought to be one of those who may stand up and take a bow for that accomplishment. As most of you know, it is the Commodity Credit Corporation that fixes the loan rate on your wheat and outlines the policies for making the loans. In that connection the Farmers Union also will take a bow for having gotten, in addition to the loan price, as much as 1 to 9 cents a bushel as consideration for protein content in your loan price this year for your bread wheat.

Now, we have discussed the 13 proposals that were passed upon and approved by your convention last year. We have met all 13. Some of them are entirely successful, some of them partially so, but every one of the 13 points have been hit on the nose. And in this connection we wish to discuss what we believe is a very important point. The common thing we hear over the country is that the Farmers Union takes credit for things which it had nothing, or little, to do with. There isn't a single thing in this discussion of these 13 points of your last year's legislative program which I have discussed but that is supported by the files of our organization in briefs, in explanations before committees, in letters, in telegrams, etc. We have given you an accurate account of our stewardship in connection with your work during this past year. If anyone doubts our statement, we suggest that he write to your senior Senator, Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

This convention will decide its course of action for the next year, and, of course, that will be our guide for our work. Now, in this connection, I want to take a few minutes to discuss the so-called Frazier-Lemke cost-of-production bill. Since the authors of this bill are both from the wheat country, we feel we should say something at this time. Both of these gentlemen are old friends of mine of long standing. There is no one in the United States Senate for whom I have more respect for his integrity than Senator FRAZIER. There is no office in Washington that has received us always more courteously or cordially than Senator FRAZIER'S and his staff. It has been very unfortunate that we have come into head-on collision with a piece of legislation in which he so thoroughly believes and for which he has so diligently worked. This situation has caused me some distress. But, after all, it is not Senator FRAZIER or Congressman LEMKE who are under discussion, it is their proposed legislation that has confronted us. Those of us in Farmers Union who have been delegated to represent you and to prosecute the programs adopted by you arrived at two points. One was that we believed the Frazier-Lemke bill, known as Senate bill No. 570, is thoroughly unworkable and would not serve the interests of agriculture, that mechanically it is impossible. The second point is that the bill is in conflict with the programs which the Farmers Union people adopted a year ago. We believe in the declaration of purpose of the bill and its objectives just as much as do the authors.

I am not going to take the time, because I have not the time, to discuss that bill in its entirety, but I would raise this question: How would it work now if it had become the law of the land, with the present world consumers about to be completely upset because of the war in Europe and the pending bill now before the present session of Congress? Now, let me explain that. The Frazier-Lemke cost-of-production bill provides that there should be a fixed price for all agricultural products, the value of which exceeds $10,000,000 annually. That would include fruits, nuts, vegetables, as well as the more staple basic agricultural commodities. Let us illustrate with wheat. The Frazier-Lemke bill would provide that the Secretary of Agriculture, upon hearing, etc., and following standards set down in the bill, would fix the domestic price of wheat for that portion to be domestically consumed. It is assumed that he could determine how much wheat would be consumed in the United States in the ensuing year. The surplus wheat would be turned over to the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary would then sell this wheat in the world's market for what it would bring, paying all of the expenses, and divide up what was left with the farmers as their share, according to the bushels which they had put into the surplus wheat pool.

That sounds all right, but there are a few things wrong with it. No one can make the consumers buy at a fixed price the quantity that the consumers of the country are supposed to use. The consumer decides for himself how much he will buy. The consumer also decides what grade of product he will buy—whether it is butter, eggs, cheese, potatoes, onions, or anything else. He will also decide whether he wants to buy a hen or a rooster, when he wants chickens. He'll also decide whether he wants a fat one or a thin one, and he won't let any Secretary of Agriculture tell him whether he is to buy a hen or a rooster, a fat one or a thin one, an old one or a young one.

Now, going back to wheat. Let's assume we have a surplus of 150,000,000 bushels, and the wheat farmers of this country are supposed to turn over that surplus to the Secretary of Agriculture and, thereafter, he is supposed to ship it to the world's markets for what it will bring. Well, Congress did not pass that bill, and while they were in adjournment, that little fellow with the little mustache carried dynamite over into Poland and started blowing up the people in that country. Then the navies in Europe got busy. Then the submarines got busy, and mines were placed in the waters, and then the different nations over there at war began to declare what commodities are contraband. Well, this made a pretty mess, and nobody in this country wants war; that is, the great majority of people do not want war.

The President called the Congress in special session to repeal the Arms Embargo Act and to stop all of our boats and people from going over into those European waters. Now, if the Frazier-Lemke bill had been passed last year, the Secretary could have determined by this time the cost-of-production price for the United States, and if the Secretary thereafter found that the farmers were turning over to him 100,000,000 or 150,000,000 bushels of surplus wheat, I now want to ask the question, What would the Secretary of Agriculture do with that 100,000,000 or 150,000,000 bushels of wheat? There is a chance Congress is going to put a ban on our ships carrying commodities into those European waters. England is one of our big outlets. How would Secretary Wallace get rid of 150,000,000 bushels of wheat? Whose boats would haul the wheat? What country would they take it to, and how much would we get for it?

There is a question as to how long we can export wheat to Japan and China. You know they are still cuffing each other around the ears. The plain truth is, that if the present session of Congress passes the proposed legislation, and it looks like they will, our foreign markets will all be blown to pieces and with it the Frazier-Lemke bill S. 570.

On the other hand, the present farm bills that we have are designed to meet all complications. I believe that the facilities now used under the Federal agricultural laws, which we have helped to pass, are serving the tobacco growers (who need help now) infinitely better than the so-called cost-of-production bill, S. 570, could have served them. Maybe I am wrong about this. If I am, I want to be put right. After all, it is not for me to make the decision. The problem is here in front of you; you are now here at the convention to discuss everything and anything. You have all had an opportunity to read the bill S. 570, the Frazier-Lemke cost-of-production bill. You have heard Mr. LEMKE and others discuss it over the radio. You have heard them discuss it from the platform. You have read their reports, properly sent out under their franking privileges. You really have received a lot of stuff. I think everything has been done to give you full information about the Frazier-Lemke bill S. 570. It is not for me to decide what you should do about it. That's for you to decide. Both of these men have long been my friends. I have long been their friend. There is nothing I should like better than to be able to work with all of our wheat Senators and Representatives at all times. If you believe bill S. 570 will best serve the needs of agriculture, this is the place to approve it. If you think it needs amendment to make it work, then suggest the amendments, but let's get the record clear here and now. This is your responsibility and not the responsibility of your hired men.

None of you people are traitors to American agriculture. None of your representatives have stabbed agriculture in the back. We have carried on the work which you prescribed for us. If you want that changed, this is your golden opportunity to do whatever you want and outline the work for your hired men for the next year. This cost-of-production bill, known as S. 570, has been on the Senate calendar for months. If 23 Senators are sponsoring that bill, why don't they ask for it to be made the order of business before the Senate? I know something about that show down there and I know that 23 Senators can bring any bill on the Senate calendar before the Senate as the present order of business and keep it before the Senate until it is debated and voted upon. We haven't kept the Senate from considering that bill and voting upon it. The Senators themselves are responsible for that. It is hard to believe that 23 Senators want it and still do not see that it is debated. The charge that the Farmers' Union is keeping that bill from consideration in the Senate is just horseradish. The way to get it before the House of Representatives is to get the Senate to pass it and then it will go over to the House for consideration.

Since the matter is on the doorstep of the Senate, I wish the Farmers Union in this State and other States, and the national convention, would pass a resolution stating that if, as, and when the Senate considers the bill S. 570, and if, as, and when it may pass it and it goes over to the House, that your representatives do everything they can to get the House of Representatives to bring it before the House for debate and vote.

I am taking more time on this matter than I expected, but I want the record clear and honest and so that we can stop others from making false statements about our position. So far as I am personally concerned, it is in your hands and the hands of the other States and the National Farmers Union. The responsibility that your representatives have is for the brief which we compiled and filed with the Members of Congress, stating why we opposed it. Wasn't that our responsibility? Wasn't that our duty, and isn't that the honest, democratic process in which we are all supposed to work? Please let's clear the air while we now have the opportunity and thus put an end to false statements, implications, and innuendoes that have been going out during the past months—statements which implied that we are traitors or crooks or have been bought off by the United States Department of Agriculture.

I know only that I have never received a 5-cent piece from the United States Department of Agriculture for services or expenses; that I have not even seen in all my life a check issued by the United States Department of Agriculture—not even a wheat benefit check. Any statement to the contrary is based on inaccurate information to the party making the statement, or that party has deliberately lied.

As having concluded a statement with reference to some of our work for the year and accounting for the manner in which we have handled the program which you adopted last year, may we suggest proposals for your consideration as to some legislative work which we should consider for the next year?

We urge the following to be considered as part of your program for the next year:

1. Support of the wheat income certificate bill, to give parity income to wheat farmers, based on cost of production or parity prices, whichever is higher. Senator WHEELER has introduced this bill.

2. Readjustment of the farmers' debts, accompanied by variable payments, which will provide him an opportunity to pay according to his ability. Senator WHEELER has introduced this bill.

3. An amendment to crop insurance, to provide that the first 75 percent of the crop loss will be insured, rather than imposing the first 25 percent of the loss on the farmer. Senator WHEELER has introduced this bill.

4. A vigorous effort to expand the usefulness of the cooperative movement.

5. An expansion of the usefulness of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation through increased appropriations, so that it may continue to carry more and more of the surplus agricultural products to those who need them and are unable to buy them.

6. Additional appropriations for Farm Security Administration for the expansion of the usefulness of the Farm Security Administration in taking care of farmers in need and to provide rehabilitation loans at low rate of interest, to sustain farmers in an effort to get them back on an independent basis.

In conclusion, we wish to again emphasize the forces that have been working, to procure the changes so needed by the people of Montana and the other States. As during the past year, that work will be carried on by the Farmers Union and its cooperative business institutions. Now, in connection with cooperative business institutions, I believe some work has to be done by the producers in the Nation. Unfortunately, most cooperative institutions are particularly engaged in building their business, strengthening their balance sheet, increasing net earnings, and insulating the management against loss of jobs, etc. There can't be very much value to a cooperative institution whose only interest is in its own balance sheet and net profits. The very life of a cooperative is dependent upon the secure condition of its patrons.

Speaking for the Farmers Union Grain Terminal Association, there could be no interest to the management of that organization if its first interest weren't dedicated to the security of the farmers who patronize the local cooperative elevator, which, in turn, patronizes the terminal marketing association. Further, why will farmers patronize country elevators or commission merchants who are either neutral on the problems we have discussed, or who have done nothing about them, or who are opposed to them? To those of you who believe in the work we have done and the work we will do, you can make your contribution by joining the Farmers Union and paying a penny a day for your dues, and by shipping your grain and livestock to our regional marketing houses, the Farmers Union Grain Terminal Association and the Farmers Union Livestock Commission Co., and patronizing the cooperative bulk-oil stations all over the Northwest, which are affiliated with the Farmers Union Central Exchange. Also, ship your turkeys to our Great Northern turkey cooperatives.

It takes money to do the job we are doing and it all rests upon patronage. The more patronage we get, the larger we will build our cooperative institutions in the country and at the market places; the larger will become our financial resources; the greater will be the service that we can render to you; and the more men and money we will have to prosecute State and National programs in the interest of the farmers, the businessmen, professional men, and all. As our farmers' income increases, so will their purchasing power increase; as their purchasing power increases, so will employment increase; as employment increases, so will there be further purchasing of farm products. The spiral can go either up or down, it all depends upon the intelligence of the people, the understanding of the people, the willingness of the people to cooperate and do something about it. As they join our organization, as they support our cooperatives, we are thus better able to prosecute the programs for the benefit of agriculture. So will the benefit come to the business people, the professional people, and the laboring people. It is so simple; it is so reasonable; it is so realistic; it is so truthful; it is so essential; it staggers one in his attempt to try to reason and to understand why the people of the towns and the country fail to shake out of their sleep and go to work on the problems which, of necessity, are the problems of every one of us.

Then again, may we refer to who's who? Tell me the independent elevator man; tell me the "line elevator" man; tell me the private commission merchant; tell me the private oil company or the local livestock buyer; tell me any of these groups who are amongst us who are turning hand or putting up a dollar in connection with the most important work that is before the Nation today. In all fairness and honesty, about all that can be said for those who do not belong and cooperate in our efforts is that every 2 or 4 years they somehow get up enough energy to go to the polls and vote for a Democrat or a Republican that they even didn't have any choice in selecting. They vote for people running for office and try to make some money, and that constitutes their total contribution in preserving and building a democracy. That's not enough. We went broke under that system. It wouldn't work. They all must change and do it a better way.

We have outlined our program. We have explained our experience. We have told what we have done about it and we now ask all farmers, and business people, and professional men of this State to join hands with us and support us. Again repeating, if we are wrong, tell us where we are wrong so we can study your suggestions for corrections. Don't fight us; don't be neutral—help us. Our Nation is worth it. Our farmers are worth it. We give you all this for whatever you may think of it; however, in the future you may apply it in Montana. We give it to you for what it is, all there is, and we are proud of it—the Farmers Union and its cooperative business institutions.

Thank you.

Mr. Broun and Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, October 31, 1939

ARTICLE BY HEYWOOD BROUN

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Heywood Broun denying the charge of communism made concerning him before the Dies Committee.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IT SEEMS TO ME

(By Heywood Broun)

I wish to arise to a question of personal privilege, but in part the subject does lie in the domain of public interest. Once upon a time it was a general newspaper practice to give a man a chance to reply when some damaging charge was made against him. Now it seems increasingly customary to shoot the yarn out and let the injured party try to catch up under his own steam. And once a story has a start of 12 or 20 hours a denial has to be extremely agile ever to catch up with it.

On Saturday a man named Joseph Zack told the Dies committee that I had been a member of the Communist Party for 2 years. He said I joined in 1928. Out goes the story over press association wires and into the columns of the newspapers by which I am directly employed. The New York Times was the only paper with sufficient courtesy and devotion to good journalistic practices to call up and ask what I wanted to reply. I have never seen or heard of Zack to the best of my knowledge and belief, and I doubt whether he is familiar by name or reputation to any city editor or managing editor.

On several occasions I have stated that I have never been a Communist. And something over a year ago I testified to this fact before the Dies committee. Now I am neither a liar nor a perjurer. I have been in the newspaper business continuously for more than 31 years. And so it makes me good and sore when some unidentified stranger can get up and take a crack at me without any newspaper offering me a chance to reply before publication. I realize that Stamford is a 30-cent phone call. It makes me particularly sore when the paper for which I work does a thing like that to me. And I also say it's bad newspaper work, because it is a matter of not particularly obscure record that during the time Zack assigns me to membership in the Communist Party I ran for Congress on the Socialist ticket and took a pretty thorough shellacking in the columns of The Daily Worker, which always referred to me as Hey Gin Broun. And The Worker also carried some excellent cartoons in which I appeared in a perambulator being wheeled around by Norman Thomas.

I am not arguing right now about political or economic interpretation of this or that. Or "radical" or "liberal." I simply state again for the tenth and, I hope, the final time that I have never been a member of the Communist Party for 2 years or 2 minutes. And that, I think, is enough or maybe too much of personal note. However, there is a public stake in such matters. A single item can do enormous damage to persons far more important and infinitely more virtuous than myself. I know enough of the time element in the making of a newspaper to realize that there are situations in which it is not possible to get both sides of a story immediately. But even if the story can't wait there ought to be an obligation to set forth the fact that the party of the second part has not yet had a chance to say his say. It isn't a question of redress. It's a question of fair play at the beginning. Libel suits are no good in circumstances where they may seem to be warranted. That's a sucker's game in the first place, and the practice might be abused into constituting an actual threat to free press. There used to be a day when indignant citizens stormed into newspaper offices with horsewhips, but even up here in rural Connecticut it's years since I've seen a horsewhip. Additionally I might, on occasion, find myself on the wrong end of the whip. And punching people in the nose never gets you very much after you have turned 50. I guess I'll just have to take it out by saying in this single column that I'm good and sore, and that I'm going to continue that way. When I swear that a thing isn't true, then no newspaper and no prattling Zack can pin it on me. I won't go for it. After all, I've saved up $84, there are bullheads in the pond behind the house and the woods abound with edible roots and wild berries.

The Proposed Reciprocal Trade Agreement With Chile

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED BRADLEY
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, October 31, 1939

LETTERS FROM WALTER F. GRIES, CHAIRMAN OF THE SOCIAL WELFARE COMMISSION OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that the Department of State is contemplating the drawing up of a reciprocal-trade agreement with Chile which may vitally affect two products of importance in my district and seriously affect the employment conditions prevalent in the industries producing both of these commodities.

In view of the fact that I feel the same commodities might likewise be adversely affected in other districts of the country, I feel it advisable to extend in the RECORD at this time two communications which have come to me from Mr. Walter F. Gries, chairman of the Social Welfare Commission of the State of Michigan. I have previously called these communications to the attention of the Secretary of State and sincerely hope that the State Department will give due consideration to the possible deleterious effects on the employment situation in our State before consummating the proposed agreement with Chile.

The letters above referred to are hereby extended in these brief remarks:

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
SOCIAL WELFARE COMMISSION,
Lansing, October 17, 1939.

The Honorable FRED BRADLEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The following item appearing in "Steel" magazine, dated October 9, on the subject of a reciprocal-trade agreement with Chile which may affect copper, is brought to your attention, since such an agreement would tend to have a direct bearing on the relief burden in the State of Michigan:

"State department has announced it intends to negotiate a reciprocal-trade agreement with Chile. November 11 will be the closing date for the submission of briefs and also for hearing applications. Public hearings will be November 27.

"Included in the list of products on which the United States will consider granting concessions to Chile is iron ore, including manganiferous iron ore which is on the free list. Under the Trade Agreement Act no commodity can be changed that is on the free list other than to freeze the commodity on the free list. Copper ore is another article which the Department will consider, but this is also on the free list, subject, however, to an import tax of 4 cents a pound of copper content. Copper-bearing ores and concentrates are dutiable at 4 cents a pound on the copper contained and these also will be considered when the trade agreement is considered."

In view of the information we have received from various sources permit us to point out to you several facts:

1. Chile is now producing copper at a much higher rate of its estimated capacity than is the United States.

2. Chile is now marketing its huge output of copper and does not need any help in this direction.

3. Chile's cost of producing copper is about 4 cents per pound lower than in the United States, but Chile has kept the price of its copper up to our domestic price and occasionally at a higher level. This does not promise cheap copper to the American consumer.

4. Opening our ports to foreign copper definitely means the closing of many mines in this country. These mines are 100-percent employers of American labor and consumers of domestic merchandise.

5. The closing of American copper mines will place an intolerable burden on the relief agencies of our several States who even now are unable to meet the present demands.

6. Copper is an indispensable commodity in peace as well as war, and the copper-mining industry of the United States, which already is handicapped by leaner ore bodies and high-cost labor, should not be further jeopardized by any favoritism to foreign powers.

Inasmuch as the consequences of the inclusion of copper in the trade agreement with Chile would have a direct effect on the relief problem in the State of Michigan, we wish to urge that you go on record as being opposed to such action by the State Department or by Congress, and to urge that no reciprocal agreement be made with Chile which may disturb our present import tax of 4 cents a pound on copper in its various forms.

Your cooperation, we feel sure, would be very helpful in reducing the relief burden in this State.

Very sincerely yours,

MICHIGAN SOCIAL WELFARE COMMISSION,
By WALTER F. GRIES,
LOUIS C. MIRIANI,
CARLTON H. RUNCIMAN,
L. G. CHRISTIAN,
M. CLYDE STOUT,
Commissioners.

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
SOCIAL WELFARE COMMISSION,
Lansing, October 27, 1939.

The Honorable FRED BRADLEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We have been informed that the Federal Department of State is about to negotiate a reciprocal-trade agreement with Chile, and that one of the items on which it is considering granting a tariff concession is dried beans. Since such an agreement would tend to have a direct bearing on the relief burden in the State of Michigan, permit us to submit the following facts which we have received from a source we consider reliable:

1. The production of dried beans is one of the many large industries in Michigan, employing many people whose livelihood depends upon the producing, processing, and marketing of dried beans.

2. Practically all varieties of beans produced in Chile are similar to the varieties produced in Michigan, and, when imported into the United States directly, compete with Michigan beans, and thus adversely affect the price paid Michigan producers.

3. The production of beans in Michigan for the past several seasons has been equal to, and in some years, particularly the past two seasons, greater than domestic consumption.

4. For the past two seasons the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation has made large purchases of Michigan beans for relief purposes. The past season these purchases approximated 536,000 bags of 100 pounds each.

5. In spite of these purchases, the carry-over of Michigan beans for 1939 is estimated to be at least 500,000 such bags.

6. Another crop has just been harvested, which is estimated by the United States Department of Agriculture at 4,205,000 bags, whereas for the past 10 years the average yearly consumption, seed requirements, etc., of Michigan is estimated at about 3,700,000 bags, with the result that prices are far below the cost of production, and to lower the duty would, we fear, make permanent the unfortunate plight of producers and their employees in one of Michigan's principal cash crops.

Inasmuch as the consequences of the inclusion of dried beans in a tariff concession with Chile would have a direct effect on employment in Michigan and therefore upon the relief problem, we wish to urge that you go on record as being opposed to such action by the State Department or by Congress, and to urge that no reciprocal agreement be made with Chile which may disturb our present import duties on dried beans.

Your cooperation in this matter, we feel sure, would be very helpful in reducing the relief burden in this State.

Very sincerely yours,

MICHIGAN SOCIAL WELFARE COMMISSION,
By WALTER F. GRIES, Chairman.

New England Light and Power Rates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 30, 1939

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, sometime ago Mr. Samuel Ferguson, president of the Hartford Electric Light Co., of Hartford, Conn., spoke to the people of New England over the radio on the subject of Federal control of electric utilities. In that address he attacked public ownership of power facilities, especially the Tennessee Valley Authority and its yardstick rates, and finally wound up by referring to me and what he called "Congressman RANKIN'S absurd statements" concerning the overcharges in electric light and power rates in New England. I shall answer Mr. Ferguson on those points at this time.

Electricity is now one of the necessities of our modern life and it must necessarily be handled by a monopoly since it would be too expensive for two, three, or more different agencies to attempt to supply electricity to the same community. Therefore, since it is a monopoly of a necessity of life, it is necessarily a public business and one in which the Federal Government or the municipality has the right to engage—and especially when handling public power generated by the waters of a navigable stream.

Why should a great private monopoly with its inflated valuations and watered stocks stand between the people of New England, or any other section of the country, and their own water power, and exact tribute of millions of dollars annually to provide exorbitant profits to the favored few, or to pay dividends on watered stocks?

According to the T. V. A. rates the people of the six New England States were overcharged for electric lights and power last year $83,348,791.

The enemies of public power would have you believe that these overcharges were absorbed by the taxes paid by the private power interests, when as a matter of fact the T. V. A. pays 5 percent of its gross revenues in lieu of taxes, and practically every municipality that distributes T. V. A. power pays into the city treasury in lieu of taxes an amount equal to, if not exceeding, that paid by any private power company in any municipality of the same size.

But even if the T. V. A. and its distributing agencies paid no taxes at all, the argument of the private utilities would fall flat, for the record shows that all the private power interests operating in the New England States in 1936—according to the 1935–37 report of the Federal Power Commission on rates, taxes, and consumer savings—paid in taxes of all kinds, including State, Federal, and municipal, and even income taxes, together with all cash contributions and free services, only $26,476,619; which amount taken from last year's overcharges of $83,348,791 would still leave a net balance of $56,872,172 in overcharges paid by the power consumers in New England last year—according to the T. V. A. rates—and for which they received absolutely nothing in return.

In the State of Connecticut alone the overcharges last year, according to the T. V. A. rates, amounted to $17,605,938, and the taxes paid by the private power interests in 1936, including State, Federal, county, and municipal taxes, together with all cash contributions and free services, amounted, all told, to only $4,821,124. Even if we give T. V. A. and its distributing agencies credit for no taxes at all, this would still leave an unquestioned net overcharge of $12,784,814, for which the people of Connecticut received absolutely nothing in return.

Let us hear Mr. Ferguson explain that overcharge away.

Private power interests in Connecticut paid in taxes, cash contributions, and free services only 11.8 percent of their gross revenues in 1936 while public power systems in Connecticut paid 29.1 percent of their gross revenues in taxes, cash contributions, and free services.

I would like for Mr. Ferguson to explain that difference.

Power generated by the Tennessee Valley Authority is sold at wholesale to the municipalities and cooperative associations within the distribution radius, and they in turn sell it to the ultimate consumers at the yardstick rates, or at rates based upon the cost of generation, transmission, and distribution.

At the rate they are going, the Tennessee Valley Authority will pay out and return to the Federal Treasury every dollar of investment in the T. V. A. within the next 30 years.

If they had a New England Power Authority similar to the T. V. A. or the Ontario power system, generating and distributing the power in their navigable streams and their tributaries and delivering it to the consumers at the Ontario rates, the people in the New England States would have saved $93,555,986 last year on their light and power bills. Take from that $26,476,619, the amount paid by private power interests in New England in taxes, cash contributions, and free services, and you will still have a net overcharge of $67,081,367, according to the Ontario rates.

Last year the people of Connecticut used 1,284,372,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity, for which they paid $38,986,091. Under the Ontario rates the cost would have been $18,725,507, or a savings to the people of Connecticut alone of $20,260,584. Take from that the $4,821,124 paid in taxes, cash contributions and free services, and it will leave an overcharge paid by the people of Connecticut last year, according to the Ontario rates, of $15,439,460, for which they got nothing in return.

I should like to hear Mr. Ferguson explain that overcharge.

Last year the people of Maine were overcharged $5,333,122, according to the Ontario rates, after deducting all taxes, cash contributions, and free services paid by the private power companies; the people of Massachusetts were overcharged $34,437,504 after deducting the amount paid by private power companies in taxes, cash contributions, and free services. The net overcharges in New Hamphsire amounted to $3,267,155; in Rhode Island, $3,412,850; and in Vermont, $2,926,019.

How can the people of New England continue to stagger under this stupendous burden of overcharges, amounting to more than $67,000,000 a year, after all taxes, free services, and cash contributions are deducted?

Probably Mr. Ferguson can answer that question.

These overcharges are simply a tax levied upon the consumers by this great utilities supergovernment which has been described as a utility fascisti, that now seems to control the economic life, if not the political destinies, of New England.

The Ontario Power System has an investment of about $400,000,000. It generates and distributes about one-twelfth the amount of electricity generated and distributed by private power companies in the United States. Therefore, the private power interests in this country should have an investment of not more than 12 times that of the Ontario power system, or about $4,800,000,000.

Yet they claim an investment of $13,000,000,000, or $8,200,000,000 more than is necessary. What does that $8,200,000,000 represent except watered stocks and inflated valuations?

Let Mr. Ferguson answer that question.

What they need is a New England power authority to develop their own water power, their last great natural resource, and distribute it at the yardstick rates, in order to lift this enormous burden from the shoulders of the power consumers of the New England States.

I have no personal interest in this controversy. I am not a candidate for any national office, and therefore there is nothing the people of New England can ever do for me. But I have my heart set on saving the water power of this Nation for the American people and providing electricity for every home and every business establishment throughout the Nation at reasonable rates.

I have done this for the people of my home district, and I expect to keep up the fight as long as I am in public life, or until we get electricity supplied to every consumer at rates based upon the cost of generation, transmission, and distribution, and to every farm home in America at these rates.

I hope to marshal behind this cause the moral support of the 25,000,000 electric consumers throughout the Nation who are now paying an annual overcharge for electricity of more than $1,000,000,000 a year.

This is going to be one of the leading issues from now on until the power consumers of America receive justice in the rates they have to pay.

This will mean more to the people of New England than anything else that could be accomplished during your day and mine. New England has no coal, no gas, no oil, and her timber supply is vanishing. Her only chance to secure electricity generated with her own resources is the development of her water power; and the only chance they have to get this power, at reasonable rates, or at rates based upon the cost of production and distribution, is through some form of public operation such as the T. V. A. or the Ontario power system.

The only way for private power interests to head off this movement, even in conservative New England, is to squeeze the water out of their stocks, eliminate the inflated valuations from their books, and reduce their rates at least to the rates now charged in the T. V. A. area, and then gradually adjust them downward as time goes on.

We are in this fight to a finish and are not going to let up until we bring these rates to every electric consumer in America—from Maine to Mexico.

One Hundred Percent Protection Against Competitive Imports Produced by Alien Peons and Foreign Sweatshops

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE AMERICAN GOOD GOVERNMENT REVIEW FOR OCTOBER 31, 1939

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, in looking over some old CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS I noticed in the RECORD of August 5, this year, the gentleman from Kentucky, Congressman VINCENT, attacked both the motives behind trade-agreement opponents as well as attacking the facts and statistics I inserted in the RECORDS of August 2 and August 5. The gentleman from Kentucky, Congressman VINCENT, further attempted to indict the motives of the American Good Government Society because they published an article exposing the fallacies of the administration's trade-agreement policy, which has now brought so many American farmers and raw materials' producers to their knees and deprived them of honest income that an ever-increasing number of sincere Democrats are joining the Republicans, who have been criticizing these unconstitutional and unworkable trade agreements from their inception soon after the advent of the Franklin Roosevelt regime.

Since last August opposition to these trade agreements—and it should always be remembered that these are not trade treaties in any sense of the word, since they are promulgated without ratification by the United States Senate—has continued to grow, and American producers now faced with the new trade agreements with Argentina and other countries are becoming increasingly alarmed about continuing low prices caused by unfair and unequal competition from cheap foreign producers, using cheap labor, and depriving both the American producers of raw materials and the American workingman of an opportunity to enjoy the American standard of living as he should.

Under leave granted me by the House, I am herewith inserting a new article from the American Good Government Review for October 31, which effectively points out the errors in the line of reasoning pursued by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINCENT] in his defense of existing farm prices and rural conditions. I commend this article to the consideration of all of you for your study, since the administration's drive to extend these agreements is taking on new force, and hope for American economic recovery is consequently growing more futile.

[From supplement to American Good Government Review of Washington, D. C., October 31, 1939]

ONE HUNDRED PERCENT PROTECTION AGAINST COMPETITIVE IMPORTS PRODUCED BY ALIEN PEONS AND SWEATSHOPS

(By Richard A. Staderman, president, the American Good Government Society, Washington, D. C.)

In the August 2, 1939, issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the able Representative from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] chose to quote an article, "Seven Fat Years Versus Seven Lean Years: Or How Our Farmers Have Lost $12,000,000,000 Since 1933," written by the present author and several of his colleagues of the American Good Government Society and published as a supplement to our Review. Subsequently Hon. Franklyn Waltman, publicity director of the Republican National Committee, quoted our study extensively in one of his press releases mailed to newspapers in many parts of the United States. Various of these papers quoted the study in full.

Due apparently to the fact that our statistics showed that present policies of trade agreements, restriction of production, and crop loans have not been favorable to the farmer's pocketbook, the Representative from Kentucky [Mr. VINCENT] arrived at the conclusion that bias was present in our data. In a statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mr. VINCENT belabors opponents of present trade-agreement policy with choice epithets and inferences, and concludes that the "nonpartisan" character of the American Good Government Society is open to question.

We regret that the gentleman from Kentucky has misunderstood one of our fundamental principles. Ours is a patriotic, educational organization dedicated to a happier United States. We oppose all alien "isms." We oppose sending good American dollars abroad to "invest" in properties promptly confiscated by other governments. We oppose "lending" money to foreign nations who pay us interest out of the principal as long as we lend them more, only to default on what they owe when our lending stops.

WHAT OF THE TOBACCO AND COTTON GROWERS?

In the matter of foreign trade, there are several fundamental considerations of national policy which many of our fellow citizens forget until the boomerang comes back to them. For example, the farmers who raise flue-cured tobacco have had many headaches since Mars took command in Europe. As soon as hostilities started British buyers withdrew from the tobacco market, resulting in the closing of the markets. It is admittedly difficult to palliate this crisis for tobacco growers, though some makeshift efforts are under way.

Physicians prefer preventive medicine, which prevents diseases from starting, rather than trying to cure them once started. In the case of tobacco, the preventive measure would have been for the growers to have raised other crops in part, rendering themselves independent of the whims of international politics. Many tobacco-raising regions could turn in part to raising sweetpotatoes out of which commercial starch can be made, provided our tariff policy keeps out starch we now import. Soybeans and other crops can likewise make good replacements for present tobacco acreage by voluntary action of the grower, provided he is insured by adequate tariffs against imports which compete with his products.

Recent years have witnessed improvement in reforestation, irrigation, and soil protection. These are commendable tangible accomplishments which few can criticize. Likewise we say more power to the arm of President Roosevelt in his plan announced at his October 24 press conference, wherein he exhibited an electric meter costing only half as much as present styles. He advocated use of this by the Rural Electrification Administration, as well as a plan by which honest farmers would be allowed to read their own meters each month, with a verification by the seller of current every 6 months, thus reducing cost of meter reading from an average of 15 cents to 3 cents a month.

SENATOR LOGAN'S PASSING REGRETTABLE

We join with Mr. VINCENT in regret at the untimely passing of his former law partner, Senator Logan, of Kentucky, who was rated a friend and political supporter of the Roosevelt administration. It was our privilege to closely cooperate with Senator Logan and with a committee of the American Bar Association in advocating passage of the Logan bill—S. 915. This is the so-called administrative law bill which, briefly, would enable citizens to obtain speedier justice if wronged by a Government official. Our stand of strongly advocating passage of S. 915—passage we hope will be accomplished before adjournment of Congress in 1940—appears in the inside of the cover of our magazine the American Good Government Review for September 1939, which Mr. VINCENT may verify by consulting a copy at the Library of Congress or the District of Columbia main library. Does not our advocacy of a bill sponsored by the late distinguished Democratic Senator refute the partisanship implication laid upon us by Mr. VINCENT?

A law case is difficult to decide by testimony of the defendant alone. Independent testimony is always of greatest value.

We of the American Good Government Society are constantly assembling clippings, pro and con, on many questions of vital public interest. Thus we have a background of facts on which to base anything we say or do.

REPRESENTATIVE COX SAYS PROGRAM NOT PARTISAN

During the past 2 or 3 weeks we have had some 50 or 100 clippings on the pros and contras of the reciprocal-trade program accumulate in our files. On page 959 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, of October 26, 1939, the energetic Representative from Georgia, Mr. COX, appears as a defender of the trade-agreements program; nevertheless, on the next page he admits that "our reciprocity program is not necessarily a partisan program," thus verifying what we have maintained all along. At first many persons hoped that the program would be used to facilitate imports of things we didn't produce. Thus, if we could import reserve stocks of tin, tungsten, rubber, and other strategic items in return for shipping more foodstuffs or automobiles abroad, our national defense would be aided without injuring the domestic producer. We care not which political party is for or against trade agreements. We oppose them as now conducted because we feel they are bad economics, as we elaborated in a study quoted in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 3738, by the capable Representative from Iowa, Mr. THOMAS MARTIN.

During the past several weeks the number of Senators and Congressmen publicly defending trade agreements has been conspicuous by their paucity. One could count them on their fingers: Messrs. BUCK, KITCHENS, KEFAUVER, COX, and several others. As for trade-agreement opponents, they seem to be springing up from the earth, partly through prodding of worthy sons of the soil, as if another Roman of old had planted certain teeth in the ground from which seed soldiers sprouted and sprang forth. Our clippings show the following opponents to the Argentina trade agreement, according to items in newspapers and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

TABLE I.—United States Senators reported opposed to the Argentine trade agreement

Mr. ADAMS, Democrat, of Colorado.
Mr. BYRD, Democrat, of Virginia.
Mr. CAPPER, Republican, of Kansas.
Mr. CONNALLY, Democrat, of Texas.
Mr. FRAZIER, Republican, of North Dakota.
Mr. GURNEY, Republican, of South Dakota.
Mr. HOLMAN, Republican, of Oregon.
Mr. JOHNSON, Democrat, of Colorado.
Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Progressive, of Wisconsin.
Mr. MCCARRAN, Democrat, of Nevada.
Mr. O'MAHONEY, Democrat, of Wyoming.
Mr. TAFT, Republican, of Ohio.

Source of data: Clipping file of American Good Government Society.

TABLE II.—Members of United States House of Representatives reported opposed to Argentine trade agreement

Mr. ALEXANDER, Republican, of Minnesota.
Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN, Republican, of Minnesota.
Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN, Republican, of Minnesota.
Mr. ANGELL, Republican, of Oregon.
Mr. BOLLES, Republican, of Wisconsin.
Mr. BURDICK, Republican, of North Dakota.
Mr. CARLSON, Republican, of Kansas.
Mr. CASE, Republican, of South Dakota.
Mr. COFFEE, Democrat, of Nebraska.
Mr. CRAWFORD, Republican, of Michigan.
Mr. DWORSHAK, Republican, of Idaho.
Mr. HAWKS, Republican, of Wisconsin.
Mr. HOFFMAN, Republican, of Michigan.
Mr. HOPE, Republican, of Kansas.
Mr. HORTON, Republican, of Wyoming.
Mr. IZAC, Democrat, of California.
Mr. JOHNS, Republican, of Wisconsin.
Mr. KLEBERG, Democrat, of Texas.
Mr. KNUTSON, Republican, of Minnesota.
Mr. KUNKEL, Republican, of Pennsylvania.
Mr. LECOMPTE, Republican, of Iowa.
Mr. MASON, Republican, of Illinois.
Mr. MUNDT, Republican, of South Dakota.
Mr. MURDOCK, Democrat, of Arizona.
Mr. O'CONNOR, Democrat, of Montana.
Mr. PIERCE, Democrat, of Oregon.
Mr. PITTENGER, Republican, of Minnesota.
Mr. REED, Republican, of New York.
Mr. REES, Republican, of Kansas.
Mr. RICH, Republican, of Pennsylvania.
Mr. ROBERTSON, Democrat, of Virginia.
Mr. ROBINSON, Democrat, of Utah.
Mr. TREADWAY, Republican, of Massachusetts.
Mr. WEST, Democrat, of Texas.
Mr. WOODRUFF, Republican, of Michigan.

Source of data: Clipping file of American Good Government Society. In addition to above, Mr. HOOK, Democrat, of Michigan, is opposed to concessions on cheeses in the Argentine agreement.

In both tables I and II, it is possible that some of the gentlemen listed oppose only part of the Argentine agreement, though the majority seem opposed to the entire agreements program.

These lists reflect the views of only some of those most recently quoted. Obviously incomplete, the list shows that among the Senators recently quoted as above, there are more Democrats who spoke out recently than Republicans, though in the House the opposite is true. With this bipartisan showing, and even ultra-liberal Mr. LA FOLLETTE, opposition to trade agreements certainly cannot be termed partisan.

In his critique of our study appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 2, Mr. VINCENT presented certain tables of his own purporting to show that the people of the United States were less prosperous under high tariffs than under the lower tariff reciprocal-agreements program. Suppose we see what the facts are as summarized for the past high-tariff periods in table III:

TABLE III.—National income of all persons in United States following the tariff increases under the Dingley Act of 1897 and under the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922

Year	Total national income	Per capita national income [1]
Under Dingley tariff:
1899	$15,600,000,000	$209
1900	16,200,000,000	213
1901	18,300,000,000	235
1902	20,800,000,000	262
1903	21,100,000,000	261
1904	21,600,000,000	262
1905	25,100,000,000	298
1906	27,600,000,000	322
1907	28,200,000,000	322
Increase from 1899 to 1907 under the higher Dingley tariff	12,600,000,000	113
Percent increase	81	[1] 54
Under Fordney-McCumber tariff:
1922	61,700,000,000	562
1923	69,800,000,000	626
1924	69,600,000,000	615
1925	77,100,000,000	671
1926	78,500,000,000	674
1927	77,200,000,000	653
1928	80,500,000,000	671
1929	83,000,000,000	683
Increase from 1922 to 1929 under the higher tariffs of the Fordney-McCumber Act	21,300,000,000	121
Percent increase	34	[1] 22

[1] With the population of the United States growing year by year, the per capita figures do not increase as rapidly as the total ones. There are several methods of calculating national incomes, which vary on such matters as accruals, etc. Alternative methods do not change the conclusions to be drawn, however.

Source of statistics: American Good Government Society, compiled from published data of National Industrial Conference Board, of Dr. Warren M. Persons, of National Bureau of Economic Research, and of various Federal Government departments. Data are authenticated estimates.

Table III poses this question to reciprocal-trade advocates: If high tariffs were unfavorable to the prosperity of our great United States, how could it have possibly happened that in two long periods of more than 7 years following a raising of tariff rates, that we should have prospered? Certainly no one can deny that a rising national income denotes a rising average prosperity.

In our study in the August 2 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD we felt it was a true and equitable test to compare the 7 years 1933 through 1939, under the present administration and its policies with the 7 years preceding, 1926 through 1932, and the policies followed then. Both these 7-year periods included years that were better and years not so good. We did not, for example, try to compare the boom period 1923 through 1929 with the 1933 through 1939 period, though such a comparison would have shown up the recent period to be even poorer in farmers' national incomes than shown by our study.

The tables presented by Mr. VINCENT in the August 5 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD conveniently takes the 4 best years under New Deal policies, namely 1935 through 1938, and compares them with the 4 lowest years that can be found, namely 1930 through 1933. Although 1933 was primarily a New Deal year, the justification given by Mr. VINCENT for combining it with 3 pre-New Deal years is that 1930 through 1933 represents the period under "Hawley-Smootism," as compared with the trade-agreements year 1935 through 1938.

It is true that the national income and farmers' income during 1935 through 1938 was greater than 1930 through 1933. But does the Vincent comparison really prove anything? As a former teacher of statistics, I challenge the Vincent comparison on several grounds.

HONEST STATISTICS NEEDED

In the first place, the Hawley-Smoot tariff did not become law until June 18, 1930. As a practical matter, due to inventories on hand, the practical results of the tariff did not come into full operation until the end of 1930. At most one might theoretically claim the last half of 1930 as part of the Hawley-Smoot period, though from the standpoint of honest statistics, the year 1930 would have to be considered too mixed and indecisive to be an accurate Hawley-Smoot measure.

In the second place, the Vincent comparison conveniently omits 1934. This was the year the Trade Agreements Act was passed. However, no actual trade agreements were signed that year except the reltaively minor Cuban one toward the end of 1934. As a practical matter, every unbiased student of the subject would admit that there were no effects of the Cuban agreement sufficient to substantially affect our national income or farmers' incomes in 1934. Therefore it is correct to say that the Hawley-Smoot law was practically in full operation in 1934. If Hawley-Smoot were bad, then why is it that the national income rose from some $42,000,000,000 in 1933 to about $48,000,000,000 during 1934?

The two preceding points are merely negative. We show that the Vincent comparison is defective, but we still haven't explained that 2 years of lowered national income and depression followed the Hawley-Smoot Act. According to table III, we ought to expect years of economic prosperity to follow an increase in our tariff protection, just as followed the Dingley tariff of 1897 and the Fordney-McCumber tariff of 1922.

SPECULATION THE REAL CULPRIT

The explanation is this: In the latter twenties we witnessed various booms, principally in the stock market. Farmers were selling their homes on Main Street and moving into big cities to watch Wall Street tickers. City workers and businessmen were spending more time in sitting in customers' rooms in brokerage offices than in acquiring more skill in their trades or in managing their productive businesses. Swindlers, like the suicide Kreuger, were on the loose and many unsound houses of cards like the Insull companies and the Hulswitt group were destroying the real wealth of our people. Small wonder it was that smashes occurred in October and November 1929 and that severe depression followed.

With our entire financial house and economic system in chaos, no one measure could prevent a drastic liquidation and readjustment. The Hawley-Smoot Act was no exception. If we had had normal conditions, the increased tariff would have given a sound lift to our economic system and enabled us to prosper on a firmer fundamental basis of freedom from the whims of foreign politicians, foreign peons, and foreign sweatshops.

By the time the Hawley-Smoot tariff was signed, in June 1930, the depression had been in full swing for over 8 months since October 1929. By the time the results of the tariff were fully felt, the depression had been tobogganing full blast for at least a year. With these facts at hand, is there any fair-minded person who can say the Hawley-Smoot tariff caused the depression?

HAWLEY-SMOOT PREVENTED A WORSE DEPRESSION

As a practical matter, the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1930 proved to be an unexpected blessing in preventing the depression from becoming still worse. Britain and other countries depreciated their currencies in 1931, which amounted to destroying part of our protection from the products of foreign sweatshops. The British currency depreciation worked in this way: A British merchant can make a profit if he sells an article for, say, 1 British pound sterling. When the pound was at $4.86 before 1931, this meant that if the United States price of the article was $6 and our tariff $2, the article would not be imported because all the Britisher would get back would be the British equivalent of $4, or less than pound sterling needed to make a profit. The $4 equivalent would really in most cases be less than the Britisher's cost of production.

But what of this case in 1931, after Britain went off the gold basis and depreciated its currency? The pound dropped to below $3.50, and the British merchant could ship the product over here, pay the $2 duty, take the $4 and trade $3.50 of it for the pound sterling needed to cover costs and give him a normal profit. In addition, he could take the remaining 50 cents as an extra speculative profit at our expense.

Let us assume that the above is what would have happened if there had been no Hawley-Smoot tariff, but just the previous $2 tariff. Let us further assume that the Hawley-Smoot Act has raised the tariff on the hypothetical item to $3.10. After paying this $3.10, the Britisher would find that he had only $2.90 left from our $6 selling price. This $2.90 would bring him less than a pound sterling, he would not make a profit, therefore the item would not be imported to undersell a United States factory and perhaps close it and throw its owners and workers out of employment. Many of the tariff raises under "Hawley-Smootism" prevented just this and so prevented the 1932 depression from being still worse, a worsening which might have endangered our very Government of, for, and by the people.

TRADE-AGREEMENT ARGUMENTS LIKE GHOSTS

When finally broken down in this way the allegations of the proponents of the reciprocal remind one of the ghosts discussed in that delightful but authoritative new book on early United States history entitled "Intimate Glimpses of Old Saint Mary's" written by George Morgan Knight, Jr., lecturer and historian, and published by the Lincoln Press, 994 National Press Building, Washington, D. C.

The "two old lady ghosts who walk by day," according to page 102 of the book, are no more unreal than the way the proponents of the agreements try to always pick the depression low of 1932 as a fair year to make comparisons with more recent years, as for example does the Representative from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] on page 442 of the Appendix of the RECORD.

TARIFFS AND POLITICAL PARTIES

We maintain that tariffs are an economic problem, and should not be issues between political parties. Yet it has figured in past campaigns. Some years ago it was my privilege to have been a graduate student with Prof. Frank W. Taussig, of Harvard University, revered as the dean of American economists and the first Chairman of the United States Tariff Commission. In his book, a standard text entitled "The Tariff History of the United States," seventh edition, 1923, page 418, Professor Taussig states that President Woodrow Wilson's concept of a "competitive tariff" was virtually the same thing as the Republican plea for equalizing costs of production.

If one reads the leading party platforms of 1928, one finds that the Republican position is virtually the same as the Democratic. There is no difference in principle between the Republican declaration of 1928 and the Democratic advocacy of tariffs providing "actual difference of cost of production at home and abroad, with adequate safeguard for the wage of the American laborer."

NEEDED—100 PERCENT PROTECTION AGAINST COMPETITIVE IMPORTS

In the Appendix of the RECORD, page 3739, we elaborated on "Suggested Improvements" and "True Rule of the Foreign Trade Program." We shall not here repeat these previous views. Instead we shall carry our specific suggestions further, assuming the reader has read the article.

The American Good Government Society scientific tariff plan is as follows:

Section 1: All commodities or products for which there are, or for which there soon could be, adequate production facilities to take care of our own demand at around present prices should be subject to an import duty of 100 percent calculated on the average prices paid by the United States buyer of such respective commodities during the 15 years next preceding the time of such import.

Section 2: All commodities or products which the United States does not produce, or which we produce in minute quantities, shall be admitted free of duty, except as the Congress may levy duties for revenue only.

Section 3: For the intermediate group of products of which we produce only part, and which we could not produce an adequate total of in the near future, there should be a system of quotas, or tariffs, or both, arranged in such a way that the United States producer shall be given preference in first selling what he can produce and at a fair profit, before the foreign producer may compete with him. The foreigner may then supply the deficiency, so as to avoid scarcity such as would skyrocket prices to the consumer. (End of plan proper.)

WHAT PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT THINKS

At this writing no leader of either major party has seen this 100-percent plan. Therefore we cannot quote anyone upon it. Nevertheless, we are unable to see how it would be inconsistent with the views of President Franklin D. Roosevelt in the message he delivered before the session of Congress now sitting. The President said, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 21, 1939, page 11:

"From a purely material point of view, what is the advantage to us in sending all manner of articles across the ocean for final processing there when we could give employment to thousands by doing it here? Incidentally, and again from the material point of view, by such employment we automatically aid our own national defense."

We do not know whether the President meant these words to be of general applicability. However, he has not qualified the statement, therefore, unless he otherwise indicates, we must assume that "all manner of articles" means just that.

Taking the President's statement at face value, we commend it highly as an excellent, statesmanlike utterance. However, the business of the Nation runs on action. "We must act," as the President has often said. Action in this case would discontinue those parts of trade agreements, present, past, and future, which give less than 100-percent protection on imports which compete with our own producers.

The President said years ago that he believed in trying things, and that if they didn't work, he would be the first to suggest a change. We hope that the President's statement just quoted indicates a change of heart on his part regarding the trade-agreements program, in view of recent experience that under it our exports have been falling, and our imports rising, which was particularly true of the Anglo-American agreement from the time it went into effect until the present war started.

Under our 100-percent protection plan, the mechanics would work as follows: If anyone, as a matter of taste, wanted an imported Swiss cheese, or imported Italian spaghetti, or some French lace, or some Argentine corned beef, he would be permitted to acquire it, providing he paid the full United States price to the United States Treasury as duty, and in addition paid the foreign seller whatever the foreigner demanded as the price of the product. The theory behind this is that if our citizens are unwilling to patronize their own neighbors here in the United States, they should still be required to pay our citizens as a whole in the form of the Government, the United States price, which amount could be used to help balance the Federal Budget and pay off the United States debt.

Section 2 is obvious. Section 3 is the most difficult, and from experience in bill drafting, I grant that it would not be easy to draft into a bill or to subsequently administer. However, the difficulties of recent years in writing and administering tariffs would be greatly reduced by taking what is probably the majority of products, namely those in section 1, and putting them in the relatively simple administrative and legislative status that section 1 provides. Next to above proposal we favor passage of the bills by Congressman COFFEE, Nebraska Democrat, and Representative WOODRUFF, Michigan Republican, requiring United States Senate ratification of all trade agreements.

Editor and Columnist Speak on Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

EDITORIAL AND ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK WORLD-TELEGRAM

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, nothing I might add to these splendid articles on neutrality could possibly be as effective as to present the articles in full for your consideration:

[From the New York World-Telegram of October 30, 1939]

BETTER LAW, BUT NO PANACEA

Applying the only test that should be applied—the best interest of the United States—what about the neutrality bill as it now comes before the House?

We believe it better law than the existing one. Because of its cash-and-carry provisions and those for keeping American shipping out of danger zones, it eliminates two great hazards now being so strikingly evidenced in the case of the City of Flint.

But we have no illusion that the act is a panacea which will function automatically against our participation. Nor do we fail to realize that, inherent in the sale of arms, there are certain elements which tend to stir up emotions at home and abroad—more at home, we think, than abroad.

So we believe the worst thing that could happen in America would be for our people either to assume a "well, that's that" attitude, with the neutrality legislation out of the way, or to get worked up into a high heat in the closing days of the House debate. The first would be false security, the second a dangerous substitution of feeling for thinking. Let's continue to rely on our heads rather than on our glands.

Whether we stay out of Europe's war will be determined by no law. It will depend on whether we continue to maintain that same unanimous resolve which was so spontaneously expressed by our people when the conflict started, which was reiterated in the President's address opening Congress and in all the debate in the Senate, where, though opinions as to methods differed widely, there was no difference as to objective.

It would be well for us at this important stage to rededicate ourselves to the proposition that this is not our war and to review these governing facts:

That we went into the last war because we stirred ourselves into a frenzy of what we thought was idealism.

That, thus inspired, we mixed into a contest of cross and double-cross which had been going on for centuries; a contest we didn't start and didn't know how to finish.

That we were cruelly disillusioned.

That we didn't save the world for democracy. Instead, that we acquired only the bitter fruit of tragedy and bad debts. That we got not even gratitude.

That our only possible dividend was experience, and that unless we now can benefit from the experience, it's nobody's fault but our own.

That sometime we may render a service—and a great one—but only by keeping out; by keeping fit and adequately defended against the time when this latest fever of power politics has run its course and we then may offer aid as convalescence sets in.

Final passage of a neutrality bill should neither lull us to sleep not stir us to anger.

For it's not our war.

[From the New York World-Telegram of October 30, 1939]

IT SEEMS TO ME

(By Heywood Broun)

It seems to me that Pope Pius XII spoke eloquently to men and women of many faiths in his encylical. He spoke for peace, but in terms of security for all the world. Decidedly he gave no aid and comfort to the philosophy, "Let them stew in their own juice." Nor did he condone the immorality of broken pledges and treaties swept aside by sudden force of arms. And yet the spiritual head of the Catholic Church was both forceful and crystal clear in dashing the hope that international brotherhood may be achieved through the triumph of arms.

"To hope for a decisive change exclusively from the shock of war is idle," said the Pope, "as experience shows. The hour of victory is an hour of external triumph for the party to whom victory falls, but it is, in equal measure, the hour of temptation. In this hour the angel of justice strives with the demons of violence; the heart of the victor all too suddenly is hardened; moderation and fair-seeing wisdom appear to him weakness; the excited passions of the people, often inflamed by the sacrifices and sufferings they have borne, obscure the vision of even responsible persons and make them inattentive to the warning voice of humanity and equity which is drowned in the inhuman cry, 'Vae Victis—Woe to the conquered.' There is danger lest settlements and decisions borne in such conditions be nothing else than injustice under the cloak of justice."

In all this the Pope speaks not only as a spiritual leader but as a wise statesman. When he says, "as experience shows," undoubtedly he means secular as well as religious experience. And I think there are few who will deny the tragic dangers of a victor's peace. However, peace by stalemate leaves the warring nations precisely where they started, and at the cost of bloody sacrifice. But there is one sort of peace which fits within the formula laid down by the Pope. I refer to the kind of peace which could be won by the neutral nations if they insisted upon a settlement through conference.

The neutrals have nothing to gain by a continuance of the war, and everything to lose. Even any shabby hope of financial profit is illusory in the long run. It may be said that few of the nations which lie outside the whirlpool are wholly neutral in their judgment. Even so, they are less wracked by passion than the countries which fight. And that tide of hate among the combatants is certain to increase rather than diminish. And so it does not seem to me that the spokesmen for those lands beyond the present area of slaughter should wait for hints or official requests from the combatants before making precise, practical, and immediate suggestions for a peace conference. There is, to be sure, the tragic contingency that a true will to peace may be lacking in some belligerent quarters. Obviously the early advantage lies with Hitler, and there has been small note of pacifism in his more recent addresses.

Accordingly, I hope that the House will not delay long in lifting the arms embargo, for if it fails to do so there is the distinct chance that the Fuehrer may choose to press forward rather than listen to any voice of reason. When the conference comes it must be broad enough in its scope to mean that we are not going back to the Old World, and that all the nations will refuse to reenlist in the war of nerves.

We shall want to know each other better rather than worse if we are to found a world of freedom for the body and soul of man. Labor standards must be preserved up to the highest scale and not the least, and we must begin to trade freely with one another. It is a large order, but since the stake is life or death, it surely is worth trying.

Neutrality Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that the rule now before the House which fixes the procedure for the consideration of the neutrality bill recently passed by the Senate is not more liberal in its terms. The effect of the rule will be to limit debate and restrict the offering of amendments. The welfare of our people is vitally concerned in the type of neutrality legislation to be adopted. Therefore there should be no attempt to stifle debate or restrict the right to offer amendments. A "gag" rule has no proper place in the procedure of this House when a matter of this importance is under consideration. The welfare of our people demands that the fullest opportunity of expression be given to the membership of this House as representatives of our people. The rule is unfair and unjust because of the severe limitations it places upon the consideration of this bill. I shall, therefore, vote against its adoption in the hope that thereby the neutrality bill may be returned to the Committee on Foreign Affairs for further consideration and reported to the House under a rule that will permit full and free debate with opportunity for such amendments as may seem necessary.

EMBARGO AGAINST WAR MATERIAL AND CASH AND CARRY FOR OTHER COMMODITIES

I am strongly in favor of retaining the present embargo against shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war, of any kind or character, to belligerent nations. I shall therefore vote against repeal of the embargo as provided for in the Senate bill. I also favor retention of cash-and-carry provisions with respect to all other commodities than war materials that may be shipped to nations at war, together with all other restrictions against American ships and citizens traveling in war zones and other restrictive measures that will tend to prevent our involvement in present and future wars.

I have given the matter of what should be our neutrality policy serious and thoughtful consideration. It is needless to say that no thought of partisanship has entered into my consideration of the subject nor influenced my decision. Party division has no proper place in any matter that relates to our national defense or security. With respect to such we must at all times be Americans first, forgetful of party affiliations, in our desire to protect and make sure our national welfare and security.

The reasons that actuated me in the decision I have made, as to what should be our national neutrality policy, are based upon the fundamental desire to keep our Nation out of war and our boys at home. They are as follows:

1. EMBARGO OUR NATIONAL POLICY

I voted for the present embargo provisions in 1935 when the bill was passed by almost the unanimous vote of both House and Senate and approved by the President and Secretary of State. I voted again for its continuation in 1937 when it also received the approval of the President and his Secretary of State. In both instances approval of the embargo was expressed by both of them in the strongest possible language. In June of this year, when the neutrality bill was before the House, I again voted for the embargo feature. All of the belligerent nations entered the present war with full knowledge of our national policy with respect to an embargo on munitions and implements of war. There has been no sufficient reason advanced to convince me that the policy previously approved is now wrong.

No guaranty can or has been given that the repeal of the embargo will prevent our being drawn into the war. I prefer to remain on the safe side and adhere to the thought previously expressed by the President, that repeal would be a step toward involvement in foreign wars, and therefore to be avoided. It is my judgment that there is more to sustain the correctness of his first viewpoint than there is now to change it.

2. SHIPMENT OF ARMS AND MUNITIONS IS INCONSISTENT WITH OUR PEACE AIMS

Our Nation has been the foremost exponent of peace and good will among the nations of the world. We have led every movement for the banishment of war as a means to settle international differences. It was through our influence that the Kellogg Peace Pact, as a means to abolish war, was approved by all nations, including those now at war. It is inconsistent with our peace aims to assist in the prosecution of war by the shipment of implements of war, the primary purpose of which is to bring horror, misery, death, and destruction. I am unwilling to trade our peaceful aims for blood money. To do so is to undo all the good we have sought to do and advertise to the world that we believe in peace and are against war only when war does not exist, but, when it does come then our desire for war profits, or "fool's gold," as the President originally termed it, takes precedence. This is the time to show the world that we are firm in our opposition to war and will have no part in it.

3. BULLETS, THEN BOYS

If we ship war material to any of the belligerents upon the theory that the principles of democracy are under attack, and it is our duty to participate, then this theory, if carried to its logical conclusion, would require us to send our boys in the event that the shipment of munitions was not sufficient to bring victory. No one who argues for repeal of the embargo, upon the basis of our duty to again fight the battle of democracy, would dare propose, or admit the possible future use, of our boys in the conflict; yet, once we become committed to participation the possibility or need of this future use of our boys remains ever present. I am unwilling to take this first step that may lead to such a deplorable result.

4. REFERENDUM ON FOREIGN WARS

If there is no intention of ever using our boys in this or any foreign war not directed against us, then why do those who favor the repeal of the embargo law oppose an amendment to the bill that would preclude the possibility of it, at least, without a referendum to our people? This would permit them to decide whether the issue in a foreign war is sufficient to justify sending our boys to foreign battlefields. An amendment of this character was defeated in the Senate by the vote of those who favored repeal of the embargo. I believe that such an amendment would go a long way in removing the fear that now exists among mothers and fathers throughout our land. Unfortunately, under the present rules of the House no one will be permitted to even offer such an amendment to the Senate bill, nor will administration leaders permit any change in the rules at this time that would make such an amendment in order.

5. NECESSITY FOR ADEQUATE DEFENSE

A neutrality bill, just because it is called such, does not prevent our involvement in the war now raging. Its effectiveness depends upon the provisions it contains. It is my opinion that the present bill would be much stronger if it contained the embargo feature, the referendum to which reference has been made, and then provision for building at once our national defense to a point that would leave no doubt of our ability to defend ourselves and maintain our national security. If war prosperity is desired as a means of providing work for some of our unemployed, then let it be by producing that which is now necessary to give our own Nation that security we all desire instead of sending it to foreign nations for a foreign war. I am a strong believer in adequate defense as a means of preserving our national peace.

In conclusion, may I again repeat that it is unfortunate that the rules of the House, the procedure adopted by the administration leaders in the House, and the few hours allotted for debate preclude the full consideration that should be given by the House membership to this important measure. It will also bear repetition to state that it is wrong to have a gag rule on a bill that so vitally affects the welfare of our people. The fullest opportunity should have been given for consideration, and Congress should remain in Washington, ready to deal with any emergency that may arise. Instead, the administration leaders have not only cut short debate but have also laid their plans to get Congress out of Washington at the earliest possible day. Furthermore, there are the unsolved domestic problems that keep 12,000,000 unemployed without jobs and millions more upon relief. Notwithstanding all of this, both foreign and domestic, Congress is adjourned and sent back home. The proper place for Congress to be right now is in Washington, watchful and alert to keep America out of war, provide for our national defense, and solve our own problems and thereby promote our own peace and security.

Proposal to Lift Arms Embargo Violates International Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

MEMORANDUM ON ILLEGALITIES OF THE ADMINISTRATION'S POLICY IN ENFORCING NEUTRALITY

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks I desire to include the following memorandum:

ILLEGALITIES OF THE ADMINISTRATION'S POLICY IN ENFORCING AMERICAN NEUTRALITY

I

The proposal to lift the arms embargo which is now concededly designed to aid Great Britain and France and not to preserve American neutrality, is a distinct violation of international law. A neutral may, after the outbreak of war, change his law, but only in the direction of strengthening his neutrality and safeguarding it against any or all belligerents, and not in the direction of relaxing it in behalf of one. Such relaxation is incompatible with neutrality and is an act of intervention. This was pointed out by Secretary Bryan in his reply to the German Government on April 21, 1915, when that Government sought to persuade the United States to impose an arms embargo because this country had become an arsenal for the Allies alone. Mr. Bryan said:

"This Government holds, as I believe Your Excellency is aware, and as it is constrained to hold in view of the present indisputable doctrines of accepted international law, that any change in its own laws of neutrality during the progress of a war which would affect unequally the relations of the United States with the nations at war would be an unjustifiable departure from the principle of strict neutrality by which it has consistently sought to direct its actions, and I respectfully submit that none of the circumstances urged in Your Excellency's memorandum alters the principle involved. The placing of an embargo on the trade in arms at the present time would constitute such a change and be a direct violation of the neutrality of the United States. It will, I feel assured, be clear to Your Excellency that, holding this view and considering itself in honor bound by it, it is out of the question for this Government to consider such a course." (Policy Toward Maritime Commerce in War, vol. II, p. 299.)

Secretary Lansing made a similar statement to the Austrian Government on August 12, 1915.

If the United States now professes great respect for international law it ought first of all to observe it itself. It may need to invoke international law. It preaches it to foreign governments.

Even though the United States does not itself furnish the arms, ammunition, and implements of war it is deliberately changing its law in order to facilitate such shipment by its nationals. This is unneutral and illegal. It is practically the same as if the Government itself determined to ship the arms, ammunition, and implements of war.

The suggestion of the President that the change would be a return to international law indicates the vagueness of his conception of that subject. International law does not require that a neutral government either permit or stop the shipment of arms to belligerents. It leaves each country free to choose its own policy, but not to change it during a war. Heretofore, numerous neutral governments have imposed an arms embargo during a war as a means of promoting and insuring their neutrality. It is unprecedented to argue that the lifting of an arms embargo can promote neutrality. This is disingenuous.

II

The United States is continuing to admit armed merchant ships, armed with heavy guns, into American ports. This is highly dangerous. Such ships are exposed to attack at sight, for they are armed to fight submarines. The supposed distinction between defensive and offensive armament is nonexistent in the case of guns that by one shot may undo a submarine.

The Havana Convention of 1928 on the rights and duties of neutral states requires in article 12, section 3, that armed merchant ships be treated as "ships of war." The Harvard Research Draft, article 28, provides:

"A neutral state shall either exclude belligerent armed merchant vessels from its territory or admit such vessels on the same conditions on which it admits belligerent warships."

The Government of the Netherlands maintained its point of view as against Great Britain from 1915 to 1917 that they would not admit armed ships to Dutch ports, for these had the character of warships and lost the immunity of merchant ships. Great Britain had to throw off the guns of British ships and enter Dutch ports unarmed. The admission of such ships requires that they at least be treated as warships and not be refueled and revictualed as would merchant ships. The President used the illustration of the Alabama in justification of the Bremen's detention. Here is a far more extreme case than that, for these ships are being provided with the materials which enable them to undertake hostile acts.

Secretary Lansing admitted his error in treating armed merchant ships as innocent ships in a memorandum of January 18, 1916, when he proposed that unless Britain disarm its ships it cou'd not claim immunity for them from unwarned submarine attack. He realized that the admission of such armed ships to American ports had been an error. President Wilson agreed, but the allied pressure to prevent this change in America's erroneous ruling was so great that Balfour and House persuaded Wilson to exert pressure on Lansing to withdraw his memorandum, so that the United States returned to its error and stuck to the error to the bitter end. It was that error which mistakenly led the Wilson administration to oppose the Gore-McLemore resolutions, which merely provided for the simple rule that American citizens take passage on armed belligerent merchant ships at their own risk. Wilson insisted that such American citizens as a matter of "national honor" had the right to travel unmolested on armed belligerent merchant ships. This was a preposterous claim, and it furnished the pretext for America's intervention in the European war. It is surprising how little Senators seem to have read of the diplomatic history back of America's intervention.

III

On September 6 the President proclaimed the barter agreement with Great Britain by which the United States is to exchange some of its surplus cotton for British rubber. Both these commodities are intended as war reserves, and cotton is doubtless to be treated as contraband, as it was over America's half-hearted objection in the late war. No neutral government may supply contraband to a belligerent government. This is distinctly an unneutral act; and even though the barter agreement was concluded before the war, its execution after the outbreak of war becomes an illegal act.

IV

It is proposed that fully equipped bombing planes be supplied to the allied governments. A neutral government is obliged to prevent the shipment from its territories of military aircraft, as it is of warships. It does not matter whether the supplier is the neutral government itself or citizens of the neutral state. Such bombing planes constitute military assistance in the most direct sense. Neutral states do not have the privilege of supplying such direct military assistance to a belligerent. Such supply is an unneutral act, and therefore illegal. Article 46 of the Hague Draft Convention of 1922 on the use of radio and aircraft in time of war provides:

"A neutral government is bound to use the means at its disposal—

"(1) To prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of an aircraft in a position to make a hostile attack against a belligerent power, or carrying or accompanied by appliances or materials the mounting or utilization of which would enable it to make a hostile attack, if there is reason to believe that such aircraft is destined for use against a belligerent power."

Article 99 of the Harvard Research Draft on neutrality provides:

"A neutral state shall use the means at its disposal:

"(a) To prevent the fitting out or arming within its territory of any aircraft which is intended to engage in hostile operations against a belligerent.

"(b) To prevent, subject to article 94, the flight from its territory of any aircraft which is intended to engage in hostile operations against a belligerent, or which is intended to perform services of a military character for a belligerent."

The National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. MAY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

AN ADDRESS BY SECRETARY WOODRING AND AN EDITORIAL RELATIVE THERETO

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address recently delivered by the Secretary of War and an editorial published in the Washington Herald relative thereto:

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY WOODRING

The National Guard Association of the United States has convened its annual convention at a most momentous and critical time. In the Far East war covers the countryside with a dark blanket of death and destruction. Across the Atlantic war stalks gloomily over the hills and valleys, blots out the blueness of God's skies, roils rapaciously the surfaces of the seas, and extends its horrors into the very depths of the oceans. The peoples of our New World stand aghast, fearful that to the shores of the Americas may eventually reach the dread mailed fist of Mars.

War is despised, hated, abhorred by most of the peoples of the globe. Yet war's dismal shroud now enfolds many nations. For, even in these days of advanced civilization—or should I say so-called civilization?—war still remains a tool in the hands of ambitious and unscrupulous political stewards for the aggrandizement of their political power and as a weapon of conquest in their expansion of empire.

Americans, since their bitter and disillusioning experiences in the world conflict which terminated some 21 years ago, have advanced materially in their recognition and knowledge of the utter futility of armed conflict. And, during the past two decades, there has continuously developed in them the determination to avoid completely involvement in war—save war forced upon them in the defense of their own Republic, their own homes, and their own liberties. And in all sincerity and in all honesty let me tell you there is no man in public life today who is more determined than your Secretary of War that your sons and my sons shall not march forth to war.

Dangerously prevalent among some of our people today, however, is the assumption that intervention by the United States—and I refer to overseas participation in the conflict now raging in Europe—is inevitable; that the fates have decreed the youth of America eventually must be transported across the seas to wage battle on the Old World's soil, blood-soaked through the centuries.

Those who in public utterances pronounce the inevitability of our entrance into this second World War do grave injustice to this Republic of ours. They arouse suspicion among our more gullible citizens toward the efforts of the Federal Government to assure complete neutrality. They breed mistrust in the determination of the national administration definitely to assure peace for the Western Hemisphere. Those who preach the inevitability of war are prone to interpret every purely precautionary and defensive measure taken by the Government as likely, if not as deliberately intended, to lead the American people into war. They paint the wholly false picture of American business and industry, in a blind greed for profit, intentionally attempting to involve the United States in the present European conflict.

To create, knowingly or unknowingly, such a psychology on the inevitability of our participation in the war now in progress is to deny that most Americans—the vast majority of Americans—are convinced that our democratic form of government can be maintained and our national destiny assured only through continuance of peace.

The War Department, the Secretary of War, and the personnel of the Regular Establishment, the National Guard, the Organized Reserves—we who are primarily and personally concerned with the slight progress recently attained in the promotion of the efficiency of our land protective forces—we must not stand idly by while amateur strategists pronounce war's inevitability. As a nation we are not prepared for the formation of expeditions to wage offensive war; we do not wish to prepare to wage offensive war; we see no inevitable war, offensive or defensive.

Our Commander in Chief, President Roosevelt, has sounded, and sounded in unmistakably determined beats, the tocsin of peace—peace in the Western Hemisphere. It is the bounden duty of each individual in any way connected with the Military Establishment to exert all his intelligence and all his influence to insure there be no misinterpretation by any single citizen of the United States of the fact that every item in the current program for the augmentation and modernization of our defensive forces and every thought behind that program has but one object in view—the preservation of peace.

In these days when the ancient and gruesome ideology that "might makes right" again strangles much of the world in a vise-like grasp, how can we best assure the preservation of peace? Only through defensive preparation—military, naval, industrial, economic—which will serve as a very positive and very definite deterrent to any and all aggressive designs.

We American "peace-at-almost-any-price" advocates have long since come to the realization that unpreparedness for defense eventually turns out to be far more costly and a far greater menace to our homes, our liberties, and our national existence than a powerful, well-equipped, adequately trained defensive force. We picture our national defense not as a rattling sword but as a protective shield.

The United States does not now require the maintenance of military forces beyond the authorized peace strengths provided by the National Defense Act for the three components of the Army of the United States—the Regular Army, National Guard, and Organized Reserves. We require no considerable augmentation of civilian military training activities. The Reserve Officers' Training Corps and the citizens' military training camps will suffice for the accomplishment of their primary missions—the production of an adequate reserve of young commissioned officers and the training, on a purely voluntary status, of those patriotic youths who desire to prepare themselves in time of peace to answer the Nation's call in the hour of its need. General Pershing recently told me that the combat casualties among green, unseasoned, untrained American troops during the World War far exceeded those suffered by trained and experienced soldiers. Our defensive requirements demand the maintenance of no huge reserve of soldiers for the permanent establishment. The enlisted Reserve established last summer for the Regular Army, which eventually will attain a total of 75,000 men, is ample.

The security of these United States does, however, demand the maintenance of an Army in being at all time—those minimum defensive elements which will permit this Nation to speak with authority for peace and assure the continuance of our national existence. This force must be fully, perfectly equipped and adequately trained at all times, not only to meet the eventualities of today and tomorrow, but those of the days to come.

These land defensive elements must include an ever ready striking air force. I refer to a "striking" air component; yet only a moment ago I said that offensive war is not contemplated in our military preparations. There has been some controversy over the term "offensive-defensive weapons." There are but few, if any, instruments of warfare which can be classified as distinctly offensive or distinctly defensive. On the field of battle, with its continuous shifting of the tides of combat, the offensive weapon of today ofttimes becomes the defensive weapon of tomorrow.

However, there are some purely defensive military installations—for instance, the fixed seacoast defense guns which afford protection to the Panama Canal. And, as purely defensive as are the roles of those fixed guns, would be the missions of heavy, long-range bombers employed to disrupt the activities of hostile air or naval bases established to menace the Panama Canal and its defenses. Whatever may be the method of employment of a weapon of war in Europe or Asia, let me assure you that, under our plans, the same type of weapon in the hands of American soldiers would be used for purposes of defense, and defense only.

But being potentially strong in men and matériel is not sufficient guaranty for the assurance of peace. We must obtain adequate training of personnel and efficient employment of matériel. We must from time to time concentrate our defensive units to practice the plays of the team. Otherwise, we expend our efforts and our moneys on the forging of strong links for an unlinked chain and, unlinked, have no chain at all.

Hence the recent decision of the War Department to assure the maximum effectiveness of the units of the Regular Army by means of concentrations for extensive field maneuvers during winter months in southern areas. Infantry divisions, now undergoing reorganization as "triangular" rather than "quadrangular" organizations will first be afforded opportunity to familiarize themselves with the modernized formations. They will later be further concentrated for corps maneuvers with special auxiliary corps troops heretofore nonexistent in our peacetime permanent establishment. We thus take advantage of favorable climatic conditions to form an actual and an experienced first-line combat team from the mobile troops of the Regular Army. And in the so doing we correct one of the gravest defects in our present national defense set-up.

This winter's concentrations, to be fully effective, must be molded into a continuous revolving program covering the next 2 or 3 years. If the commanders of troops and the troops themselves do not become accustomed to operating in large, well-balanced, cohesive units—under conditions as closely approximating war as peacetime limitations permit—the personnel of our regular divisions, we must confess, will be playing at the soldier game. Our soldiery must be real, not toy.

The National Guard, of course, enters prominently into this picture of an animated, modernized national defense. Our initial protective force comprises the Regular Army and the National Guard. For example, Baltimore's National Guard units are as integral a part of this Nation's first line of land defenses as are the Regular Army organizations stationed at nearby Forts Howard, Hoyle, and Meade. Were it not for the existence of the National Guard this country would be forced to maintain a permanent, professional military establishment of far greater strength than that which we now support. The American public must not lose sight of the fact that in our scheme of national defense the National Guard plays a role of paramount importance from the standpoint of economy in the maintenance of our Military Establishment.

The President, by recent Executive order, has directed—at the discretion of the Governors of the various States—an increase of about 42,000 in the enlisted ranks of the National Guard. Most gratifying has been the progress thus far in the attainment of the allotted quotas. The augmented strengths of units will permit far more practical and efficient organizational training, for heretofore unit strength has been too low to permit the manning of weapons assigned to organizations. Ordinary, unavoidable absenteeism also greatly retarded the effectiveness of units, both in armory and field training. The increase provided by the Executive order promises much for greater unit proficiency; the extra drill periods recently provided will greatly promote individual proficiency. Observance of the winter maneuvers of Regular Army units by National Guard higher commanders and their staffs will not only be an educational factor of no mean importance, but will go far toward promotion of that cooperation so essential between the primary elements of the initial protective force.

To the citizen-soldiers of the National Guard the people of this country are greatly indebted. And I feel I am on very safe ground when I state that never before have the missions of the National Guard been so fully understood by the public nor the patriotic endeavors of its personnel more fully appreciated.

For 150 years our land defense has been based upon a 2½-mile-per-hour speed of movement. We must now readjust ourselves to the fact—one demonstrated so recently on the plains of Poland, the plateaus of Spain, and the deserts of Ethiopia—that today war on the earth's surface is a 30-to-40-mile-per-hour business, and that the birds of war cleave the skies at 300 to 400 miles per hour. Our Army—Regulars, Guardsmen, and Reservists—must have not only mechanical mobility, tactically and strategically, but also mental mobility.

Let us not overlook that other strong right arm of the Nation's defense—our fine United States Navy, which today commemorates its glorious traditions and its splendid record of achievements in peace and in war. Upon our sea forces devolve the responsibility for the security of long water routes over which our trade is transported to the four corners of the globe, and for the defense of 40,000 miles of homeland and insular coast lines. To our Navy—as to our Army—we must give the means for the accomplishment of its manifold missions.

This program for rearmament—rearmament for peace—is costly. Our people are determined, however, to preserve the neutrality of the United States so long as the dread four horsemen—war, famine, pestilence, and death—ravage Europe and Asia. Our people are likewise determined that the barbaric hoofbeats of those same four horsemen must be confined to spheres other than the Americas.

Not a doubt is there in my mind that the American people—be the financial cost what it may—will render wholehearted support to their Government in its efforts to maintain neutrality and to assure complete security.

Every man and every dollar necessary for the defense of America, but not one man, not one dollar to fight the wars of other nations.

[From the Washington Times-Herald of October 30, 1939]

Another big fight in Congress on war and peace is scheduled to break out as soon as the problem of appropriating for national defense in the next fiscal year is opened up at the regular session.

Various peace societies and international leagues which have been trying to prevent a change in our neutrality program are going to attack the administration's proposals for admittedly tremendous expenditures for the Army and Navy as leading to "inevitable war."

Their main line of argument is that no possible combination of forces loose in the world can move into our hemisphere with sufficient power to crush the United States Navy as it stands today. The Army is already the beneficiary of 5 years' superexpenditure for new weapons and training, so the only excuse for further expansion, they argue, is preparation to send forces overseas.

CAN'T QUARREL WITH PEACEMONGERS

We can't quarrel outright with any peacemongers. The more people who talk about peace, the better. But we do feel these societies could spend more of their energy on making peace efforts in London, Berlin, and Paris, since they are international-minded, and less in trying to gum the works here without evidence to back their suspicions.

The people of the United States have a pretty good system of checking up on the experts of national defense, the generals and admirals, before giving them money.

In the first place, standing committees of House and Senate, made up of men who have spent years studying military matters, call the admirals and generals before them to demand evidence and testimony justifying every request for money. When the hearings are completed, a full printed record is published for all the world to read. And when the committees' work is done and appropriation bills offered, both Houses of Congress debate the proposals publicly and for the records. There are no secret appropriations here nor any possibility of a serious conspiracy to organize an expeditionary army unbeknownst to all of us.

WOODRING'S SPEECH NEEDS PUBLICITY

Aside from the machinery of Congress to check loose-running generals, a pretty good idea of the Army's self-discipline and realization of the country's feelings can be gathered from looking over a speech Secretary of War Harry Woodring made to the National Guard Association in Baltimore. That speech, what with the City of Flint maneuvers, didn't get half as much attention as it deserved, so we quote rather liberally from it for the especial consideration of those who fear we may spend ourselves into an expedition of France:

"We must not stand idly by while amateur strategists pronounce war's inevitability. As a nation we are not prepared for the formation of expeditions to wage offensive war, we do not wish to wage offensive war, we see no intevitable war, offensive or defensive."

Mr. Woodring certainly expresses the average man's feeling there, and as a member of the President's Cabinet he is bound to be speaking for the administration, too. We are not prepared to fight a foreign war, mentally, financially, or physically. It's not on the books. We can't do it. And everybody who isn't day dreaming knows that.

"Those who preach the inevitability of war are prone to interpret every purely precautionary and defensive measure taken by the Government as likely—if not deliberately intended—to lead the American people into war."

That's true, too. People lacking the won't power to keep on insisting we can stay out of war find it easy to slide right on into agreeing that somebody can shove us into war even though we are against going. Nothing could be sillier. As long as the people of the United States let the Government know they refuse to fight a foreign war, no government can trick them into it, no matter how it might try. Mr. Woodring speaks a language we can all understand in saying:

"There is no man in public life today who is more determined than your Secretary of War that your sons and my sons shall not march forth to war."

How much stronger can a man put his pledge against entanglement? There is only one way to interpret Mr. Woodring's speech—that he speaks for the administration and for the Army in promising to keep us out of Europe's war, no matter who "wins" or loses.

On that promise, common sense argues that we must not get too excited when the military appropriations—and they will be staggering—are rolled out before us in January.

Plain common sense tells us that preparedness against the worst is our safest course for continued peace.

Investigation of Un-American Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOE STARNES

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. MARTIN DIES, OF TEXAS

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered recently over the radio by Hon. MARTIN DIES:

At the very beginning of our investigation into un-American activities, I made it clear that I would not embark upon the work of our committee with any spirit of partisanship or fear. Again, when the House of Representatives, by the overwhelming vote of 344 to 35, continued the life of our committee, I stated on the floor of the House that I would not permit considerations of political partisanship or fear of powerful groups to interfere in any manner with giving the American people all the facts about the subversive agencies and activities which our investigation might disclose. I made a covenant with the American people that I would keep faith with them, and with them alone, on a matter which rises above all party interests and considerations.

I am a Democrat and expect to remain a Democrat as long as I live. With us in Texas, the Democratic Party is a political habit of which we are proud. My father before me represented the State of Texas in the Congress of the United States for 10 years. When a great national issue was before the Congress and the American people 20 years ago, he did not hesitate to break with the leaders of his party when his conscience persuaded him that the interests of his country transcended those of his party. I would be faithless to my father's memory and to my public trust if I failed to put America first. I cannot and will not bow to the leadership of my own political party when my conscience tells me that the vital interests of America and the views of my party's leadership are in conflict.

I know that you will understand me when I say that I have been deeply grieved by the President's characterization of the procedures of our committee as "sordid." I have not sought and will not now enter into controversy with the Chief Executive of my Government. Neither will I say that my wisdom and judgment are superior to his, but I do know that the Federal Government has Communists in key positions, and nothing will deter me from exposing them to the people. I know, furthermore, that there are hundreds, yes, thousands, of members of the Communist-controlled organizations scattered throughout the departments and agencies of our Federal Government, and nothing will deter me from apprising the American people of this fact.

There is nothing new about this latest attack by the administration upon the work of our committee, nothing new except the occasion which prompted it. I profoundly regret that the President and all the members of his Cabinet have not from the beginning supported our committee with that same unanimity of support which we have received from the people of this country. I am as pained as the Communists and their fellow travelers are pleased at the President's continued unfriendliness toward our committee. I wish it were otherwise, and I am compelled to state that, unless there is a change in the administration's attitude, it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for our committee to produce the results which the country has every reason to expect.

When a list of leaders of the German-American Bund was made public by our committee, there was no charge of sordid procedures. When a mailing list of William Dudley Pelley's Silver Shirts was spread upon the record, there was no charge of sordid procedures. Why then this sudden fury of attack upon the procedures of our committee when the membership of more than 500 officials and employees of the Federal Government in the Communist-controlled American League for Peace and Democracy is disclosed to the American people?

The list of Federal employees which went into our record this week was a membership list obtained from the Washington branch of the American League. Mr. Lamberton, chairman of the Washington branch, testified before the committee that there are 700 Government employees who are members of the league. But the list we secured from him only contained the names of 563 Government employee. We did not say that the members of this organization are members of the Communist Party. Leaders of the Communist Party, like leaders of the German-American Bund, say that they have destroyed their membership lists for fear of exposure. Therefore, it is impossible to prove who are the members of the Communist Party by membership records which do not exist. In this circumstance, we must resort to the next best proof, such as the testimony of former Communists as to who are members, the writings and activities which disclose that persons follow the Communist Party line, and membership in organizations, such as the American League, which are shown to be Communist controlled.

Can it be true that some of the names on that membership list were too big for release to the public? Can it be true that anyone wants the American people kept in the dark with respect to the connections, innocent or otherwise, of high-salaried executives with organizations which the Communist Party has set up for purposes that are utterly un-American? You, the American people, pay the salaries of these Government employees. You are entitled to know such facts about their connections with a Communist-controlled "front," as we are able to bring to light.

In the conduct of our investigation into Communist tactics, aims, and agencies, we refuse to single out the poor and illiterate citizens of our country who have been caught in the toils of the Communist network. If we are not free to reveal the identity of the parlor pets of Moscow who plot the overthrow of our Government over their teacups, then we can have no investigation worthy of the name. Furthermore, I wish to serve notice upon the country and upon the administration that if I am to remain as chairman of this investigation into un-American activities, and if this investigation is to be continued—which is necessary—I will not stop in the pursuit of the facts, at the outskirts of official Washington. I, for one, will have no part in an inquiry which spends all of its time on the subversive activities of private citizens and is afraid to enter the tax-supported officialdom of the Nation's Capital.

Now, let us see if the disclosure of the names of these 500 Federal employees who are members of the American League for Peace and Democracy was a "sordid procedure." I think we can all agree that it is, indeed, a sordid thing for a man to take his salary from one government and then allow himself to be used by an organization that was established to serve the interests of another government. I think we can all agree that it is a sordid thing to have as many as 500 such persons on the pay roll of the United States Government. Furthermore, I believe we can all agree that it was a disagreeable necessity for any committee of the United States Congress to reveal this fact to the American people.

Now, as to the history and the character of the American League for Peace and Democracy, let us take a look at some of the facts of record. Since the beginning of the life of our committee, nine Members of the House of Representatives have participated in our investigation. Every one of these nine men has had the opportunity of weighing the facts about the American League, and every one of the nine is now on record in branding the organization as a "front" of the Communist Party. During the present year two Members have been placed on our committee to fill vacancies which had occurred. Both of these new members had voted against the continuation of our committee last January, and both were appointed by the Speaker of the House whose loyalty to the administration has not be questioned. I wish to emphasize that these two new appointees to our committee, along with the others who have served with us, have gone on record with respect to the Communist control of the American League.

According to its own publications, the American League for Peace and Democracy was originated at the Amsterdam World Congress Against War in 1932. That Congress was convened on the call of the famous French Communist, Henri Barbusse, acting under instructions of the Communist International. It was attended by 2,196 delegates, of whom 830 were avowed members of the various Communist parties of the world. In addition to these avowed Communists, there were 291 delegates who styled themselves Social Democrats but whose position, according to their own proclamation, was in complete agreement with the Communists. These alleged Social Democrats pledged themselves to work for civil war in their respective countries in the event of another international conflict. The Amsterdam Congress unanimously adopted a program which declared that it would not allow the Soviet Union "to be touched." This program was adopted as its own by the American section of the world committee which was set up at Amsterdam.

The American section of the Amsterdam movement called itself the American Committee for the Struggle Against War. It was this committee which called the first United States Congress Against War, at which the founding of the American League Against War and Fascism took place.

The first national chairman and one of the first executive secretaries of the American League testified before our committee that the league was Communist-originated and Communist-controlled. They explained the exact manner in which the Communist Party sets up a "front" organization and controls it.

In three successive programs adopted by the annual congresses of the American League, the organization boldly declared its first objective to be the work of sabotage of our national defense. Point 1 in these programs stated:

"To work toward the stopping of the manufacture and transport of munitions and all other materials essential to the conduct of war."

At its second annual congress, Harry F. Ward, present national chairman of the American League, declared that this program was "sound." Shortly before that, the vice chairman of the American League, Earl Browder (who was also general secretary of the Communist Party at that time), had gone in person to Moscow to report to the executive committee of the Communist International that the program of the American League was "politically satisfactory."

Browder, the vice chairman of the league, also described the league, when he was in Moscow, as "our most successful application of the united front."

According to one of the recent minutes of the Washington branch of the American League, it was decided "to set up league committees in the unions of Government agencies with our present membership in those agencies as a nucleus." These nuclei of the league are now formed in more than a score of Government agencies, including one nucleus in the navy yard.

Both the financial secretary of the Communist Party of the United States, Mr. William Weiner, and the national chairman of the American League for Peace and Democracy, Dr. Harry F. Ward, testified under oath before our committee that the Communist Party is the only national organization which contributes any apprecible sum of money to the work of the American League. This amounts to two or three thousand dollars annually, according to these two witnesses, and represents approximately 15 percent of the total annual budget of the American League. This financial contribution from the Communist Party has continued down to the present moment, despite the fact that the Communist Party formally severed, for tactical reasons, its affiliation with the American League almost 2 years ago.

The Chicago branch of the American League for Peace and Democracy sent out a letter in which its executive secretary boosted the Communist Party's newspaper, the Midwest Daily Record. The secretary wrote:

"I have sent you about a dozen copies of the May 10 Record under separate cover. I am sending copies of this issue to all our branches, calling attention to the invaluable role of the Midwest Record in this important phase of our activity and urging their support by subscriptions, etc. It is a shame that the Midwest Record does not have one hundred times its present circulation."

When the American League backs an avowed Communist Party publication in that manner, it is clear that the league and the party have a link with each other that the leaders of the two outfits have attempted to conceal from the public.

A member of the national committee of the American League appeared before our committee and told how a radio speech which she had been asked to deliver under the auspices of the American League was completely revised by the secretary of the Communist Party of the State of Wisconsin.

It is of the highest significance that among the changes which the secretary of the Wisconsin Communist Party made in the radio address of this national committeewoman of the American League was the deletion of uncomplimentary references to Adolf Hitler who has now become linked in alliances with the "red fuehrer" of Moscow.

If any further evidence were needed to stamp the American League with the Communist Party label, it is found in the amazing statement on the Soviet-Nazi pact prepared by the Washington (D. C.) branch of the American League. This statement reads, in part, as follows:

"This pact is a real contribution to world peace and to the peace and security of the United States. * * * The signing of the nonaggression pact between the U. S. S. R. and Germany is not a war alliance between the two powers. It is not an agreement for the partition of Poland. * * * In this sense the pact between the U. S. S. R. and Germany is the only real contribution to the security of Poland that has been made to date. * * * In doing this, the Soviet Union has made a real contribution to an understanding of the present crisis in Europe. It has made a real contribution to the peace and security of Europe, the world, and the United States."

During the present year one of the vice chairmen of the American League resigned his position in this Communist "front" organization in order to accept an appointment by the administration as secretary of the Virgin Islands. For years this man served with Earl Browder as cochairman of the American League.

Conceived in Moscow, delivered in Amsterdam, nourished in its infancy in America by the famous French Communist, Henri Barbusse, the American League for Peace and Democracy has from its beginning served the interests of the Soviet Government. It has been the chief "transmission belt" for drawing "innocents" into the united front network of the Communist Party. It has fostered sabotage in our basic and war industries. It was intended to serve as a reserve force for the espionage activities of the Communist Party. It was intended as a recruiting agency for spies of the Soviet Government in the United States.

Under the slogan of peace inscribed on its shield, it has enabled the Communist conspiracy to invade our peace. Behind its banner on which is written the word democracy, it has marshalled the forces which sap the foundations of our democracy. Its constant aim has been to break down our defense against the coming Soviet attack on civilization. The American League, in short, is simply the Communist Party traveling on one of its many false passports under the aliases of peace and democracy.

It is high time that innocent and gullible people who call themselves liberals begin to learn to discriminate between organizations that are controlled by the Communist Party for its own purposes—the purposes of Stalin—and organizations which truly represent legitimate American interest. It is high time that leaders in government and trade-unions cease lending their names as propaganda assets to the Communist Party and its front organizations. Otherwise they must be prepared to take full responsibility for their connections with these un-American and subversive groups. For any of our leading citizens to continue to play into the hands of the Communist Party, after the true nature of the front organizations has been made clear by our committee, properly opens them to the suspicion of being closer to the Communist Party and its line than they are willing for the public to know. The decision rests with them. Our committee should continue fearlessly to make public the facts, regardless of the high positions which the persons affected may hold in government, trade-unions, or elsewhere.

I believe that more consideration is due the person who openly and aboveboard accepts a Communist Party membership card than is due the fellow traveler who conceals his real political alinement from the public by professing to be interested only in the advancement of worthy causes, such as peace and democracy. Abundant testimony before our committee has made it clear that one of the tactics of the Communist Party is to use strategically placed persons who do not hold party membership cards but who follow, just as faithfully as those who do, the line laid down by the foreign office of the Soviet Union.

The time has come for us to consider the necessity of continuing this investigation which will shortly expire and strengthening our laws to cope with the agents of foreign governments who are engaged in subversive activities here. In dealing with a thousand matters that affect our national life but which are not more important than the matter of subversive activity, we are accustomed to bring together the best experts in the land who are provided with all the necessary resources for framing legislation that will protect our national heritage. Our forest, our mines, our transportation and communications, our public health, and our education are matters upon which we expend stupendous funds and expert knowledge in order that they may be administered for the common good. Surely we must do as much for the protection of our priceless heritage of freedom and democracy. The Nation must be informed by fearless investigation of every menace of those who would steal from us this heritage of free men—the menace of those who hate the Bill of Rights even while they are clamoring for its protection from the exposure of their own misdeeds.

In urging that we begin to consider the necessity for continuing this investigation, I wish to make it clear that great as is the necessity for continuation I had rather see the committee expire on January 3 than to be a party to a cowardly whitewash. I think, therefore, that the time has come when the country and those in control of the Government should determine whether or not we shall be permitted to continue the investigation along fearless and nonpartisan lines or be constantly handicapped, embarrassed, and thwarted by Washington officialdom. In order to make the issue perfectly clear, I here and now declare that I will have no part in any other kind of investigation. I do not want the House of Representatives and the administration to continue the investigation on any other assumption. Since we must also begin to consider the necessity for framing more effective legislation against subversive elements, I desire to add that it is equally important for us to exercise eternal vigilance against the temptation to resort to repressive measures that would detract from the dignified strength of free men. This is no hour for panic. We are not afraid. Dictatorial methods are the hastily improvised devices of cowards and weaklings. Liberty is born of the confidence of strong men. Our American democracy must continue to demonstrate the capacity of man for self-government—with tolerance for all that is nationally tolerable, and without fear in exposing and punishing that which is nationally intolerable.

There must be a new insight into the true meaning of liberalism. Whether men call themselves conservatives or progressives, all those who love America and its free institutions can unite on a platform of liberty. Of one thing we may be certain, conservatives and progressives alike, and that is that economic security and economic progress depends upon the preservation of liberty, upon maintaining inviolate the Bill of Rights. Many peoples in the modern world have sacrificed their hard-won liberty in the pursuit of economic security. They have been rudely awakened to find that both their liberty and their economic security are gone. They have followed demagogues who promised them economic security in exchange for their liberty. They have found, at the end of that road, that their economic insecurity is multiplied a hundred times in the loss of their liberty. All those who believe that liberty is the keystone in the arch of our social structure are true liberals. They may call themselves conservatives or they may call themselves progressives, but together they can unite in rejecting all forms of totalitarianism.

To the people of America I refer my case. After all, this is your investigation, and if you want it continued along honest, courageous, and nonpartisan lines; if you want those in high positions as well as those in low positions exposed when they are guilty; if you agree with me that this is no time for concealment or soft-pedaling on account of partisan interests, you have but to make known your views and wishes to your servants in Washington. As for me, I shall not swerve from the path of duty as God gives me the light to see it.

May the God of our fathers vouchsafe to us the light and the strength to keep America the land of the free.

The Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

ADDRESS BY WILLIAM J. GROSS

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, one of my best friends and most distinguished constituents, William J. Gross, editorial editor of the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel, and a member of the Republican program committee, has won wide acclaim for his courageous and potent editorials on the neutrality question. His views on the embargo issue are contained in the following speech, which he delivered before an overflow meeting of the Allen County Republican Club, of Fort Wayne, on October 18, 1939:

KEEP THE EMBARGO

It is with deep regret that I have observed on the part of many of my fellow Republicans, usually alert to contemporary challenges, a certain apathy toward what is unquestionably the most momentous issue to confront the American people since the great League of Nations debate and the ensuing "great and solemn referendum" of 1920. * * *

I cannot be unmindful of the fact that there presently exists a great temptation for a great many persons, weary of the New Deal's futile struggle against the continuing crisis in our home affairs, to seek escape in the war crisis in far-off Europe. But those who would continue to lead a free party in defense of a free people should combat this deadly mesmeric trend toward surrender to the combined pressures of propaganda and desperation.

For it is appallingly evident that our complex problems here in the United States are being cruelly consigned to the limbo of neglect, as the administration at Washington shrewdly avails itself of every instrumentality to expedite a public absorption in a war 3,000 miles away. Unemployment, farm prices, mortgage foreclosures, idle capital, idle factory capacity are no longer topics of rational concern by those charged with the weighty responsibility of steering this great Republic through the economic crisis that sprang directly from the last World War, in which the last Democratic administration needlessly enlisted the United States as a participant.

There are even ominous and cold-blooded suggestions that a war boom would help to solve these problems which grew out of another war boom. In the direction of this drift lies disaster for America.

In such an hour the Republican Party and its leaders and spokesmen can have no more urgent mission than to repudiate the vicious and stupid idea that we cannot possibly solve our domestic problems without resort to the temporary and artificial stimulus to business that results from American boys wading into the slaughter pens of Europe to be butchered like brute beasts.

In such an hour the Republican Party and its leaders and spokesmen can have no more urgent obligation than to issue solemn warnings against a policy of inviting a business boom based upon a volume of exports which cannot indefinitely be maintained—a boom which will collapse the minute peace comes or our customers exhaust their ability to buy.

Just as a practical political proposition, do you suppose for a single minute that this political-minded, power-grasping administration at Washington will sit by and permit such a collapse before the 1940 elections if the price to pay means only transformation of our blood business from a cash to a credit or loan basis—or even if it means sending American troops to hold up the props of its synthetic prosperity?

There is nothing in our history to indicate that the present administration would do other than its Democratic predecessor, the Wilson administration, did. In all this talk of "cash and carry," let's not forget that we started out in 1914 on at least the "cash" part of this scheme. President Wilson strongly opposed any loans for the Allies at the beginning of that war of a quarter century ago. But he was eager to have the cash business in order to lift the country out of the trough of panic into which it had been plunged by drastic tariff slashes under the Democratic Underwood bill of 1913. And once the old blood-business boom got started, there was acquisition of such a tremendous American vested interest in Europe's slaughterhouse activities, that Wilson dared not risk slipping into an even worse panic by suddenly transferring our national economy from a war to a peace basis.

So Wilson (first secretly, then openly) relaxed the restrictions on loans and credits; and the vested interests of the munitions makers and others kept growing and growing. At length, to make a long story short, our nauseatingly pro-British Ambassador to Great Britain, the late Walter Hines Page, sent his famous cablegram, from which I quote:

"London.—The financial inquiries made here reveal an international condition most alarming to the American financial and industrial outlook * * *. She cannot continue her present large purchases in the United States * * *. Orders by all the Allied Governments will be reduced * * *. This will of course cause a panic in the United States * * *. This condition may soon come suddenly unless action is quickly taken to prevent it. France and England must have a large enough credit in the United States to prevent the collapse of world trade and of the whole European finance * * *. If we should go to war with Germany, the greatest help we could give the Allies would be credit * * *. All the money would be kept in our own country * * *."

(Note the honeyed bait offered to support what President Roosevelt today guilefully calls "the material point of view.")

"All the money," said Page, "would be kept in our own country, trade would be continued and enlarged until the war ends, and after the war Europe would continue to buy food and would buy from us also an enormous supply of things to reequip her peace industries. We should thus reap the profit of an uninterrupted, perhaps an enlarging, trade over a number of years, and we should hold their securities in payment."

(Yeah, we're still holding them—in default.)

Continued Ambassador Page: "Unless we go to war with Germany our Government, of course, cannot make such a direct grant of credit * * *. I think that the pressure of this approaching crisis has gone beyond the ability of the Morgan financial agency for the British and French Governments. The need is becoming too great for any private agency to meet * * *. Perhaps our going to war is the only way in which our present prominent trade position can be maintained and a panic averted * * *."

Were there, you ask, no minds shrewd enough to see through this ghastly fallacy? Yes; there were. But then, as now, the propaganda was scattering hysteria throughout the land; and greed was blended with lofty idealism to perfume a stinking charnelhouse and give it the appearance of holiness.

From this and from whole volumes of evidence available to any citizen who is not too lazy to consult it, there emerges clear proof that our aid and favor for the Allies from 1914 to 1916 led to a very considerable war boom and inflation. This boom extended, of course, beyond munitions to auxiliary supplies and equipment, as well as to agricultural products. But it was the munitions trade which supplied the spark plug actuating the disastrous inflationary movement. Such a policy, if repeated now, cannot help but produce an identical or similar situation.

So much by way of a pitifully brief summary of the long, complex story of what catapulted us into Europe's slaughter pens 23 years ago—a story which stands as an indelible indictment of the same internationalist forces now so frenziedly laboring to chain this Republic once more to the imperial chariot wheels of a Britain from which, by the grace of God and the high courage of patriots, we once won our independence. * * *

America has—if she will not spurn it—a great and lofty destiny. I believe we are yet to bring about on this continent a further extension of our already promising beginning—an evolution of a new and workable system of liberty and happiness and human brotherhood. But if we are to realize that purpose and achieve that destiny, we shall have need of the best and strongest of our sons.

All of us have cherished the great American dream of a great and happy America peopled with strong and confident men and women. I do not want to see that dream butchered and gassed to death on ancient Old World battlefields in a quarrel over frontiers and boundaries—battlefields unworthy of being even the death place of a free-born American.

I do not wish to see another generation of boys—many of whom have not yet been permitted to enjoy the normal operation of American institutions (thanks to the "red" bunglers who have operated from the White House since 1933)—I do not wish, I say, to see another generation of American boys come home in flag-draped coffins, or wracked with wounds, or coughing blood from gas-rotted lungs, or shell-shocked into lifelong feeble-mindedness. I do not wish to see the rest of that straggling company along "the road back" from another war overwhelmed by the revolutionary excesses which another great post-war economic collapse must surely precipitate.

So let me say at once that not a shred of sound argument supports the claim that we need the help of either the British Navy or the French Army to defend this Nation or this hemisphere. There is no real sanction by any real military expert to support any such contention.

As for the hysterical fear that Nazi doctrines and Nazi concepts of government might somehow overwhelm us if we don't rush overseas to stamp them out, that's just plain silly. It is silly because, in the first place, under this administration's so-called industrial mobilization plan, the very moment we enter a war we come under a complete, out-and-out Fascist military dictatorship, with Hitlerism fully enthroned at Washington in the person of the President, who for all these many years has been surrounded by an insolent coterie of pro-Soviet advisers. Thus the moment we go a-crusading for democracy we will have scrapped democracy for an indeterminate period—not for the duration of the war but "until 6 months after the President shall have proclaimed the end of the emergency." In the second place, Nazi doctrines and the Nazi way of life do not flourish naturally in a nation that is economically stable and reasonably prosperous. But the dislocations of another great war, with its debt, inflation, and post-war collapse, would plant the seeds of nazi-ism—and after that of Godless communism—in fertile soil. There is no better way of inviting nazi-ism, or worse, into this country than to destroy America's internal resistance by engagement in a costly and futile involvement in other people's imperialist wars.

If we fall for the preposterous progaganda of the British Empire and its associated hate-saturated seekers of revenge against Hitlerism, we shall be overlooking some mighty important considerations. The first is that all that is said about the necessity of crushing Hitlerism was said once before about crushing Kaiserism—an effort which produced Hitlerism. The second consideration is that we are still holding the bag for the money we advanced to this same British Empire and its French associates in the last war, by which they enormously increased their empires' flar-flung holdings. And the third consideration is that both these empires are guilty of all the brute force, bad faith, injustice, oppression, and persecution which they are now so eloquently pleading against the Nazis. * * *

But even assuming academically, and purely for purposes of argument, that our national interest would be well served by joining up with imperial France and Britain, why not be frank and honest about the whole thing? Why deceive the people? Why talk about peace while whetting a sword? Why not toss in the wastebasket all the trumped-up symbols of hate, the phony issues and pious fol-de-rol about "real neutrality"?

Then once having been honest with ourselves and the people, let's frankly face certain inescapable eventualities which our participation in the war will bring:

First. The disappearance of every vestige of free, republican government for a generation; the substitution of a one-man, one-party, bastard American version of Nazi-communism; the indefinite suspension of free institutions, including all civil liberties, free speech, free press, etc.

Second. The certainty of dead and mangled and insane young men at a time when we should be having a strong, healthy manhood to accomplish our eventual redemption.

Third. The collapse of the institutions of private property, as debt, inflation, and repudiation smash our economy and open the way to a collectivist economy from which, if experience is any guide, disillusionment, lax morals, irreligion, atheism, and cynicism combine to propel us into a sinister world dictatorship allied with the Moscow Kremlin.

Then, facing those eventualities, let us finally ask ourselves, before taking a single step, this question: "Is it worth it?"

As we ponder that question let us note that already Britain has served notice that the forthcoming elections will not be held in that country until further notice. Let us note that France is under a complete dictatorship. Let us be certain that if we don't go directly and officially into war ourselves before the 1940 elections we will have built up out of the munitions racket a spurious prosperity which is very likely to perpetuate the Roosevelt regime in office. And let us be equally certain that once elected to a third term Roosevelt will, either from choice or the necessities of irresistible economic pressure, take us quickly into the slaughter pens. That will mean the industrial mobilization plan and dictatorship. It will mean not only the end of our Republican Party, but the end of the Republic itself.

Isn't it about time we did something about this business? For too long now we have been just talking about it.

In conclusion, I permit myself some strong language. The hour approaches when free speech may be a thing of the past, so we had better make the most of our lingering opportunities.

For years the "red" trail left by missionaries of the godless Kremlin has crossed the White House lawn and recrossed the White House portico. It is a trail of systematically planned violence, dressed up in the garments of social reform. It is a trail of enmity for everything that has contributed to the greatness of the Republic. Unless the meanderings of the beast which has left that trail be promptly halted it will devour the soul of our republican democracy in the hell of its hate-inspired war. It will feast upon the carrion of our sons and befoul every sanctuary which their sires and grandsires have held sacred.

If there must be war, let it be waged—and bloodlessly—against the forces which intend the attack to our own citadels, not a blood-letting, enervating, futile contest waged 3,000 miles away. With God as my judge, I say to you with the deepest of conviction that our frontier is not upon the Rhine but upon the Potomac.

I do not plead for violence. I plead for the bloodless force of an awakened party conscience, an awakened American spirit, proud of its heritage, scornful of the spurious pretenses of those who would identify our interest with greed for a fool's gold which already has imposed great penalties upon us. Let us stay the hand of the madmen who would commit our sons to a new blood bath in the slaughterhouses of Old World hatreds, and thereby rob our sons and our son's sons of the immeasurable blessings which our fathers bequeathed to us.

Our course as patriots is clear. We must rip off the disguises of this pending proposal to scrap the prohibitions on the munitions racket. We must stay out of Europe and Asia, which would drain our blood, our manhood, and our wealth forever. We must concentrate on making free, representative, republican democracy work here in the last great industrial nation which has a chance of making it work in the modern machine world.

We must preserve our civil liberties and the American concept of life and government. We must keep ourselves in readiness to render effectively healing aid to a stricken world when both victor and vanquished shall have collapsed. We must defend the American continent and provide the national defenses necessary for that purpose rather than ship those defenses miles away for the service of others.

We must, therefore, keep the embargo on armaments, while enacting all the other features of the pending measure designed to reduce incidents likely to lead to war. We should limit the trade in other commodities to a strict cash-and-carry basis.

Fellow Republicans, we have a great opportunity to build up a secure intercontinental economy here in the West. We can provide an army and navy to defend it for a fraction of the cost of our involvement in a war 3,000 miles or more away. We can find better solutions for our domestic problems than the employment resulting from trade dependent upon butchery across the ocean.

We can use our idle manpower, productive capacity, and idle capital to restore the base of our natural resources; to rehabilitate and conserve our human resources; to develop this great hemisphere into the greatest and happiest homeland of humanity the world has ever seen. Do we seek a "rendezvous with destiny"? Then let us keep that rendezvous here in the great West of boundless promise and opportunity—the dynamic America of our dearest dreams and, please God, of our indomitable faith.

Martin Luther

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHESTER H. GROSS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST OF OCTOBER 31, 1939

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, today we celebrate the four hundred and twenty-second anniversary of Martin Luther nailing his 95 theses to the church door in Wittenberg. This was one of the greatest events in the world's religious history. It was probably one of the turning points in the world's history. It meant religious tolerance and liberty to millions of souls in that day and it means the same today. It was probably the greatest contribution to the development of democracy in the world. If Martin Luther were living today I am sure he would be pointing to the same Bible he opened 422 years ago. And I am convinced he would be saying "Herein lies the solution to your present problems."

Mr. Speaker, I include an editorial appearing in this morning's Washington Post:

[From the Washington Post of October 31, 1939]

FOUR HUNDRED TWENTY-TWO YEARS LATER

It was 422 years ago today that Martin Luther nailed his famous 95 theses to the door of the Castle church in Wittenberg.

That event was one of the great turning points in the history of modern times. It shattered the doctrinal unity which had existed in Christendom. But it also helped to bring about the liberation of the individual and thus contributed mightily to the development of democracy in the Western World.

Luther himself did not always understand the fullest implications of his own position. That freedom of interpretation which he espoused for himself he was not always prepared to extend to others. Great as he was the forces which he helped unleash and to which he gave direction were greater than he.

Vast doctrinal differences still divide Christendom. Creeds and sects are multitudinous. But in the face of the evil forces that seek to undermine conscience and freedom, that reduce the individual to the status of an obedient cog in an all-important machine operated by an all-powerful dictator, there has been an inevitable drawing together of all religious elements.

Past differences, real though they continue to be, are today overshadowed by the common heritage, common aspirations, and a common allegiance to the great ethical ideals which underlie the divergent sects and creeds. And it is these aspirations and ideals which are now in mortal danger from those powerful forces which threaten to destroy all civilization.

As a fighter for freedom of conscience, Luther made a contribution to human development which not only his direct followers but all who believe in religion have need to defend with all the force at their command.

Neutrality and the Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE, OF INDIANA

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including the following excerpts from a radio address delivered by myself over station WOWO, Fort Wayne, Ind., on the evening of September 18. The occasion was the annual celebration of Constitution Week. The partial text follows:

Fellow citizens, 8 months ago on the floor of the House of Representatives in Washington, I took an oath to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States. I took that oath as I became a Member of Congress. I took it seriously and solemnly.

Tonight it is my distinct honor to speak to you on the anniversary of the first Constitution Week, 152 years ago, when the fathers of our Republic gave to our country and to all mankind the first draft of our Federal Constitution. * * *

In these days when there are, according to the latest reports, so many conspirators and influences spreading the dark doctrines of fascism, communism, and every other "ism" except patriotism, we need to teach all the people, without regard to race, color, or religion, that they are absolutely equal under the law and entitled to the protection of the Constitution.

Dangers to our Constitution in this our day lie not so much in violations of its prescriptions as in hostility to its fundamental purposes. During recent times attempts have been made to concentrate power and to subordinate departments of government to the Executive. These efforts have been very promptly and very successfully resisted. We must continue to resist them.

I am one of those who believe that the Constitution of the United States will never be destroyed, and I want to point out one significant and encouraging fact in this connection. There is not today a single community in the United States where any man could be elected to office on a platform advocating a change in our form of government.

At this moment when the countries of Europe are in the throes of a tragic, senseless war, or governed by dictators who suppress all liberty of speech and religion, our prime obligation is to preserve our rights under the Constitution, strengthen our neutrality laws, and retain our strong will for peace. We ourselves never want to engage in another war. And we will stay out if we have the will to stay out.

During the last few days I have received hundreds of letters from citizens in every part of northeastern Indiana urging me to stand firm in my support of the embargo provision of the present Neutrality Act. Many of the writers were mothers of boys of soldier age who are hoping and praying that their sons will not have to be sacrificed on foreign battlefields.

To these mothers—and to all my friends who have taken the trouble to write to me—I wish to say, I am going back to Washington tomorrow prepared to do everything in my power to keep the United States at peace.

It is my sincere conviction, and the conviction of many thinking people, that the best way to accomplish this is to avoid taking sides in the European conflict, regardless of our sympathies for the democracies.

We must keep the embargo on arms and munitions. We must never again permit war profiteers to sell instruments of death and destruction to favored nations.

Why should anyone make a profit out of the tears, the blood, and the agony of nations engaged in war? Why should we sell army or navy planes or munitions or armaments to nations with whom we may ourselves sometime become involved in war?

Let us have real neutrality. Let us keep the law which makes it a crime to sell arms, munitions, and war materials to belligerent nations. Let that be the American doctrine.

In my judgment, the United States will not repeat the mistake of 1917. We have learned our lesson. We know that the quarrels of Europe are not our quarrels, that the life of one American soldier is worth more than all the blood money of munitions makers the world over.

What we need most of all today is faith in our institutions and the courage to maintain strict neutrality. Faith and courage. We live in the land of the free. Let us see to it that we stay free.

I thank you.

Another Instance of the Administration's Duplicity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the President and his Corn-Wallace Secretary of Agriculture may think they are successful in not letting "thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth," when dealing with the farmer; but the farmers are not the "hicks" that politicians and some city folks think them to be. By nature, because of many "trimmings," they are suspicious of the "city slicker" or the politician who comes bearing gifts.

When Roosevelt first began to play Santa Claus they wondered what it was all about. Some of them took the checks passed out, which represented a small proportion of the money which they and their small-town neighbors contributed to the Federal Government—after, of course, the politicians had taken a rake-off—but they were looking for something rotten in Denmark somewhere. And the trade treaties have at last shown them that Roosevelt and his "brain trusters" are more interested in a good-neighbor policy which may for the moment work to the advantage of the industrialists' foreign market, but which will in the end destroy the industrialists' home market—the farmers' buying power.

And they have now discovered that Roosevelt is aiding his friend John L. Lewis, with his C. I. O., who are

SKIMMING THE MILK

Grandmother poured the milk in shallow, wide pans, put it down cellar so the cream might rise to the top and be readily skimmed off for the making of butter. A farm hand who liked milk but preferred cream would slip down and with a saucer skim the milk and drink the cream. Grandmother thought he was getting a little more than his share as well as upsetting her program for butter making.

Today the factory worker is demanding and receiving higher wages and shorter hours while the farmer who feeds him has been seeing his prices go lower and his hours of work remain as before. The factory man demands and gets a 42-or-less-hour week, a 30-cent-per-hour minimum wage. The farmer many times is busy from sunup to sundown, not 5 but 6 days a week, and Sundays he does the chores, feeds and milks the cows, dairying being a 7-day-a-week industry. Nor is his return 30 cents per hour.

Just why should the unions limit the workers in industry to members of their organizations and by an increase in wages and a shortening of hours raise the prices on every single thing the farmer must buy, without a corresponding increase in the price to the farmer for his products? When is this one-sided skimming of milk (the cream off of the national income) in favor of the factory worker, to the disadvantage of the farmer, going to end? Not until farmers insist that, if there is a factory job open, when the factory worker is not satisfied with his job, he give the farmers a chance at it, and that they receive a comparatively fair price for their work. Not until the Government quits backing union racketeers (as distinguished from factory workers) and ends its inconsistent treatment of and discrimination against the farmers.

I am not finding fault with the wage paid the factory worker, but the wage the farmer receives should more nearly match it.

Government checks may or may not be handed out in future years, and the amount of those checks is always uncertain and their distribution subject to political favoritism.

Once destroyed, the farmer's market is gone for years. The farmer's home market, his domestic market, has always been his chief reliance. Upon it depends his day to day and year to year security. Let us keep the home market for the American farmer.

The argument that factory workers should receive a high wage in order that they may buy the farmer's products sounds all right but, if there is anything in it, we might just as well turn it around and say that by giving the farmer a fair price for what he raises he may buy what the factory worker produces. How about it? Why not try it? Why let the union man take all of the "cream"?

THE FARMER GETS IT IN THE NECK AGAIN

This administration is talking about a reciprocal-trade treaty with Argentina whereby the duty is to be reduced on farm products, among which are casein, linseed, flaxseed, vegetable oil, oleo oil, tallow, beef, veal, cheese, turkey, eggs, corn, broomcorn, grapes, pears, wools, and hides. All of the above are produced here in substantial quantities, perhaps not in your particular section of the country, but somewhere in the United States.

Chile seems a long way from Michigan, but with cheap Indian labor it grows beans, wonderful melons, peaches, and other fruits which under modern refrigeration reach American markets by the shipload.

In spite of the fact that the Social Welfare Commission of Michigan the past season purchased approximately 536,000 one-hundred-pound bags of beans, the Michigan carry-over of beans for 1939 is estimated to be at least 500,000 such bags.

The Department of Agriculture estimates the new crop for Michigan to be 4,205,000 bags, while for the past 10 years the average yearly consumption, seed requirements, and so forth, of Michigan is estimated at about 3,700,000 bags, which would give us a carry-over of 505,000 bags, or 50,500,000 pounds of beans for which there is no present market.

The administration has in mind a trade treaty with Chile which will permit the beans, melons, and fruits of that country to be sold in the farmer's market at a price which is less than his cost of production.

It is all very well for the New Deal to give the farmers checks for this, that, and the other, and no doubt those checks are welcome, but if in the end the market for the things which our farmers raise is destroyed by products brought in from foreign countries, where they are produced at starvation wages, is not the ultimate result disaster for the farmer?

It Is Time That Congress Took Back the Many Powers Granted to the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE BLOCK PAPERS

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, many editorials have been written upon the subject of the vast power which has been conferred upon the President of the United States, and many of our people are expressing their condemnation of the Congress because such great power has been given to the President. I am happy to express my freedom from any participation in this wild orgy of giving the President more power. I have advocated on many occasions that much of the power which the majority in the Congress has vested in the President should be removed and taken away from him. The people of our Nation are the rulers in this Republic, and may it ever be so.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and to include therein a very interesting editorial which appeared in the Block newspapers of recent date, which editorial should invite the careful attention of every Member of the Congress and which follows:

[From the Block newspapers]

IT IS TIME THAT CONGRESS TOOK BACK THE MANY POWERS GRANTED TO THE PRESIDENT

The United States is not at war. We are at peace and, if the will of the majority of our citizens prevails, we will remain at peace.

This being so, we cannot let the present conflict in Europe, however serious it may become to us, wholly overshadow our domestic welfare. We faced grave problems here at home before the war began; despite the war, these problems remain and we must deal with them.

We cannot forget the need for Government cooperation with business for the sake of recovery. We cannot forget the constantly increasing national debt and the necessity for Government economy to check the growth of the indebtedness. We cannot forget our ruinous tax laws. We cannot forget, above all, the real threat to our democratic form of government created by granting more and more power to the Executive, especially in times of so-called emergency.

Frank Gannett, prominent newspaper publisher and chairman of the National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government, recently called to the attention of the Members of Congress the wide dictatorial powers now held by the President.

Of particular importance are the powers whereby the President, without consulting Congress, may censor or close down radio stations, may close the banks and stock exchanges, may change, within limits, the gold content of the dollar, may raise or lower the tariffs, may control farmers' crops, and may do numberless things which should, in a democracy, remain in the hands of the people's representatives.

Further Executive powers, for example, allow the President to restrict trade and travel with foreign countries, to regulate foreign exchange, to extend or withhold money or work or farm relief, to seize or detain ships under certain circumstances, to require all silver to be delivered to the mint, to seize manufacturing plants which do not give precedence to Government contracts or which do not manufacture arms and munitions at a fair price, to requisition any vessel, and to do many other things wholly on his own authority.

It therefore becomes the duty of Congress to review fully all of the grants of power it has made to the President beyond those rightfully granted him by the Constitution. Democracy is threatened by totalitarian government in almost every quarter of the world today; it is consequently all the more important that we in this country assure ourselves that no one man possess sufficient authority to undermine the precious heritage of our free government.

The Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

LETTER FROM W. B. SWANEY

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from Hon. W. B. Swaney, of Chattanooga, Tenn.:

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., October 25, 1939.

Hon. ESTES KEFAUVER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR ESTES: I am in receipt of your letter of recent date requesting that I give you my opinion in regard to the Embargo Act.

As you know, I have been an assiduous student of the life and teachings of Thomas Jefferson for many years and have written on that subject to some extent.

In my judgment, there should be no question about the policy of the United States at this time, and that the Embargo Act should be repealed.

The United States is in a very different position to what it was in 1807 when the first embargo law was enacted during Jefferson's administration. I have read an account of this given by Claude G. Bowers who is an authority on this phase of Jefferson's life and teachings. His latest great book being Jefferson in Power. Also the volume entitled "The Jeffersonian System" written by Edward Channing, which treats the matter fairly and impartially, as well as other authors on this subject.

To begin with, at the time of Jefferson's embargo he had to deal with both England and France, both of which great nations would not consider the United States as having reached the dignity of a nation worthy of notice. Both treated the United States with contempt and disregarded our rights upon the high seas.

The history of Jefferson's embargo shows conclusively that it was not enforced and could not be enforced, and, in my judgment, the present embargo cannot be enforced.

The United States is now a world power, and both the English and French Governments represent the same set of ideas which have been developed in this country, and the reflex action has caused both England and France to become more democratic. The American people, in my judgment, are in entire sympathy with England and France at this time.

Not to repeal the Embargo Act would not only be a gross injustice to the commercial interests of this Nation, but would show a hostile attitude toward both England and France and would work to the benefit of both Germany and Russia.

Independent of this consideration and the history of legislation of this character, in my opinion, the American people, regardless of politics, have confidence in Hon. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, and his conduct of the Department of State, and if left to a vote, would uphold him in his judgments and opinion in this regard.

No one has ever better expressed the wisest policy of the Government with foreign nations than Jefferson in his first inaugural address, when he said:

"Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, and entangling alliances with none."

To repeal the present embargo law would be the best safeguard against entrance into what appears to be a second World War.

With kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

W. B. SWANEY.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

WASHINGTON NEWS LETTER BY HON. NOAH M. MASON, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to insert my own remarks in the RECORD, I include my Washington news letter which appears in the newspapers of the Twelfth Congressional District of Illinois this week:

PERTINENT FACTS OF THE NEUTRALITY QUESTION

Do you know that under the present so-called neutrality law the President has wide discretionary powers over commercial credits in time of war; that he may set any time limit he may desire to set—90 days, 6 months, 1 year, or more? The new neutrality bill removes the President's powers in connection with commercial credits and contains a provision for "cash on the barrel head." This is a great improvement over the present so-called neutrality law and will go a long way toward keeping the United States from becoming involved in the war.

Do you know that under the present so-called neutrality law the President has the sole power to declare when a state of war exists? He has not so declared in the case of the war in China, yet every school child in America knows that a state of war exists in China. Under the new neutrality bill either the President or the Congress may declare that a state of war exists. This makes certain that when the President fails to act, as he has in connection with the war in China, the Congress can and will act. This is a step toward getting the war power back in the hands of Congress, where it belongs.

Do you know that England and France have between them $8,000,000,000 on deposit in this country today, set aside for the purchase of needed war supplies, mostly raw materials and airplanes? About $5,000,000,000 of this vast sum is in gold and $3,000,000,000 is in securities and investments that can be readily converted into cash. This will buy a lot of airplanes and raw materials.

Do you know that most of the letters that have been sent to Congressmen concerning the neutrality problem indicate that the writers think that the President is trying to repeal the present neutrality law? No such proposal has come before the Congress. Actually the proposal now before Congress is to amend the present neutrality law, by removing the discretionary powers given to the President in 1937 by a rubber-stamp Congress; to establish a cash-and-carry program; and to prevent our ships and citizens from going into the war zone. This should reduce the likelihood of our becoming involved in the war.

Do you know that all kinds of war supplies, except arms and ammunition, can be, and are being, shipped to the warring nations under our present so-called neutrality law? These include steel, scrap iron, oil, chemicals, machine tools with which to make guns; alcohol, cotton, and cellulose with which to make ammunition. Do you know that all these goods and materials are contraband of war, subject to seizure, or to be sunk, and they are being shipped today in American ships right into the war zone where submarines are active? Do you know that arms and ammunition amounted to only 13 percent of the total war shipments in the World War, and that in the present war arms and ammunition would not amount to over 5 percent of the total war orders, even if the arms embargo is lifted? These are facts that shed light upon the neutrality debate.

Do you know that our greatest danger of becoming involved in the war comes from the prevalent but false idea that this Nation must eventually enter the war? Three out of every four persons on the street say, "We will be in the war within 6 months." "We will be in it before it is over." "If it lasts long enough, we will be dragged in." Such statements express a defeatist attitude. They express a "what is the use" attitude, a fatalistic attitude. However, every Member of Congress has definitely made up his mind that we can and will stay out. We are not going to make the mistake we made 20 years ago. "A burnt child dreads the fire."

Foreboding

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. U. S. GUYER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

POEM BY MABEL FREER LOVERIDGE

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave, by unanimous consent, to extend my remarks in the RECORD to include a quotation from the Miami Republican (Paola, Kans.) I insert the following poem written by Mabel Freer Loveridge, which is apropos to the present discussion of neutrality and the determination of the people of our country to keep out of a European war:

FOREBODING

When I am rocking you, my son,
And singing lullabies,
Someone is planning stouter planes
For Death to ride the skies.
While I am dressing you, my son,
In little boyish suits,
Someone is making uniforms
And sturdier soldier boots.

While you are chasing butterflies
Amid the tangled grass,
Someone is testing chemicals
To make a deadlier gas;
And while you eat your simple fare,
Perhaps the war lords sit
To start again the bugle notes
That only call the fit.

While I would build a splendid man
So fine and strong, my son,
Someone, in secret, tries to make
A farther-reaching gun—
A gun that on some distant day,
When drums of battle roll,
May leave me with a golden star
And iron in my soul.

—Mabel Freer Loveridge.

Neutrality and the Shanley Resolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

TELEGRAM BY HON. COMPTON I. WHITE, OF IDAHO

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues may have an expression of my views on neutrality and the pending resolution, I insert herewith a copy of telegram to four of my constituents in Idaho:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 31, 1939.

FRED L. VIEL,
OWEN T. STRATTON,
T. J. STROUD,
W. C. SMITH,
Salmon, Idaho:

Thanks for your telegram. I firmly adhere to principles of neutrality on which this country was founded as laid down by Washington and Jefferson. I am in close accord and sympathy with ideals of President Wilson. Advocate strict neutrality now and disarmament all nations with creation of Supreme International Commission with police power to enforce peace and fair dealing by all governments.

COMPTON I. WHITE, M. C.

Comparative Print of Neutrality Bills

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE LEWIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I desire to renew my unanimous consent request that a comparative print showing the Neutrality Act of 1937, which is still the law, with House Joint Resolution 306 as it passed the House amending that act, and the joint resolution as it passed the Senate on Friday last be printed in the RECORD in parallel columns, three columns on the page, subject to the approval of the Joint Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is here printed in full as follows:

COMPARATIVE PRINT OF THE NEUTRALITY ACT

The present law approved May 1, 1937
[Public Resolution—No. 27—75th Congress—1st Session]

JOINT RESOLUTION

To amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war," approved August 31, 1935, as amended

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

That the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war," approved August 31, 1935, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"EXPORT OF ARMS, AMMUNITION, AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR

"SECTION 1. (a) Whenever the President shall find that there exists a state of war between, or among, two or more foreign states, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export, or attempt to export, or cause to be exported, arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States to any belligerent state named in such proclamation, or to any neutral state for transshipment to, or for the use of, any such belligerent state.

"(b) The President shall, from time to time, by proclamation, extend such embargo upon the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to other states as and when they may become involved in such war.

"(c) Whenever the President shall find that a state of civil strife exists in a foreign state and that such civil strife is of a magnitude or is being conducted under such conditions that the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States to such foreign state would threaten or endanger the peace of the United States, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export, or attempt to export, or cause to be exported, arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States to such foreign state, or to any neutral state for transshipment to, or for the use of, such foreign state.

"(d) The President shall, from time to time by proclamation, definitely enumerate the arms, ammunition, and implements of war, the export of which is prohibited by this section. The arms, ammunition, and implements of war so enumerated shall include those enumerated in the President's proclamation numbered 2163, of April 10, 1936, but shall not include raw materials or any other articles or materials not of the same general character as those enumerated in the said proclamation, and in the Convention for the

As passed the House, June 30, 1939
[H. J. Res. 306—76th Congress—1st Session]

NEUTRALITY RESOLUTION OF 1939

Whereas the policy of the United States in foreign wars not affecting the defense of the United States is a policy of neutrality in accordance with the rules of international law; and

Whereas the United States stands for restating and strengthening the rights of neutrals at the earliest practicable time; and

Whereas it seems advisable, until these rights can be restated, to diminish the risk of this Nation becoming involved in foreign wars by restricting the exercise of certain neutral rights of our citizens: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

PROCLAMATION OF A STATE OF WAR BETWEEN FOREIGN STATES

SECTION 1. (a) That whenever the President or Congress by concurrent resolution shall find that there exists a state of war between foreign states, and that it is necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace of the United States or to protect the lives of citizens of the United States, the President shall issue a proclamation naming the states involved; and he shall, from time to time, by proclamation, name other states as and when they may become involved in the war.

(b) Whenever the conditions which have caused the President to issue any proclamation under the authority of this section have ceased to exist, he shall revoke the same.

SEC. 2. Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a) it shall thereafter be unlawful to export, or attempt to export, or cause to be exported, arms or ammunition from any place in the United States to any belligerent states named in such proclamation.

As passed the Senate, October 27, 1939
[H. J. Res. 306—76th Congress—2d Session]

NEUTRALITY SUBSTITUTE OF 1939

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

PROCLAMATION OF A STATE OF WAR BETWEEN FOREIGN STATES

SECTION 1. (a) That whenever the President, or the Congress by concurrent resolution, shall find that there exists a state of war between foreign states, and that it is necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace of the United States or to protect the lives of citizens of the United States, the President shall issue a proclamation naming the states involved; and he shall, from time to time, by proclamation, name other states as and when they may become involved in the war.

(b) Whenever the state of war which shall have caused the President to issue any proclamation under the authority of this section shall have ceased to exist with respect to any state named in such proclamation, he shall revoke such proclamation with respect to such state.

Present neutrality law—Continued

Supervision of the International Trade in Arms and Ammunition and in Implements of War, signed at Geneva June 17, 1925.

"(e) Whoever, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, shall export, or attempt to export, or cause to be exported, arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both, and the property, vessel, or vehicle containing the same shall be subject to the provisions of sections 1 to 8, inclusive, title 6, chapter 30, of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 223–225; U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 22, secs. 238–245).

"(f) In the case of the forfeiture of any arms, ammunition, or implements of war by reason of a violation of this act, no public or private sale shall be required; but such arms, ammunition, or implements of war shall be delivered to the Secretary of War for such use or disposal thereof as shall be approved by the President of the United States.

"(g) Whenever, in the judgment of the President, the conditions which have caused him to issue any proclamation under the authority of this section have ceased to exist, he shall revoke the same, and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply with respect to the state or states named in such proclamation, except with respect to offenses committed, or forfeitures incurred, prior to such revocation.

Bill as passed the House—Continued

"EXPORT OF OTHER ARTICLES AND MATERIALS

"SEC. 2. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to belligerent states, or to a state wherein civil strife exists, is necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace of the United States or to protect the lives of citizens of the United States, he shall so proclaim, and it shall thereafter be unlawful, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President may prescribe as to lakes, rivers, and inland waters bordering on the United States, and as to transportation on or over lands bordering on the United States, for any American vessel to carry such articles or materials to any belligerent state, or to any state wherein civil strife exists, named in such proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 of this act, or to any neutral state for transshipment to, or for the use of, any such belligerent state or any such state wherein civil strife exists. The President shall by proclamation from time to time definitely enumerate the articles and materials which it shall be unlawful for American vessels to so transport.

"(b) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the export of articles or materials from the United States to belligerent states, or to a state wherein civil strife exists, is necessary

TRANSFER OF TITLE

SEC. 4. (d) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a) it shall thereafter be unlawful, except in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President shall prescribe, to export or transport, or attempt to export or transport, or cause to be exported or transported, from the United States directly or indirectly to any state named in the proclamation, any articles or materials until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national. The shipper of such articles or materials shall be required to file with the collector of the port from which they are to be exported a declaration under oath that there exists in citizens of the United States no right, title, or interest in such articles or materials, and to comply with such rules and regulations as shall be promulgated from time to time by the President. Any such declaration so filed shall be a conclusive estoppel against any claim of any citizen of the United States of right, title, or interest in such articles or materials. Insurance written by underwriters on such articles or materials shall not be deemed an American interest therein, and no insurance policy issued on such articles or materials, and no loss incurred thereunder, shall be made the basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States. The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to trade on or over lands, lakes, rivers, and inland waters bordering on the United States.

Bill as passed the Senate—Continued

COMMERCE WITH STATES ENGAGED IN ARMED CONFLICT

SEC. 2. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a) it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel to carry any passengers or any articles or materials to any state named in such proclamation.

(b) Whoever shall violate any of the provisions of subsection (a) of this section or of any regulations issued thereunder shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both. Should the violation be by a corporation, organization, or association, each officer or director thereof participating in the violation shall be liable to the penalty herein prescribed.

(c) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a) it shall thereafter be unlawful to export or transport, or attempt to export or transport, or cause to be exported or transported, from the United States to any state named in such proclamation, any articles or materials (except copyrighted articles or materials) until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national. (Issuance of a bill of lading under which title to the goods shipped passes to the purchaser unconditionally upon delivery of the goods to carrier, shall constitute a transfer of all right, title, and interest therein within the meaning of this subsection.) The shipper of such articles or materials shall be required to file with the collector of the port from or through which they are to be exported a declaration under oath that he has complied with the requirements of this subsection with respect to transfer of right, title, and interest in such articles or materials, and that he will comply with such rules and regulations as shall be promulgated from time to time. Any such declaration so filed shall be a conclusive estoppel against any claim of any citizen of the United States having knowledge of such shipment or of such declaration of right, title, or interest in such articles or materials. No loss incurred by any such citizen (1) in connection with the sale or transfer of right, title, and interest in any such articles or materials or (2) in connection with the exportation or transportation of any such copyrighted to promote the security or preserve the peace of the United States or to protect the lives or commerce of citizens of the United States, he shall so proclaim, and it shall thereafter be unlawful, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President may prescribe as to lakes, rivers, and inland waters bordering on the United States, and as to transportation on or over land bordering on the United States, to export or transport, or attempt to export or transport, or cause to be exported or transported, from the United States to any belligerent state, or to any state wherein civil strife exists, named in such proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 of this act, or to any neutral state for transshipment to, or for the use of, any such belligerent state or any such state wherein civil strife exists, any articles or materials whatever until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national. The shipper of such articles or materials shall be required to file with the collector of the port from which they are to be exported a declaration under oath that there exists in citizens of the United States no right, title, or interest in such articles or materials, and to comply with such rules and regulations as shall be promulgated from time to time by the President. Any such declaration so filed shall be a conclusive estoppel against any claim of any citizen of the United States of right, title, or interest in such articles or materials. Insurance written by underwriters on any articles or materials the export of which is prohibited by this act, or on articles or materials carried by an American vessel in violation of subsection (a) of this section, shall not be deemed an American interest therein, and no insurance policy issued on such articles or materials and no loss incurred thereunder or by the owner of the vessel carrying the same shall be made a basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States.

Present neutrality law—Continued

"(c) The President shall from time to time by proclamation extend such restrictions as are imposed under the authority of this section to other states as and when they may be declared to become belligerent states under proclamations issued under the authority of section 1 of this act.

"(d) The President may from time to time change, modify, or revoke in whole or in part any proclamations issued by him under the authority of this section.

"(e) Except with respect to offenses committed, or forfeitures incurred, prior to May 1, 1939, this section and all proclamations issued thereunder shall not be effective after May 1, 1939.

(The above section expired May 1, 1939)

"(d) Whenever the President shall have revoked any such proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 of this act, the provisions of this section and of any regulations issued by the President hereunder shall thereupon cease to apply with respect to the state or states named in such proclamation, except with respect to offenses committed prior to such revocation.

(See Section 3 (d) present law.)

Bill as passed the House—Continued

(e) Whenever the President shall have revoked any proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a), the provisions of this section and of any regulations issued by the President hereunder shall thereupon cease to apply with respect to the state or states named in such proclamation, except with respect to offenses committed prior to such revocation.

Bill as passed the Senate—Continued

articles or materials, shall be made the basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States.

(d) Insurance written by underwriters on articles or materials included in shipments which are subject to restrictions under the provisions of this joint resolution, and on vessels carrying such shipments shall not be deemed an American interest therein, and no insurance policy issued on such articles or materials, or vessels, and no loss incurred thereunder or by the owners of such vessels, shall be made the basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States.

(e) Whenever any proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a) shall have been revoked with respect to any state the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply with respect to such state, except as to offenses committed prior to such revocation.

(f) The provisions of subsection (a) of this section shall not apply to transportation by American vessels on or over lakes, rivers, and inland waters bordering on the United States, or to transportation by aircraft on or over lands bordering on the United States; and the provisions of subsection

Present neutrality law—Continued

Bill as passed the House—Continued

Bill as passed the Senate—Continued

(c) of this section shall not apply (1) to such transportation of any articles or materials other than articles listed in a proclamation issued under the authority of section 12 (i), or (2) to any other transportation on or over lands bordering on the United States of any articles or materials other than articles listed in a proclamation issued under the authority of section 12 (i), and the provisions of subsections (a) and (c) of this section shall not apply to the transportation referred to in this subsection and subsections (g) and (h) of any articles or materials listed in a proclamation issued under the authority of section 12 (i) if the articles or materials so listed are to be used exclusively by American vessels, aircraft, or other vehicles in connection with their operation and maintenance.

(g) The provisions of subsections (a) and (c) of this section shall not apply to transportation by American vessels (other than aircraft) of mail, passengers, or any articles or materials (except articles or materials listed in a proclamation issued under the authority of section 12 i)) (1) to any port in the Western Hemisphere south of 35° north latitude, (2) to any port in the Western Hemisphere north of 35° north latitude and west of 66° west longitude, (3) to any port on the Pacific or Indian Oceans, including the China Sea, the Tasman Sea, the Bay of Bengal, and the Arabian Sea, or (4) to any port on the Atlantic Ocean south of 30° north latitude. The exception contained in this subsection shall not apply to any such port which is included within a combat area as defined in section 3 which applies to such vessels.

(h) The provisions of subsections (a) and (c) of this section shall not apply to transportation by aircraft of mail, passengers, or any articles or materials (except articles or materials listed in a proclamation issued under the authority of section 12 (i)) (1) to any port in the Western Hemisphere, or (2) to any port on the Pacific or Indian Oceans, including the China Sea, the Tasman Sea, the Bay of Bengal, and the Arabian Sea. The exceptions contained in this subsection shall not apply to any such port which is included within a combat area as defined in section 3 which applies to such aircraft.

(i) Every American vessel to which the provisions of subsections (g) and (h) apply shall, before departing from a port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, file with the collector of customs of the port of departure, or if there is no such collector at such port then with the nearest collector of customs, an export declaration (1) containing a complete list of all the articles and materials carried as cargo by such vessel, and the names and addresses of the consignees of all such articles and materials, and (2) stating the ports at which such articles and materials are to be unloaded and the ports of call of such vessel. All transportation referred to in subsections (f), (g), and (h) of this section shall be subject to such restrictions, rules, and regulations as the President shall prescribe; but no loss incurred in connection with any transportation excepted under the provisions of subsections (g) and (h) of this section shall be made the basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States.

(j) Whenever all proclamations issued under the authority of section 1 (a) shall have been revoked, the provisions of subsections (f), (g), (h), and (i) shall expire.

(k) The provisions of this section shall not apply to an American vessel whose voyage was begun 7 days or more in advance of (1) the date of enactment of this joint resolution, or (2) any proclamation issued after such date under the authority of section 1 (a) of this joint resolution.

Present neutrality law—Continued

"TRAVEL ON VESSELS OF BELLIGERENT STATES

"SEC. 9. Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 of this act it shall thereafter be unlawful for any citizen of the United States to travel on any vessel of the state or states named in such proclamation, except in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President shall prescribe: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to a citizen of the United States traveling on a vessel whose voyage was begun in advance of the date of the President's proclamation, and who had no opportunity to discontinue his voyage after that date: And provided further, That they shall not apply under 90 days after the date of the President's proclamation to a citizen of the United States returning from a foreign state to the United States. Whenever, in the President's judgment, the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply with respect to the state or states named in such proclamation, except with respect to offenses committed prior to such revocation.

"ARMING OF AMERICAN MERCHANT VESSELS PROHIBITED

"SEC. 10. Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1, it shall thereafter be unlawful, until such proclamation is revoked, for any American vessel engaged in commerce with any belligerent state, or any state wherein civil strife exists, named in such proclamation, to be armed or to carry any armament, arms, ammunition, or implements of war, except small arms and ammunition therefor which the President may deem necessary and shall publicly designate for the preservation of discipline aboard such vessels.

Bill as passed the House—Continued

TRAVEL ON VESSELS OF BELLIGERENT STATES

SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a), no citizen of the United States shall travel except at his own risk on any vessel of the state or states named in such proclamation, unless in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President shall prescribe.

(b) Whenever the President shall have revoked any proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a), the provisions of this section and of any regulations issued by the President hereunder shall thereupon cease to apply with respect to the state or states named in such proclamation, except with respect to offenses committed prior to such revocation.

Bill as passed the Senate—Continued

COMBAT AREAS

SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a), and he shall thereafter find that the protection of citizens of the United States so requires, he shall, by proclamation, define combat areas, and thereafter it shall be unlawful, except under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed, for any citizen of the United States or any American vessel to proceed into or through any such combat area. The combat areas so defined may be made to apply to surface vessels or aircraft, or both.

(b) In case of the violation of any of the provisions of this section by any American vessel, or any owner or officer thereof, such vessel, owner, or officer shall be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both. Should the owner of such vessel be a corporation, organization, or association, each officer or director participating in the violation shall be liable to the penalty hereinabove prescribed. In case of the violation of this section by any citizen traveling as a passenger, such passenger may be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 2 years, or both.

(c) The President may from time to time modify or extend any proclamation issued under the authority of this section, and when the conditions which shall have caused him to issue any such proclamation shall have ceased to exist he shall revoke such proclamation and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply, except as to offenses committed prior to such revocation.

AMERICAN RED CROSS

SEC. 4. The provisions of section 2 (a) shall not prohibit the transportation by vessels under charter or other direction and control of the American Red Cross, proceeding under safe conduct granted by states named in any proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a), of officers and American Red Cross personnel, medical personnel, and medical supplies, food, and clothing, for the relief of human suffering.

TRAVEL ON VESSELS OF BELLIGERENT STATES

SEC. 5. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a) it shall thereafter be unlawful for any citizen of the United States to travel on any vessel of any state named in such proclamation, except in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed.

(b) Whenever any proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a) shall have been revoked with respect to any state the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply with respect to such state, except as to offenses committed prior to such revocation.

ARMING OF AMERICAN MERCHANT VESSELS PROHIBITED

SEC. 6. Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a), it shall thereafter be unlawful, until such proclamation is revoked, for any American vessel, engaged in commerce with any foreign state to be armed, except with small arms and ammunition therefor, which the President may deem necessary and shall publicly designate for the preservation of discipline aboard any such vessel.

Present neutrality law—Continued

"FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS

"SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 of this act, it shall thereafter be unlawful for any person within the United States to purchase, sell, or exchange bonds, securities, or other obligations of the government of any belligerent state or of any state wherein civil strife exists, named in such proclamation, or of any political subdivision of any such state, or of any person acting for or on behalf of the government of any such state, or of any faction or asserted government within any such state wherein civil strife exists, or of any person acting for or on behalf of any faction or asserted government within any such state wherein civil strife exists, issued after the date of such proclamation, or to make any loan or extend any credit to any such government, political subdivision, faction, asserted government, or person, or to solicit or receive any contribution for any such government, political subdivision, faction, asserted government, or person: Provided, That if the President shall find that such action will serve to protect the commercial or other interests of the United States or its citizens, he may, in his discretion and to such extent and under such regulations as he may prescribe, except from the operation of this section ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations in aid of legal transactions and of a character customarily used in normal peacetime commercial transactions. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to prohibit the solicitation or collection of funds to be used for medical aid and assistance, or for food and clothing to relieve human suffering, when such solicitation or collection of funds is made on behalf of and for use by any person or organization which is not acting for or on behalf of any such government, political subdivision, faction, or asserted government, but all such solicitations and collections of funds shall be subject to the approval of the President and shall be made under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe.

"(b) The provisions of this section shall not apply to a renewal or adjustment of such indebtedness as may exist on the date of the President's proclamation.

"(c) Whoever shall violate the provisions of this section or of any regulations issued hereunder shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both. Should the violation be by a corporation, organization, or association, each officer or agent thereof participating in the violation may be liable to the penalty herein prescribed.

"(d) Whenever the President shall have revoked any such proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 of this Act, the provisions of this section and of any regulations issued by the President hereunder shall thereupon cease to apply with respect to the state or states named in such proclamation, except with respect to offenses committed prior to such revocation.

[See Section 3 (d) present law.]

Bill as passed the House—Continued

FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS AND TRANSFER OF TITLE

SEC. 4. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a), it shall thereafter be unlawful for any person within the United States to purchase, sell, or exchange bonds, securities, or other obligations of the government of any state named in such proclamation, or of any political subdivision of any such state, or of any person acting for or on behalf of the government of any such state, issued after the date of such proclamation, or to make any loan or extend any credit to any such government, political subdivision, or person: Provided, That if the President shall find that such action will serve to protect the commercial or other interests of the United States or its citizens, he may, in his discretion, and to such extent and under such regulations as he may prescribe, except from the operation of this section for a period of not more than 90 days without renewals ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations in aid of legal transactions and of a character customarily used in normal peacetime commercial transaction; the President shall make public every 90 days any and all exceptions granted under this proviso, together with the amounts of credits involved.

(b) The provisions of this section shall not apply to a renewal or adjustment of such indebtedness as may exist on the date of the President's proclamation.

(c) Whoever shall violate the provisions of subsection (a) of this section or of any regulations issued thereunder shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both. Should the violation be by a corporation, organization, or association, each officer or agent thereof participating in the violation may be liable to the penalty herein prescribed.

SOLICITATION AND COLLECTION OF FUNDS

SEC. 5. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a), it shall thereafter be unlawful for any person within the United States to solicit or receive any contribution for or on behalf of the government of any small state named in the proclamation or of any association, organization, or person acting for or on behalf of such government.

Nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit the solicitation or collection of contributions to be used for medical aid and assistance, or for food and clothing to relieve human suffering, when such solicitation or collection of contributions is made on behalf of and for use by any person or

Bill as passed the Senate—Continued

FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS

SEC. 7. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a), it shall thereafter be unlawful for any person within the United States to purchase, sell, or exchange bonds, securities, or other obligations of the government of any State named in such proclamation, or of any political subdivision of any such State, or of any person acting for or on behalf of the government of any such State, issued after the date of such proclamation, or to make any loan or extend any credit to any such government, political subdivision, or person. The provisions of this subsection shall also apply to the sale by any person within the United States to any person in a state named in any such proclamation of any articles or materials listed in a proclamation issued under the authority of section 12 (1).

(b) The provisions of this section shall not apply to a renewal or adjustment of such indebtedness as may exist on the date of such proclamation.

(c) Whoever shall violate any of the provisions of this section or of any regulations issued thereunder shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both. Should the violation be by a corporation, organization, or association, each officer or director thereof participating in the violation shall be liable to the penalty herein prescribed.

(d) Whenever any proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a) shall have been revoked with respect to any state the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply with respect to such state, except as to offenses committed prior to such revocation.

SOLICITATION AND COLLECTION OF FUNDS AND CONTRIBUTIONS

SEC. 8. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a), it shall thereafter be unlawful for any person within the United States to solicit or receive any contribution for or on behalf of the government of any state named in such proclamation or for or on behalf of any agent or instrumentality of any such state.

(b) Nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit the solicitation or collection of funds and contributions to be used for medical aid and assistance, or for food and clothing to relieve human suffering, when such solicitation or collection of funds and contributions is made on behalf of and

Present neutrality law—Continued

[For comparative language to these paragraphs, see section 3 (a) of the present law.]

"EXCEPTIONS—AMERICAN REPUBLICS

"SEC. 4. This act shall not apply to an American republic or republics engaged in war against a non-American state or states, provided the American republic is not cooperating with a non-American state or states in such war.

"USE OF AMERICAN PORTS AS BASE OF SUPPLY

"SEC. 7. (a) Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, shall have cause to believe that any vessel, domestic or foreign, whether requiring clearance or not, is about to carry out of a port of the United States, fuel, men, arms, ammunition, implements of war, or other supplies to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a belligerent state, but the evidence is not deemed sufficient to justify forbidding the departure of the vessel as provided for by section 1, title V, chapter 30, of the Act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 217, 221; U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 18, sec. 31), and if, in the President's judgment, such action will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign states, or to protect the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or to promote the security or neutrality of the United States, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to require the owner, master, or person in command thereof, before departing from a port of the United States, to give a bond to the United States, with sufficient sureties, in such amount as he shall deem proper, conditioned that the vessel will not deliver the men, or any part of the cargo, to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a belligerent state.

"(b) If the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, shall find that a vessel, domestic or foreign, in a port of the United States, has previously cleared from a port of the United States during such war and delivered its cargo or any part thereof to a warship, tender, or supply ship of a belligerent state, he may prohibit the departure of such vessel during the duration of the war.

Bill as passed the House—Continued

organization which is not acting for or on behalf or in aid of any such government, but all such solicitations and collections of contributions shall be subject to the approval of the President and shall be made under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe.

(b) Whenever the President shall have revoked any proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a), the provisions of this section and of any regulations issued by the President hereunder shall thereupon cease to apply with respect to the small states named in such proclamation, except with respect to offenses committed prior to such revocation.

AMERICAN REPUBLICS

SEC. 6. The foregoing provisions of this joint resolution shall not apply to any American republic.

USE OF AMERICAN PORTS AS BASE OF SUPPLY

SEC. 7. (a) Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, shall have cause to believe that any vessel, domestic or foreign, whether requiring clearance or not, is about to carry out of a port of the United States, fuel, men, arms, ammunition, implements of war, or other supplies to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a belligerent state in violation of the laws, treaties or obligations of the United States under the law of nations and the supreme law of the land, but the evidence is not deemed sufficient to justify forbidding the departure of the vessel as provided for by section 1, title V, chapter 30, of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 217, 221; U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 18, sec. 31), and if, in the President's judgment, such action will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign states, or to protect the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or to promote the security or neutrality of the United States, he shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to require the owner, master, or person in command thereof, before departing from a port of the United States, to give a bond to the United States, with sufficient sureties, in such amount as he shall deem proper, conditioned that the vessel will not deliver the men, or any part of the cargo, to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a belligerent state.

(b) If the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, shall find that a vessel, domestic or foreign, in a port of the United States, has previously cleared from a port of the United States during such war and delivered its cargo or any part thereof to a warship, tender, or supply ship of a belligerent state, he may prohibit the departure of such vessel during the duration of the war.

Bill as passed the Senate—Continued

for use by any person or organization which is not acting for or on behalf of any such government, but all such solicitations and collections of funds and contributions shall be in accordance with and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed.

(c) Whenever any proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a) shall have been revoked with respect to any state the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply with respect to such state, except as to offenses committed prior to such revocation.

AMERICAN REPUBLICS

SEC. 9. This joint resolution shall not apply to any American republic engaged in war against a non-American state or states, provided the American republic is not cooperating with a non-American state or states in such war.

RESTRICTIONS ON USE OF AMERICAN PORTS

SEC. 10. (a) Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, shall have cause to believe that any vessel, domestic or foreign, whether requiring clearance or not, is about to carry out of a port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, fuel, men, arms, ammunition, implements of war, supplies, dispatches, or information to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a state named in a proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a), but the evidence is not deemed sufficient to justify forbidding the departure of the vessel as provided for by section 1, title V, chapter 30, of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 217, 221; U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 18, sec. 31), and if, in the President's judgment, such action will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign states, or to protect the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or to promote the security or neutrality of the United States, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to require the owner, master, or person in command thereof, before departing from a port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, to give a bond to the United States, with sufficient sureties, in such amount as he shall deem proper, conditioned that the vessel will not deliver the men, or any fuel, supplies, dispatches, information, or any part of the cargo, to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a state named in a proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a).

(b) If the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, shall find that a vessel, domestic or foreign, in a port of the United States, has previously departed from a port or from the jurisdiction of the United States during such war and delivered men, fuel, supplies, dispatches, information, or any part of its cargo to a warship, tender, or supply ship of a state named in a proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a), he may prohibit the departure of such vessel during the duration of the war.

(c) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under section 1 (a) he may, while such proclamation is in effect, require the owner, master, or person in command of any vessel, foreign or domestic, before departing from the United States, to give a bond to the United States, with sufficient sureties, in such amount as he shall deem proper, conditioned that no alien seaman who arrived on such vessel shall remain in the United States for a longer period than that permitted under the regulations, as amended from time to time, issued pursuant to section 33 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917 (U. S. C., title 8, sec. 168). Notwithstanding the provisions of said section he may issue regulations with respect to the landing of such seamen as he deems necessary to insure their departure either on such vessel or another vessel at the expense of such owner, master, or person in command.

Present neutrality law—Continued

"SUBMARINES AND ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS

"SEC. 8. Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President shall find that special restrictions placed on the use of the ports and territorial waters of the United States by the submarines or armed merchant vessels of a foreign state, will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign states, or to protect the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or to promote the security of the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall thereafter be unlawful for any such submarine or armed merchant vessel to enter a port or the territorial waters of the United States or to depart therefrom, except under such conditions and subject to such limitations as the President may prescribe. Whenever, in his judgment, the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply.

"NATIONAL MUNITIONS CONTROL BOARD

"SEC. 5. (a) There is hereby established a National Munitions Control Board (hereinafter referred to as the 'Board') to carry out the provisions of this act. The Board shall consist of the Secretary of State, who shall be chairman and executive officer of the Board, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce. Except as otherwise provided in this act, or by other law, the administration of this act is vested in the Department of State. The Secretary of State shall promulgate such rules and regulations with regard to the enforcement of this section as he may deem necessary to carry out its provisions. The Board shall be convened by the chairman and shall hold at least one meeting a year.

"(b) Every person who engages in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act, whether as an exporter, importer, manufacturer, or dealer, shall register with the Secretary of State his name, or business name, principal place of business, and places of business in the United States, and a list of the arms, ammunition, and implements of war which he manufactures, imports, or exports.

"(c) Every person required to register under this section shall notify the Secretary of State of any change in the arms, ammunition, or implements of war which he exports, imports, or manufactures; and upon such notification the Secretary of State shall issue to such person an amended certificate of registration, free of charge, which shall remain valid until the date of expiration of the original certificate. Every person required to register under the provisions of this section shall pay a registration fee of $500, unless he manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding his registration, in which case he shall pay a registration fee of $100. Upon receipt of the required registration fee, the Secretary of State shall issue a registration certificate valid for 5 years, which shall be renewable for further periods of 5 years upon the payment for each renewal of a fee of $500 in the case of persons who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of more than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding the renewal, or a fee of $100 in the case of persons who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding the renewal. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to refund, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $400 to every person who shall have paid a registration fee of $500 pursuant to

Bill as passed the House—Continued

SUBMARINES AND ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS

SEC. 8. Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President shall find that special restrictions placed on the use by the submarines or armed merchant vessels of a belligerent state of the ports and territorial waters of the United States will serve to maintain peace between the United States and belligerent states, or to protect the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or to promote the security of the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall thereafter be unlawful for any such submarine or armed merchant vessel to enter a port or the territorial waters of the United States or to depart therefrom, except under such conditions and subject to such limitations as the President may prescribe. Whenever, in his judgment, the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply.

NATIONAL MUNITIONS CONTROL BOARD

SEC. 9. (a) There is hereby established a National Munitions Control Board (hereinafter referred to as the "Board"). The Board shall consist of the Secretary of State, who shall be chairman and executive officer of the Board, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce. Except as otherwise provided in this joint resolution, or by other law, the administration of this joint resolution is vested in the Department of State. The Secretary of State shall promulgate such rules and regulations with regard to the enforcement of this section as he may deem necessary to carry out its provisions. The Board shall be convened by the chairman and shall hold at least one meeting a year.

(b) Every person who engages in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this joint resolution, whether as an exporter, importer, manufacturer, or dealer, shall register with the Secretary of State his name, or business name, principal place of business, and places of business in the United States, and a list of the arms, ammunition, and implements of war which he manufactures, imports, or exports.

(c) Every person required to register under this section shall notify the Secretary of State of any change in the arms, ammunition, or implements of war which he exports, imports, or manufactures; and upon such notification the Secretary of State shall issue to such person an amended certificate of registration, free of charge, which shall remain valid until the date of expiration of the original certificate. Every person required to register under the provisions of this section shall pay a registration fee of $100. Upon receipt of the required registration fee, the Secretary of State shall issue a registration certificate valid for 5 years, which shall be renewable for further periods of 5 years upon the payment for each renewal of a fee of $100.

Bill as passed the Senate—Continued

SUBMARINES AND ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS

SEC. 11. Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President shall find that special restrictions placed on the use of the ports and territorial waters of the United States by the submarines or armed merchant vessels of a foreign state, will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign states, or to protect the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or to promote the security of the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall thereafter be unlawful for any such submarine or armed merchant vessel to enter a port or the territorial waters of the United States or to depart therefrom, except under such conditions and subject to such limitations as the President may prescribe. Whenever, in his judgment, the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply.

NATIONAL MUNITIONS CONTROL BOARD

SEC. 12. (a) There is hereby established a National Munitions Control Board (hereinafter referred to as the "Board"). The Board shall consist of the Secretary of State, who shall be chairman and executive officer of the Board, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce. Except as otherwise provided in this section, or by other law, the administration of this section is vested in the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State shall promulgate such rules and regulations with regard to the enforcement of this section as he may deem necessary to carry out its provisions. The Board shall be convened by the chairman and shall hold at least one meeting a year.

(b) Every person who engages in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing any arms, ammunition, or implements of war listed in a proclamation issued under the authority of subsection (1) of this section, whether as an exporter, importer, manufacturer, or dealer, shall register with the Secretary of State his name, or business name, principal place of business, and places of business in the United States, and a list of the arms, ammunition, and implements of war which he manufactures, imports, or exports.

(c) Every person required to register under this section shall notify the Secretary of State of any change in the arms, ammunition, or implements of war which he exports, imports, or manufactures; and upon such notification the Secretary of State shall issue to such person an amended certificate of registration, free of charge, which shall remain valid until the date of expiration of the original certificate. Every person required to register under the provisions of this section shall pay a registration fee of $100. Upon receipt of the required registration fee, the Secretary of State shall issue a registration certificate valid for 5 years, which shall be renewable for further periods of 5 years upon the payment for each renewal of a fee of $100.

Present neutrality law—Continued	Bill as passed the House—Continued	Bill as passed the Senate—Continued
this act, who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding his registration.
"(d) It shall be unlawful for any person to export, or attempt to export, from the United States to any other state, any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act, or to import, or attempt to import, to the United States from any other state, any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act, without first having obtained a license therefor.	(d) It shall be unlawful for any person to export, or attempt to export, from the United States to any other state, any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this joint resolution, or to import, or attempt to import, to the United States from any other state, any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this joint resolution, without first having obtained a license therefor. In the application for license the applicant shall set forth a description of such exports or imports together with the terms of sale as to credit or payment.	(d) It shall be unlawful for any person to export, or attempt to export, from the United States to any other state, any arms, ammunition, or implements of war listed in a proclamation issued under the authority of subsection (i) of this section, or to import, or attempt to import, to the United States from any other state, any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war listed in any such proclamation, without first having submitted to the Secretary of State the name of the purchaser and the terms of sale and having obtained a license therefor.
"(e) All persons required to register under this section shall maintain, subject to the inspection of the Secretary of State, or any person or persons designated by him, such permanent records of manufacture for export, importation, and exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war as the Secretary of State shall prescribe.	(e) All persons required to register under this section shall maintain, subject to the inspection of the Secretary of State, or any person or persons designated by him, such permanent records of manufacture for export, importation, and exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war as the Secretary of State shall prescribe.	(e) All persons required to register under this section shall maintain, subject to the inspection of the Secretary of State, or any person or persons designated by him, such permanent records of manufacture for export, importation, and exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war as the Secretary of State shall prescribe.
"(f) Licenses shall be issued to persons who have registered as herein provided for, except in cases of export or import licenses where the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war would be in violation of this act or any other law of the United States, or of a treaty to which the United States is a party, in which cases such licenses shall not be issued.	(f) Licenses shall be issued to persons who have registered as herein provided for, except in cases of export or import licenses where the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war would be in violation of this joint resolution or any other law of the United States, or of a treaty to which the United States is a party, in which cases such licenses shall not be issued.	(f) Licenses shall be issued by the Secretary of State to persons who have registered as herein provided for, except in cases of export or import licenses where the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war would be in violation of this joint resolution or any other law of the United States, or of a treaty to which the United States is a party, in which cases such licenses shall not be issued.
"(g) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 of this act, all licenses theretofore issued under this act shall ipso facto and immediately upon the issuance of such proclamation, cease to grant authority to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States to any belligerent state, or to any state wherein civil strife exists, named in such proclamation, or to any neutral state for transshipment to, or for the use of, any such belligerent state or any such state wherein civil strife exists; and said licenses, insofar as the grant of authority to export to the state or states named in such proclamation is concerned, shall be null and void.
"(h) No purchase of arms, ammunition, or implements of war shall be made on behalf of the United States by any officer, executive department, or independent establishment of the Government from any person who shall have failed to register under the provisions of this act.	(g) No purchase of arms, ammunition, or implements of war shall be made on behalf of the United States by any officer, executive department, or independent establishment of the Government from any person who shall have failed to register under the provisions of this joint resolution.	(g) No purchase of arms, ammunition, or implements of war shall be made on behalf of the United States by any officer, executive department, or independent establishment of the Government from any person who shall have failed to register under the provisions of this joint resolution.
"(i) The provisions of the act of August 29, 1916, relating to the sale of ordnance and stores to the Government of Cuba (39 Stat. 619, 643; U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 50, sec. 72), are hereby repealed as of December 31, 1937.	(h) The provisions of the act of August 29, 1916, relating to the sale of ordnance and stores to the Government of Cuba (39 Stat. 619, 643; U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 50, sec. 72), are hereby repealed as of December 31, 1937.
"(j) The Board shall make an annual report to Congress, copies of which shall be distributed as are other reports transmitted to Congress. Such reports shall contain such information and data collected by the Board as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the control of trade in arms, ammunition, and implements of war. The Board shall include in such reports a list of all persons required to register under the provisions of this act, and full information concerning the licenses issued hereunder.	(i) The Board shall make an annual report to Congress, copies of which shall be distributed as are other reports transmitted to Congress. Such reports shall contain such information and data collected by the Board as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the control of trade in arms, ammunition, and implements of war. The Board shall include in such reports a list of all persons required to register under the provisions of this joint resolution, and full information concerning the licenses issued hereunder: Provided, That, if the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a), the Board shall thereupon make public an immediate report containing all the information herein provided, and shall make public a similar report each 90 days thereafter so long as such proclamation shall be in force.	(h) The Board shall make a report to Congress on January 1 and July 1 of each year, copies of which shall be distributed as are other reports transmitted to Congress. Such reports shall contain such information and data collected by the Board as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the control of trade in arms, ammunition, and implements of war, including the name of the purchaser and the terms of sale made under such license. The Board shall include in such reports a list of all persons required to register under the provisions of this joint resolution, and full information concerning the licenses issued hereunder, including the name of the purchaser and the terms of sale made under such license.

Present neutrality law—Continued

"(k) The President is hereby authorized to proclaim upon recommendation of the Board from time to time a list of articles which shall be considered arms, ammunition, and implements of war for the purposes of this section.

"AMERICAN VESSELS PROHIBITED FROM CARRYING ARMS TO BELLIGERENT STATES

"SEC. 6. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 of this act, it shall thereafter be unlawful, until such proclamation is revoked, for any American vessel to carry any arms, ammunition, or implements of war to any belligerent state, or to any state wherein civil strife exists, named in such proclamation, or to any neutral state for transshipment to, or for the use of, any such belligerent state or any such state wherein civil strife exists.

"(b) Whoever, in violation of the provisions of this section, shall take, or attempt to take, or shall authorize, hire, or solicit another to take, any American vessel carrying such cargo out of port or from the jurisdiction of the United States shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both; and, in addition, such vessel, and her tackle, apparel, furniture, and equipment, and the arms, ammunition, and implements of war on board, shall be forfeited to the United States.

"REGULATIONS

"SEC. 11. The President may, from time to time, promulgate such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary and proper to carry out any of the provisions of this act; and he may exercise any power or authority conferred on him by this act through such officer or officers, or agency or agencies, as he shall direct.

"GENERAL PENALTY PROVISION

"SEC. 12. In every case of the violation of any of the provisions of this act or of any rule or regulation issued pursuant thereto where a specific penalty is not herein provided, such violator or violators, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 13. For the purposes of this act—

"(a) The term 'United States,' when used in a geographical sense, includes the several States and Territories, the insular possessions of the United States (including the Philippine Islands), the Canal Zone, and the District of Columbia.

"(b) The term 'person' includes a partnership, company, association, or corporation, as well as a natural person.

"(c) The term 'vessel' means every description of watercraft (including aircraft) or other contrivance used, or capable of being used, as a means of transportation on, under, or over water.

"(d) The term 'American vessel' means any vessel (including aircraft) documented under the laws of the United States.

Bill as passed the House—Continued

(j) The President is hereby authorized to proclaim upon recommendation of the Board from time to time a list of articles which shall be considered arms, ammunition, and implements of war for the purposes of this section.

REGULATIONS

SEC. 10. The President may, from time to time, promulgate such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary and proper to carry out any of the provisions of this joint resolution; and he may exercise any power or authority conferred on him by this joint resolution through such officer or officers, or agency or agencies, as he shall direct.

GENERAL PENALTY PROVISION

SEC. 11. In every case of the violation of any of the provisions of this joint resolution or of any rule or regulation issued pursuant thereto where a specific penalty is not herein provided, such violator or violators, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 12. For the purposes of this joint resolution—

(a) The term "United States", when used in a geographical sense, includes the several States and Territories, the insular possessions of the United States (including the Philippine Islands), the Canal Zone, and the District of Columbia.

(b) The term "person" includes a partnership, company, association, or corporation, as well as a natural person.

(c) The term "vessel" means every description of watercraft (including aircraft) or other contrivance used, or capable of being used, as a means of transportation on, under, or over water.

Bill as passed the Senate—Continued

(i) The President is hereby authorized to proclaim upon recommendation of the Board from time to time a list of articles which shall be considered arms, ammunition, and implements of war for the purposes of this section.

REGULATIONS

SEC. 13. The President may, from time to time, promulgate such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary and proper to carry out any of the provisions of this joint resolution; and he may exercise any power or authority conferred on him by this joint resolution through such officer or officers, or agency or agencies, as he shall direct.

UNLAWFUL USE OF THE AMERICAN FLAG

SEC. 14. (a) It shall be unlawful for any vessel belonging to or operating under the jurisdiction of any foreign state to use the flag of the United States thereon, or to make use of any distinctive signs or markings, indicating that the same is an American vessel.

(b) Any vessel violating the provisions of subsection (a) of this section shall be denied for a period of three months the right to enter the ports or territorial waters of the United States except in cases of force majeure.

GENERAL PENALTY PROVISION

SEC. 15. In every case of the violation of any of the provisions of this joint resolution or of any rule or regulation issued pursuant thereto where a specific penalty is not herein provided, such violator or violators, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 16. For the purposes of this joint resolution—

(a) The term "United States" when used in a geographical sense, includes the several States and Territories, the insular possessions of the United States (including the Philippine Islands), the Canal Zone, and the District of Columbia.

(b) The term "person" includes a partnership, company, association, or corporation, as well as a natural person.

(c) The term "vessel" means every description of watercraft and aircraft capable of being used as a means of transportation on, under, or over water.

(d) The term "American vessel" means any vessel documented, and any aircraft registered or licensed, under the laws of the United States.

Present neutrality law—Continued

"(e) The term 'vehicle' means every description of carriage (including aircraft) or other contrivance used, or capable of being used, as a means of transportation on or over land.

"(f) The term 'state' shall include nation, government, and country.

"SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

"SEC. 14. If any of the provisions of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

"APPROPRIATIONS

"SEC. 15. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act."

Approved, May 1, 1937, 6.30 p. m., Central Standard Time.

Bill as passed the House—Continued

(d) The term "state" shall include nation, government and country.

SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

SEC. 13. If any of the provisions of this joint resolution, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the joint resolution, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 14. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this joint resolution.

REPEAL OF ACTS OF 1935, 1936, 1937

SEC. 15. The Act of August 31, 1935 (Public Resolution Numbered 67, Seventy-fourth Congress), as amended by the Act of February 29, 1936 (Public Resolution Numbered 74, Seventy-fourth Congress), and the Act of May 1, 1937 (Public Resolution Numbered 27, Seventy-fifth Congress), and the Act of January 8, 1937 (Public Resolution Numbered 1, Seventy-fifth Congress), are hereby repealed: Provided, That such repeal shall not affect the validity of the Proclamation Numbered 2237 of May 1, 1937 (50 Stat. 1834), defining the term "arms, ammunition, and implements of war" or of certificates of registration or licenses issued pursuant to the provisions of section 5 of the Act of May 1, 1937.

Passed the House of Representatives June 30, 1939.

Bill as passed the Senate—Continued

(e) The term "state" shall include nation, government, and country.

(f) The term "citizen" shall include any individual owing allegiance to the United States, a partnership, company, or association composed in whole or in part of citizens of the United States, and any corporation organized and existing under the laws of the United States, as defined in subsection (a) of this section.

SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

SEC. 17. If any of the provisions of this joint resolution, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the joint resolution, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 18. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this joint resolution.

REPEALS

SEC. 19. The joint resolution of August 31, 1935, as amended, and the joint resolution of January 8, 1937, are hereby repealed: Provided, That such repeal shall not affect the validity of certificates of registration or licenses issued pursuant to section 2 of the joint resolution of August 31, 1935, or section 5 of the joint resolution of August 31, 1935, as amended, or the validity of proclamation No. 2237, of May 1, 1937 (50 Stat. 1834), defining the term "arms, ammunition, and implements of war", which, until it is revoked, shall have full force and effect as if issued pursuant to this joint resolution: Provided further, That offenses committed and penalties, forfeitures, or liabilities incurred under either of such joint resolutions prior to the date of enactment of this joint resolution may be prosecuted and punished, and suits and proceedings for violations of either of such joint resolutions or of any rule or regulation issued pursuant thereto may be commenced and prosecuted, in the same manner and with the same effect as if such joint resolutions had not been repealed.

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 20. This joint resolution may be cited as the "Neutrality Act of 1939".

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution to preserve the neutrality and the peace of the United States and to secure the safety of its citizens and their interests".

Fritz Kuhn Should Be Deported

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE BERGEN EVENING RECORD, HACKENSACK, N. J., OCTOBER 23, 1939

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Bergen Evening Record, Hackensack, N. J., on October 23, 1939:

[From the Bergen Evening Record, Hackensack, N. J., October 23, 1939]

FRITZ KUHN SHOULD BE DEPORTED

Fritz Kuhn, Nazi bund leader in the too-tolerant United States, told the Dies Committee that in his widely publicized audience with Herr Hitler 3 years ago there was no discussion of the Nazi bund's pernicious activities in America. His "of course not" might be the truth, but most intelligent and informed Americans will nevertheless believe that arrogant Fritz is an unmitigated liar.

Not unlike the Prussian thickheads who so underrated American psychology in 1917, Kuhn now expects Americans to believe that this common—very common—citizen by adoption was received by almighty Hitler solely because such an insult to tolerant American citizenship was born in Germany. Unheard of in his fatherland, Kuhn came to the United States and was widely publicized for his efforts in sabotaging American tolerance of racial and religious minorities among neighbors and fellow citizens. He has been tolerated too long by liberty-loving Americans. He has too often converted the liberties of citizenship into license to deny equal liberties to his fellow citizens. He is as stupid in his utterances as the Baron Dumba who called us "damfool" Yankees in his devastating—for Germany—cable in the months that preceded America's entry into the war which brought arrogant Prussia to her knees.

Real Americans—and we question whether Kuhn can be so classified—love liberty not only for themselves but also for their neighbors and fellow citizens. Their patience has become exhausted, and they want to know who this loud-mouthed Kuhn and his silly goose-stepping bund are and why they are not placed under restraint. They want to know how much longer the traditional tolerance of American citizenship compels them to stand for these adopted Germans who renounced their foreign allegiances in our naturalization courts and now self-evidently preach and practice a divided national allegiance in their glaringly un-American bund activities.

Bellowing, Kuhn stated in substance that his movement is designed to provide political representation for millions of citizens of German birth or German ancestry in this country. This writer doesn't know how other citizens of German antecedents feel about Kuhn's assumption of leadership and his made-in-Germany ersatz (synthetic) civic virtue, but for himself he wants to say that his grandfather sought individual freedom and opportunity when he left Germany in 1859 to come here. He doubtless was impressed by what he found, for in 1863 he gave his life to the country that adopted him and that gave to his children and his children's children a priceless heritage. That heritage, Mr. Kuhn, is theirs to use, but, more important than that, it is theirs to preserve for their posterity against the un-American activities of all the Kuhns who may from generation to generation try to sabotage it.

The writer rejects emphatically this impudent goose-stepper's assumption of leadership in anything and everything even remotely connected with American citizens of German ancestry. He and millions of other Americans of German antecedents are thoroughly fed up with Kuhn and his pseudo-American Nazi bund. They would gladly lead any legal movement to kick Kuhn and his silly Nazi followers out of the country whose hospitality they have abused. Their preachments and their practices have amply demonstrated that while their bodies are in the land of freedom their hearts and their minds are in Nazi Germany. They have proved their unfitness for tolerant American citizenship, and they should be sent back to the government which they have tried so cleverly here to serve.

Those are the considered thoughts of this American of remote German ancestry, and they are supplied herewith for the perusal of brazen Kuhn and his un-American Nazi bunders. The writer sheds the cloak of editorial anonymity to permit them to identify him as—

JOHN BORG, Publisher.

Reciprocal-Trade Folly

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FOREST A. HARNESS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. FOREST A. HARNESS, OF INDIANA

Mr. HARNESS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered last night over the radio:

Tonight you and your neighbors are preparing for the series of weird and amusing antics which will briefly ruffle the dignity of the neighborhood. You will be no more than mildly surprised if you find a collection of the community's domestic animals on your front porch in the morning, and if there is a spark of youth left in your heart your annoyance will melt in mirth at the sight of the tribulations which have been visited upon your neighbors. In spite of the fact that modern plumbing has gone far to frustrate the marauding spirit of youth on the loose, Halloween is still Halloween and not even a Presidential proclamation has intervened to alter or confuse the fact.

This occasion is as good as any to remind us that we in America are still following the peaceful traditions, comparatively untouched by the storms rocking the rest of the world. True, war news has absorbed our attention. Our Congress has worked with deadly seriousness on the problem of preserving American peace. But, now that we have unmistakably demonstrated our determination to stay out of war, we should find ourselves wondering if we haven't been devoting more time and thought to the matter than we should have, in view of the fact that our domestic problems remain essentially what they were 6 weeks, or 6 months, or even 6 years ago. We may wonder if, during this distraction fostered by the dramatics in Washington, we haven't neglected domestic affairs equally vital to American interests.

Our State Department, which has been the very storm center of the neutrality debates, has still found time, while our attention was diverted, to complete the negotiations of a trade agreement with our South American neighbor, Argentina. It has found time to proceed with negotiations which will lead to a parallel agreement with Chile and Uruguay.

Repeatedly in the past I have protested against the New Deal tariff policy. Heretofore I have stressed the fact that while the trade agreements have seriously injured American agriculture, the primary damages have been inflicted upon American industry and labor. But in the present instance the man on the farm is the direct, the immediate, and practically the sole victim.

You will find that every one of the items on the list under consideration in this proposed treaty with Argentina is a raw product. You will be surprised that every one of them now paying duty, with two exceptions, are the everyday things you find American farmers producing.

And why is the American farmer now being sold down the river? Henry Wallace, our starry-eyed idealist in agriculture, cannot possibly tell you. In fact, if you were to investigate with the Department of Agriculture, you would detect a squirming, but voiceless resentment of the program being pursued by the State Department. Secretary Wallace has fought for, and executed, a series of programs which have pumped literally billions of dollars back to the distressed American farmers during the past 6 years.

No one realizes more keenly than our Secretary of Agriculture the fact that the State Department can, with a single stroke of the pen, tear down everything that he has tried to accomplish, at terrific expense to the country. In fact, Mr. Wallace confessed the utter inconsistencies of the New Deal domestic program and its tariff policy in a speech at Little Rock, Ark., on May 26 of this year. He high-lighted that speech with many unintended, but nevertheless bitter, commentaries on the utter absurdities of the New Deal philosophy.

For 6 long years the New Deal's whole domestic program has been based on the assumption that high prices make prosperity. Of course, the President and his vague theorists have always had the cart before the horse in their childish assumption that prosperity depends upon any given price level. Whether the New Deal philosophy is right or wrong, however, is beside the point. The fact remains that this philosophy has guided every domestic activity undertaken by the New Deal.

The history of the series of farm programs is familiar to all of you. Working on the theory that we could pump prosperity back into agriculture, we have spent billions of dollars in the effort. Striving desperately to restore parity prices, our elevators, our warehouses, and our farmers' bins and cribs are choked with surplus commodities, pegged at artificial prices at terrific cost. As a single example, look at the condition of corn. With practically all of the current bumper crop still standing in the fields, there are 255,409,964 bushels sealed in cribs in the north central region, which embraces the great Corn Belt. That corn is pegged at a minimum price of 57 cents per bushel under Federal loans, representing a total of $145,583,671.48.

In view of that fact, do you wonder that the Agriculture Department must squirm at the thought that corn is one of the items due for tariff reduction under the agreement with Argentina? If the artificial price for corn on our domestic markets induces Argentina to ship corn here in spite of a tariff barrier of 25 cents per bushel—and we have imported a considerable amount of corn—what will inevitably happen if we cut the tariff rate on corn in half? The absurdities inherent in these new treaties are obvious. And remember that corn is only one of a large group of items which will directly affect American farmers.

If Secretary Wallace and the New Deal philosophy have been right for the past 6 years, the President and his State Department cannot possibly be right now. Or if these proposed treaties are defensible, we may as well face the fact that the billions of dollars which we have poured into American agriculture, culminating with the all-time-high appropriation of $1,200,000,000 in the last regular session of Congress, is an utter waste of time and money.

We might as well recognize the fact that the New Deal has always been, as it still is, desperately trying to go in two directions at the same time. You recall how the President tried to justify the amazing fact that the United States Navy has been buying canned beef from Argentina by assuring us that it was not only cheaper but better beef than our own. It must have struck you that this was deplorably bad advertising for American livestock producers and packers. But, even more important, the President's remarks must have impressed you as an admission of the complete inability of the administration to understand the economic factors with which it has been so blithely tinkering.

If American beef is too high-priced for our own Navy, who in the world made it that way but the new dealers, who have put American farmers in a strait jacket by restricting production, hampering marketing, and generally increasing our production costs? If Argentine producers can deliver superior products on our own markets more cheaply than our own farmers, who are still not receiving parity prices, then how in the world will we ever arrive at that stage of parity prices which has been such a fetish of the New Deal, unless we maintain protective tariff around our American markets?

The current excuse is that we are attempting to establish a more friendly and cordial relationship with the nations of the Western Hemisphere. This, in other words, is the good-neighbor policy in action. But good neighborliness begins at home. We wish our neighbors well, and will do much more than our share to treat them well and live with them in harmony. But our first responsibility is always to our own family.

Good neighbors in your community and mine have fences—not because they hate the family next door, but simply to protect their own property. It would never occur to you that you must knock down your fence, or open your gates, to permit your neighbor's chickens or livestock to run in your garden. It would scarcely occur to a good neighbor to resent your exclusion of his livestock.

The internationalist argument for free and uninterrupted world trade is a plausible one. It is especially well supported when, as at present, it is admittedly wise to encourage the solidarity and friendliness of the American nations in this time of strife. But that does not alter the fact that good neighborliness implies a relationship of give and take, whereas all that is apparent in our relationship with the other nations of this hemisphere is a giving on our part, and a taking on theirs. It further does not alter the fact that the success and prosperity of our own farmers is far more important to you and me than the advancement of the agricultural interests of a South American nation which is farther removed, geographically, than the nations of western Europe.

Another amazing fact stands out upon examination of this proposed treaty. All the figures for trade between this country and Argentina indicate that we will be called upon to accept agricultural imports so that the exports of American automobiles and implements may be increased. It strikes me that the automobile and implement manufacturers in this country are less in need of help than our farmers. If they want export trade, let them develop it, but not at the expense of the American farmer.

I sincerely want every one of the nations in the Western Hemisphere in a solid, friendly working relationship. But I will not concede for 1 minute that we must sacrifice the interest of our farmers—or, for that matter, the interests of any other group of American citizens—to accomplish this purpose.

We have, by long odds, the richest markets of the world right within our own borders. Naturally, every other nation in the world wants to sell here where the selling is easiest and best. But we simply cannot lose sight of the fact that this country has developed a standard of living and a system of economic measurements which are unknown anywhere else in the world. We must not lose sight of the further fact that the footless idealism of the New Deal has imposed a new degree of artificiality and restriction upon the American system which makes it more nearly impossible than ever for us to compete successfully in world markets.

I will not concede the superiority of Argentine beef, which the President professes. But granting that it were so, I would still prefer my meat grown on an American farm. I do not even agree that the automobile or tractor manufacturer will lose any profits if we keep it this way. For I know that as a result our own manufacturers will eventually send that product which they might have sold in Argentina onto an American highway or an American farm to the mutual benefit of everyone concerned in our own economy.

Amusement and Entertainment for the Present Generation; the Payment of Debt for Future Generations

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, this administration is intent upon providing amusement and entertainment at public expense for the present generation, no doubt trusting that the voters will reply in continuing support of the political policy of the President. The inevitable result is the fixing upon future generations of the obligation to pay the debts now created to purchase political support.

The present administration has—

NO CONSIDERATION FOR YOUR CHILDREN, NO RESPECT FOR YOUR DEAD

During the past few years throughout the world, assaults have been made upon the liberty of the average man. Abroad dictators in three great countries have by force compelled many under control to work when and where ordered, at designated tasks, have issued food cards which limited the kind and quantity of food which children, women, and men might eat from day to day. Thus, exercising their arbitrary power, the dictators, through oppressive taxation, destroyed the prosperity of their people, compelled them to give over their earnings so that forts, submarines, airplanes might be built; so that millions of dollars worth of guns and munitions of war might be accumulated. Many of those opposing their ambitions were shot, others were beheaded, and thousands, yes, some authorities have it, millions, were imprisoned and starved.

Then came what one dictator thought was his opportunity, and hundreds of thousands of young men and boys were put into the battle lines, and as a result, in Europe, beyond question, more than a million men will die, sacrificed on the altar of one man's political ambition.

Here in America the action, though less violent and bloody, proceeds toward the same end along similar lines but with somewhat different methods. Here we have so far no shooting, no beheading, but we have had a course of conduct which has retarded the return of prosperity, brought our Nation to the verge of national bankruptcy, destroyed in many instances the liberty of the individual.

As the President truthfully said when we had a $4,000,000,000 deficit, continued borrowing would bankrupt us nationally. Knowing this, he has for more than 6 years caused an annual deficit of more than $3,000,000,000. He has done the very thing he said would bankrupt our Nation. Why?

It was the Saviour who said, "Suffer little children and forbid them not to come unto Me: for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Roosevelt has professed great sympathy for the unfortunate, expressed the desire to lessen the burdens of the taxpayers, but by his acts, upon which he must be judged, he has already placed upon the shoulders of the children of this and the next generation an interest charge of approximately a billion dollars a year, which must be paid in taxes earned through the sweat of their bodies. Your children and mine, yes, even unto the third and fourth generations, will be paying interest on the debt created by Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Roosevelt for all of his expressions of sympathy, of concern for the welfare of those who must work, has nevertheless forged the bonds of slavery upon the little arms and limbs of the children of today, of the unborn generations of tomorrow.

ROOSEVELT IS RUTHLESS

"Honor thy father and thy mother; that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." So sayeth the scripture.

To further his experiments, his extravagant plans, his nightmarish dreams, this man in the White House is flooding thousands of acres of land in Illinois to create Crab Orchard Lake, a place of amusement for the people. In doing this he has not only, at exorbitant expense, moved families from their comfortable homes on fertile acres but he proposes to flood the graves in 22 cemeteries, or to move the bones of the dead from the places where they have long lain buried.

Roman emperors in days of old sacrificed the Christians to the savage beasts so that the people might be entertained. Roosevelt would destroy cemeteries, turn the flood of waters into the graves of our ancestors, some of whom no doubt fought for the preservation of this Nation.

HE WOULD SEND YOUR HUSBAND AND BOY TO WAR

Today, meddling in foreign affairs, raising false issues, seeking to divert attention from his failure here at home, he is following a course of conduct which, if he is not stopped, will send your husband, your sons, to fight in a foreign war.

If you believe that he is wrong in this, that we have no need to join in this world conflict, then write your Senator and your Congressman and tell him in no uncertain terms that if your husband or your children are taken from your home to be offered as a sacrifice in a war across the sea, you will do your utmost to see that that Senator, or Congressman, receives a command at the next November election to remain in his home, while you send to Congress someone who will fight for the preservation of your Government, of your liberty; who will endeavor to make America safe for democracy his first concern.

New Deal Economy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, November 1, 1939

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, although the Federal deficit for the first quarter of this fiscal year was approximately $1,000,000,000, there is a steady increase in the personnel and pay roll in the executive branch of the Government, according to figures recently released by the United States Civil Service Commission.

Civil employees during August totaled 932,953, an increase of 4,758 since July. The pay roll for August was $141,670,976, as compared to $138,975,099 in July. The number of employees in the District of Columbia totaled 124,610, both totals reaching new peaks for Federal employment. These figures do not include legislative or Army and Navy personnel, and show constantly increasing totals with the exception of the Public Works and Works Projects Administrations.

During August 1938 the executive branch employed 872,347 persons, compared to 932,953 in the same month this year, or an increase of 60,606. The pay roll for August of 1939 was $141,670,976, an increase of $9,286,153 over the pay roll of August last year, which amounted to $132,384,823.

During the past year there has been considerable publicity given in the National Capital to administration proposals for reorganization and economy in Federal bureaus and agencies, but the August pay roll shows that the annual cost of operating the executive branch of the Government approximates $1,700,000,000. It also indicates that, instead of economy, thousands of employees are being placed on the Federal pay roll to help swell the gigantic deficit which threatens to exceed $4,000,000,000 during this fiscal year, despite the Reorganization Act to minimize duplication and to reduce expenditures.

The feverish war activity and hysteria thus are serving as a smoke screen for the extravagance of the administration. While this country and its officials direct their attention to European countries and attempt to interfere with their affairs, our own domestic problems remain unsolved, bureaucracy is in the ascendancy, and financial chaos is around the corner.

The August report released by the United States Civil Service Commission contains the following:

TABLE 1.—Civil employees in the executive branch of the U. S. Government, July 1939 and August 1939

Item	August	July	Net change
			Increase (+) or decrease (−)	Percent
Entire service:
All employees	932,953	928,195	+4,758	0.5
Full-time:
Regular	794,558	796,609	−2,051	−.3
Force-account	91,837	88,205	+3,632	4.1
Part-time	46,558	43,381	+3,177	7.3
In the District of Columbia:
All employees	124,610	124,015	+595	.5
Full-time:
Regular	118,314	117,795	+519	.4
Force-account	5,903	5,805	+98	1.7
Part-time	393	415	−22	−5.3
Outside the District of Columbia:
All employees	808,343	804,180	+4,163	.5
Full-time:
Regular	676,244	678,814	−2,570	−.4
Force-account	85,934	82,400	+3,534	4.3
Part-time	46,165	42,966	+3,199	7.4

Thomas Bracket Reed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT J. ENGEL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, November 1, 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE LOS ANGELES EXAMINER OF OCTOBER 27, 1939, BY GEORGE ROTHWELL BROWN

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial by George Rothwell Brown:

[From the Los Angeles Examiner of October 27, 1939]

THE POLITICAL PARADE

(By George Rothwell Brown)

WASHINGTON, October 26.—One of the saddest spectacles the Capitol has presented in many years was that of a skeletonized, rubber-stamp House of Representatives, pausing in the midst of its enforced dawdling at White House command, to note the centenary of Thomas B. Reed.

That, indeed, was a sight for the gods!

The observance, by significant chance, fell almost upon the 30th anniversary of the revolt against the rules of the mighty czar of the House, which began in the winter of 1909, and which has culminated today in a President who has been for 7 years the real leader of the House, and in a Speaker and a leader who have become little more than a couple of messenger boys.

It is incredible that Thomas B. Reed would have stood for the encroachment by the Executive upon the magnificent constitutional powers of the House of Representatives, as a succession of weak and complacent Democratic speakers have stood for it, and bowed to it.

Thomas B. Reed was a man of a stature no longer to be observed in the American House of Representatives. There are but two or three of that heroic cast left in the Senate.

The appearance of such a man in the House today would constitute the greatest hope we could have of an eventual restoration of the power, the dignity, and the intellectual integrity of the House, and through that the restoration of the constitutional system of checks and balances, the only thing which has made our Government work for 150 years.

The enormous parliamentary powers which Tom Reed inherited from Clay, Blaine, and Randall were destroyed under Uncle Joe Cannon.

By this destruction the leadership of the House was transferred to the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue in the course of 25 years or so. Not the Speaker but the President was the boss.

Mr. Roosevelt was not to blame for this. He found a condition at the Capitol and turned it to his own use.

From time to time events must be reexamined and reappraised. It was once the habit to refer to Reed as the czar of the House and Uncle Joe Cannon as a despot.

But if the strong speakers, from Clay to Cannon, were at times ruthless, they at least governed well, and they preserved the majesty of the popular branch of the legislative.

Their powers were not usurped. They came to them from the British House of Commons, who had won them in blood and toil, and from the Commons through the American colonial assemblies.

The strong speakers of the Colonies stood between the rights of the people and the encroachments of the royal Governors.

It was a magnificent power which Thomas B. Reed exercised as the chosen servant of the House of Representatives.

There were no "must" bills in those days. Tom Reed would have stood out against a $4,800,000,000 lump-sum appropriation until hell became a skating rink for Sonja Henie.

Will the "Reed rules" ever come back to the House? Most Members would answer with an emphatic "no."

But I am not so sure. The Presidency, under Mr. Roosevelt, has certainly become too strong. It has become dangerous.

Mr. Roosevelt himself has frankly said that in the hands of certain others—puppets, I believe he called them—these powers might become instruments of tyranny. Indeed they might.

To put a check on a too-strong President, it may be necessary some day for the House of Representatives to restore the power of the Speakership.

Imagine a condition in which a political party held control of the House by a very narrow margin, six or eight votes.

Against a determined minority it might not be able to function at all.

To save the House from chaos it might be essential for that party to organize the House, adopt the Reed rules, and place a strong man in the chair.

Anyhow, at last the present House, in its pitiful state, at least has become Tom-Reed conscious.

That's something.

Embargo and the "City of Flint"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE JACKSON (MICH.) CITIZEN-PRESS

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Jackson Citizen-Press, of Jackson, Mich.:

[From the Jackson (Mich.) Citizen-Press]

EMBARGO AND THE "CITY OF FLINT"

Advocates of repeal of the embargo on shipment of arms to belligerents are pointing to the seizure by the Germans of the steamer, City of Flint, as evidence of need for changing the neutrality law. They are right in one respect. Under a cash-and-carry plan of commerce with belligerents the City of Flint would not have been carrying contraband to Great Britain thereby inviting German attack. But the fact is that those Senators and Representatives in Washington who favor retaining the embargo plan likewise approve the cash-and-carry idea. That is the only change they would make in the present neutrality law.

When advocates of repealing the embargo make the claim that their plan would segregate us more completely from war they are insincere. The very incident of the City of Flint illustrates the danger of their position.

The Germans captured the City of Flint because it carried a cargo calculated to harm Germany as a participant in the current war. Even those of us who most heartily sympathize with the Franco-British Allies cannot fail to understand Germany's position in this situation. Britain, using her huge navy, completely blockades German ports, preventing all commerce from entering. That is sound war strategy and probably will win the war. But it likewise is sound strategy for Germany, to such extent as she is able, to undertake to prevent contraband from reaching her enemies.

From such a position it is going to be unfortunately easy for the German mind to follow along to the point where, with the embargo repealed, she will attempt to handicap American production of munitions for her enemies. We all remember how during the last war German secret agents bombed American plants making war munitions for the Allies. If now we return to the business of making arms for one side when the other side cannot buy them, do the advocates of repeal think that Germany will fail to act? And then supposing the Germans, who are notoriously stupid in anticipating American reactions, do bomb an American plant which is making munitions for Britain, isn't that going to carry us to the brink of war and perhaps over the brink?

If we want to stay out of this war—and a vast majority of Americans do want to stay out—hadn't we better stay out altogether?

Outline of Details of 1940 Objectives of Veterans of Foreign Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

STATEMENT BY MILLARD W. RICE, NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE V. F. W.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, while we are discussing the present European war, we must not overlook the fact that we have a tremendous responsibility left to us from the last war.

Practically every man in the House is pledged to the proposition of keeping America out of the present conflict, although we may differ as to the methods of reaching that laudable end.

As chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, I am ever conscious of the devastation wrought among the young men of 20 years ago; and I pray God that America may not be drawn into another conflict that would probably cost the lives of millions of the boys of this generation, to say nothing of the women and children whose lives might be destroyed by high explosives and poison gas.

Under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a statement issued by Mr. Millard W. Rice, national legislative representative, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, giving an outline of the details of the 1940 objectives of the V. F. W.

The matter referred to follows:

POINT 1. SECURITY FOR AMERICA

A. ARMED FORCES

1. An expanded Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, as well as National Guard, C. M. T. C., R. O. T. C., and Reserve Corps, amply equipped with scientifically developed, modernized, mechanized, and motorized matériel, sufficient to protect America against any possible aggressive force.

2. Natural resources:

a. Detailed plans for effective mobilization of men and money, labor, and industry in event of war.

(1) A graduated part of wealth of every resident to be subject to conscription, for purchase of taxable, low-interest-bearing, nonnegotiable, short-term Government bonds.

b. Constructive Nation-wide natural resources conservation programs.

c. Acquire island Navy bases as proposed in Senate Joint Resolutions 119, 120, 170–174.

d. Rigid governmental control of manufacture and sales of all munitions.

e. Sale of helium gas to foreign countries for peacetime purposes only.

3. Personnel provisions:

a. Increased pay for enlisted personnel and lower-grade officers.

b. Government insurance for all active members of United States armed forces.

c. Transportation home for all fleet reservists and their families.

B. ACTUAL NEUTRALITY AS TO WARS OUTSIDE OF THE AMERICAS

1. Adequate mechanized, motorized matériel, and mobilized men for armed forces.

2. No foreign entanglement which might lead America into war; renounce war as an instrument of international policy; recognize state of war regardless of its formal declaration.

3. Proclamation by the United States that it will not engage in any war of aggression, but that it will support and defend the Monroe Doctrine. No change in United States Constitution as to declaration of war.

4. Withdraw armed protection to American citizens, after a period of warning, during their continued travel or residence in any country at war or in any war danger zone; prohibit such travel by American citizens.

5. Continue compliance with provisions of so-called Johnson Act; prohibit extension of credit or loans by United States, or any of its citizens, to any country, or its citizens, which is engaged in war.

6. Permit sale of supplies to any nation at war only if paid for, and only if ownership thereof is transferred at our shore lines, without any protection or responsibility whatsoever by United States Government as to same.

7. Prohibit any American merchant vessels from becoming armed; provide for their clear identification during wartime; disclaim any responsibility for protection of those which carry any merchandise to any country at war or into any danger zone, but permit clearance of such American vessels only if adequate private insurance is carried on such vessels and their crew members.

8. Take the profits out of any possible future war by steeply graduated personal and corporation income taxes.

9. Adequate provisions for all disabled veterans, and the dependents of all deceased veterans, of all wars, past and future.

10. Encourage peaceful international negotiations to adjust most irritating deficiencies, differences, and inequities.

11. Conduct a program of education as to all of the costs of war.

—

POINT 2. SECURITY FOR AMERICAN CITIZENS

A. PROMOTION OF AMERICANISM

1. Maintenance of our constitutional rights of free speech, a free press, religious freedom, petition and assembly, and education as to value of same as compared with communism, fascism, nazi-ism, or any other "ism."

2. Promotion of general education of our children, of our citizens, and of those on their way toward citizenship; promotion of public forums.

3. Educational and inspirational activities among our Nation's youth.
4. Cooperation as to all noncontroversial constructive community activities.
5. Joint unified veteran organization ceremonies in Arlington National Cemetery on Armistice Day.
6. Dissemination of information concerning social-security laws and other Federal laws which directly affect many citizens; steps to assure efficient administration of such beneficial laws.
7. Adoption of a national-flag code:
a. No importation, purchase, or use of foreign-made United States flags.
b. School pupils to be instructed in proper flag etiquette.
c. Display of United States flag on or near all Federal and school buildings.
8. Reduce crime by rehabilitation of criminals.
9. Expand Federal Bureau of Investigation activities.
10. Promote voluntary fingerprinting of all Americans.
11. Constitution Day, September 17, to be made a national holiday.
12. All patriotic holidays to be recognized on all American vessels.
13. Offer of Veterans of Foreign Wars members and units to serve in case of national emergency.
14. Preservation of the Constitution, Constellation, Hartford, Olympia, and America as historic naval relics.

B. PROTECTION OF AMERICANISM

1. Our threefold form of government to be perpetuated.
2. All governmental employees to take oath of allegiance.
3. Governmental employment only for American citizens willing to serve in emergency; all persons who receive checks for payment of services, employment, contracts, loans, or other benefits from any Federal agency, or from any federally supported agency, to be fingerprinted.
4. Vigorous opposition to and investigation of agencies of communism, fascism, nazi-ism, or any other form of dictatorship or regimentation.
5. Make it a crime to advocate or promote overthrow of the United States Government by force or violence.
6. No old-age assistance, pensions, or other governmental benefits to aliens.
7. Register, fingerprint, photograph, and identify all aliens in and coming into the United States.
8. Reduce immigration as to all countries down to 10 percent of present quotas.
a. Exclude those likely to become a public burden, or to replace the employment of any citizen, or who believe in use of force to overthrow United States Government.
b. Prevent smuggling of aliens into country by increased border patrols.
9. Deport all undesirable aliens.
a. Criminals, those ineligible for citizenship, those who advocate use of force to overthrow present form of government, and those who are public charges—on relief, or in penal or mental institutions.
10. Island dependencies not to be admitted as States of United States.

—

POINT 3. SECURITY FOR AMERICA'S VETERANS AND THEIR DEPENDENTS

A. LIBERALIZED PROVISIONS FOR SERVICE DISABLED

1. Ten-percent minimum rating for combat disabilities.
2. Restore full compensation for presumptives.
3. Compensation to be barred by misconduct only if felonious.
4. Statutory award of $35 for loss or loss of use of a limb in all cases.
5. Causative-factor requirement as to disabled emergency officer's retirement benefits to be liberalized.
6. Service-connected disability ratings to be increased by 10 percent of basic ratings for each additional 5 years of age after fortieth birthday.

B. LIBERALIZED PENSIONS FOR DISABLED VETERANS

1. War veterans with permanent total non-service-connected disabilities to receive pensions of $60 per month.
a. Pension to be barred by misconduct only if felonious.
2. Honorably discharged, 90-day, disabled World War veterans to receive pensions at same rates as granted to disabled veterans of Spanish-American War: $20 per month for 10-percent disability, $25 for 25 percent, $35 for 50 percent, $50 for 75 percent, $60 for total disability, and $100 if in need of an attendant.
3. Honorably discharged, 65-year-old, 90-day World War veterans to receive pensions of $60 per month.

C. LIBERALIZED PENSIONS FOR DEPENDENTS OF VETERANS

1. Pensions of $30 per month for dependent widows of all deceased World War veterans honorably discharged after 90 or more days of service, plus allowances for dependent children same as for children of deceased veterans of Spanish-American War.
2. Pensions of $40 per month for dependent widows of all deceased World War veterans who, prior to death, were suffering with service-connected disabilities but whose deaths were caused by other disabilities.
3. Pensions of $50 per month for widows of all deceased World War veterans who died by reason of service-connected disabilities or who had permanent total combat disabilities.
4. Pensions for widows and orphans of pensionable disabled Regulars at same rates as for dependents of service-connected World War veterans.
5. Widow to be eligible for pension if married to and living with veteran for 3 years preceding his death, or if she had a child with veteran as father.
6. Receipt of pension by parents of one deceased World War veteran not to affect entitlement to pension on basis of death of other sons.
7. Pensions to minor children of deceased Spanish-American War veterans until age 18, or until age 21 if attending accredited school.
8. Accrued compensation or. pension to dependents of deceased veterans.
9. Adequate social-security benefits for all dependent children.

D. MEDICAL TREATMENT FOR VETERANS

1. Hospitalization for all war, campaign, and expedition veterans.
2. Medical treatment for American veterans residing abroad.
3. No compensation reduction during first 3 months of hospitalization.
4. Increase allowances of compensated and pensioned veterans in homes or hospitals up to not less than $25 per month.
5. Dentures from contract dentists where not feasible to complete dental work started while in Veterans' Administration hospital.
6. Prosthetic and orthopedic appliances for non-service-connected cases.
7. Veterans' Administration facilities to be located according to veteran population needs.

E. BONUS LEGISLATION

1. Enactment of Philippine travel pay bill.
2. Bonus and disability-retirement eligibility for provisional World War officers.
3. Duplicate adjusted-service certificate to be issued where veteran is unable to secure possession of original certificate.

F. INSURANCE FOR VETERANS

1. Government insurance to be incontestable after 2 years.
2. Remove limitation dates as to all war-risk insurance claims and suits.

G. BURIAL BENEFITS AS TO VETERANS

1. National cemeteries to be in all States.
2. Optional noncorrosive metal headstones for veterans' graves.
3. Grave markers for veterans whose last discharges were not dishonorable.
4. Same burial rights for the widows of deceased enlisted men buried in national cemeteries as granted to the widows of officers.
5. Same burial allowance as to service-connected disabled regulars, and as to campaign-badge veterans, as now provided for as to war veterans.

H. SERVICE RECORDS OF VETERANS

1. Fingerprints of all war veterans to be classified according to type.
2. Discharges because of minority to be made honorable for all war, campaign, and expedition veterans.
3. Review boards in War and Navy Departments, with authority to give honorable discharge certificates.
4. Engraved honorable discharge certificates for all former members of United States armed forces.
5. Remove time-limitation date (June 25, 1928) for granting of awards, decorations, and citations for World War service.
6. Purple Heart Medal to any war combat veteran who was hospitalized because of such service, together with one gold bar for each bleeding wound sustained by the veteran.
7. War service credit to railroad employees for retirement purposes.

I. ADMINISTRATION OF VETERAN BENEFITS

1. All service-connected claims rated as less than 10 percent, and all informal claims, to be reviewed by Veterans' Administration.
a. Retroactive adjustment of all erroneous Veterans' Administration adjudications.
2. Modify Veterans' Administration regulations so as to resolve benefit of doubt against veterans concerning medical and other evidence, on basis of facts, not mere belief.
3. Permanent total disability to be determined on individual basis.
a. To be measured by individual's inability to follow any substantially gainful occupation, on same basis as for Spanish War veterans.
b. Modify Veterans' Administration regulations to permit permanent and total rating when there are present two or more disabilities, affecting different functions, one of which shall be 45 percent disabling (now 65 percent) and sufficient other disability to make a combined rating of 65 percent (now 85 percent), or when there is present one disability rated at 60 percent (now 70 percent), accompanied by unemployability.
c. Permanent and total ratings for all active tuberculars, and for severe diabetics requiring insulin periodically.
4. Veterans' Administration annual reports to classify beneficiaries as to overseas service.
5. All limitation dates as to veteran-benefit applications to be removed.

6. Greater uniformity of benefits among the several groups of veterans, and the dependents of veterans, where equitable and feasible.

7. Benefit payments to be resumed, where discontinued because of fraud, if claimant is found not guilty before a duly constituted court.

8. Veteran to be given ample opportunity to present his contention before apportionment of his pension is made to his separated wife.

9. Mileage allowance of 4 cents per mile where transportation vehicle is furnished by attendant of veteran.

J. EMPLOYMENT FOR VETERANS

1. Federal civil-service preferences for veterans as to:

a. Examinations:

(1) Ten points to be added to earned ratings of: Service-connected disabled veterans, their wives, war veterans over age of 55, and widows of all deceased veterans; placement at top of civil-service register.

(2) Five points to be added to earned ratings of all other veterans, and names of war veterans placed next in order on civil-service register.

(3) Quarterly examination privilege for all war, campaign, and expedition veterans, for 6-year-service veterans, and for 10-point persons.

(4) Veterans' Administration to certify to Civil Service Commission only as to service-connected disabilities without stating degree.

(5) Age and physical requirements waived if otherwise qualified.

(6) Educational prerequisites waived if otherwise qualified.

(7) Include war service as part of experience prerequisite time.

(8) Credit experience gained in voluntary civic, social welfare, and veterans' service work, with same credit as if on paid basis.

b. Appointments:

(1) Appointing officer to submit adequate reason for skipping over a veteran to Civil Service Commission; its reaction thereto to be available to the veteran or his representative.

(2) Names of all appointees to be published.

c. Retention, upon reduction of forces, in all Federal agencies.

d. Removal only on basis of written charges; protection against lower job or salary status; transfers with same job classification and salary, as to handicapped veterans, if possible, rather than dismissal or retirement.

e. Reinstatement from furloughed, resigned, or dismissed status, and after recovery from retirement disability.

f. Appeal Board to consider appeals on all Federal employment matters; veteran or his representative to review records and present evidence.

g. Local postmasters to make permanent appointments of veterans in same order as original substitute appointments.

h. Retention in civil-service status of veteran employees of Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, without annual examination.

2. Same preferences as to all Federal positions, contracts, public works, P. W. A., W. P. A., etc.

a. Effective preferences as to all war, campaign, and expedition veterans, the wives of unemployable veterans, and the widows of veterans who have been certified by any governmental agency as in need of employment, as to all administrative, supervisory, and work-relief employment for which they are qualified and available under the Work Projects Administration.

b. Military-records projects for unemployed veterans in every State.

3. Civil service for all non-policy-making full-time Federal employees.

4. Preference to American citizens as to all governmental employment, services, contracts, loans, grants, and other assistance.

5. Optional civil-service retirements for civil-service employees.

6. Optional quarters, subsistence, and laundry for Veterans' Administration employees.

7. Increase veterans' quota in Civilian Conservation Corps from 30,000 to 50,000 and make veterans eligible for immediate reenrollment.

a. Reserve officers with World War service to have preference for all civilian positions.

8. A census of all veterans in each community and State, cross classified as to ages, occupations, able-bodied and disabled, employed, partially employed, and unemployed; and as to those:

a. Employed by the Federal Government, by States, counties, and municipalities, with and without civil-service status.

b. Employed under Federal, State, and local relief projects.

9. Intensified employment service and veterans' placement service maintained under a separate budget.

a. Urge employers, especially those who are veterans, to extend employment to qualified veterans.

10. A coordinated program of vocational training and placement in suitable employment of all unemployed employable older persons, particularly veterans.

a. Extend homestead preferences for veterans up to 1950.

11. Effective veteran employment and civil-service preference laws by all States, counties, and municipalities; greater uniformity of beneficial State laws relative to veterans, their dependents, and their organizations.

12. Cooperation of local, State, and National employment committees of Veterans of Foreign Wars with other veteran organizations, governmental agencies, and private employers to take such steps as will assure to all ex-service men the opportunity for permanent, suitable, gainful employment.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

ADDRESS BY RIGHT REV. MSGR. JOHN O'GRADY

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by Rt. Rev. Msgr. John O'Grady, for years secretary of the National Conference of Catholic Charities, over the Blue Network of the National Broadcasting Co. at Spokane, Wash., October 19, 1939.

The address follows:

Two weeks ago I was in Washington, D. C. Europe was locked in war; Congress was locked in debate. Everywhere in the Nation's Capitol there was a sense of determination, but also of great uncertainty.

Day after day we were faced with the realities of war; the ruthless invasion of Poland; the burning of cities; the flight of the starving, homeless people caught between two advancing armies and not knowing where to turn. Day by day we awaited with horror new evidences of ruthlessness. To me the realities of the situation stood out in striking contrast to the debate on Capitol Hill. After the wonderfully clear speech of the President in which he stated that the best way to keep this country out of war was to repeal the embargo, the debates appeared to be getting increasingly out of touch with the temper of the American people. Some who opposed repeal voiced their distrust of the President; some accused the Members of Congress who wished to raise the embargo as warmongers. The suggestion was made, in an utterly irresponsible way, that now that Great Britain was locked in a life-and-death struggle against the Nazi aggressor, we should take the opportunity of robbing her of her possessions on this hemisphere. Thus were they mimicking the aggressor whose aims were utterly at variance with our philosophy of government and our Christian ideals of life.

Our Holy Father, Pope Pius the XII, is fully aware of the implications of this war for Christian civilization. In his address to the new Lithuanian Minister to the Vatican yesterday he said: "As supreme pastor I could not close my eyes when, precisely for the salvation of souls arise new incommensurable dangers—when on the face of Europe, Christian in its fundamental lineaments, the sinister shadow of thoughts and deeds of enemies of God casts itself close and more threateningly every day." This is the fundamental thought the Holy Father would have all Christians and all believers in religion keep in mind. It is of far greater importance than any delimitation of boundary lines or struggles for racial supremacy. If nazi-ism and communism succeed in eliminating God and Christianity, then we are all facing dark days.

It was with the sense of confusion and relief that I left Washington to come to the West. I have stopped in town after town and spoken to hundreds upon hundreds of people. Here the false values that we have had thrust upon us are replaced by real values. In my contacts with the people in the middle and far West, I have become more keenly aware of the realities of the spirit.

In Washington even Senators and Congressmen who have come from immediate contact with their people were confused about the true sentiment that existed at home. After traveling 3,000 miles, every mile filled with human experiences and human contacts, I am no longer confused as to the true attitude of the American people. It is becoming more and more definite every day.

The American people are fully alive to the issues involved in this war. They want to maintain in this country the ideals and practices of democracy—they want to maintain the principles and practices of Christianity. While they are aware of the problems involved in the European conflict, they have serious doubts as to how far war will solve these problems. After the war is over, they ask themselves "will the problems and conflicts of Europe be solved—will European countries be closer to our democratic ideals—will the defeat of Hitler bring democracy in Germany—will it weaken the influence of communism—will it make an end of racial and national quarrels?" The people of this country do not want to become involved in purely European quarrels, they do not want to become involved in the adjustment of the European boundary lines. They feel that European nations must develop a leadership that is capable of solving their own probems. They are convinced that the problems of Europe cannot be solved without reference to the principles of democratic government.

The great majority of Americans with whom I have spoken believe that the issue of American neutrality is an American issue and must be dealt with solely from the standpoint of American ideals and interests. They will not permit European racial interests and antagonisms into this issue. They have no sympathy for those who would introduce European quarrels into this country. From my contacts throughout the middle and far West, I am certain that the President of the United States reflected the true temper of the American people when he said that we can and must keep out of war. After speaking with Americans in all walks of life, I am certain of another conviction that rests in their mind. I am certain that they have the utmost faith in the word and ability of the President of the United States. I am certain that our people trust the President. I am certain that they believe he knows what is best when he says that repeal will lessen the chances of American participation in the war, as he knew best last summer when he stated that war was imminent and that the maintenance of the Neutrality Act would make it certain. Our people, from what I have seen of them, are convinced that at this dangerous time, the President needs all the trust and confidence in him that we can give him if he is to steer this country through and maintain its neutrality. By undermining the President at the present time we are undermining the strength and the influence of America.

What else could I believe when I, as everyone else, have seen the amazing increase in the President's popularity in the last 4 months as illustrated by the Gallup poll?

The American people believe in their own right that repeal of the embargo is a measure that will keep us out of war. "Why," they ask, "if it is a warlike measure, does it include cash and carry, the greatest safeguard we possess at this time against attack by hostile powers?"

Our people, I am sure, see nothing immoral in the export to Britain and France of the means by which they may halt Nazi aggression and maintain their independence and their freedom. And I believe our people are more intelligent than some Members of Congress believe. They understand that the true issues of isolation and benevolent neutrality are not contained within the terms of the repeal of the arms embargo. It has been pointed out, trade in the goods included in the embargo represented no more than 13 percent of our total exports to the Allies during our period of neutrality in the Great War. Our people understand that 13 percent in itself cannot create the economic suction that might lead us into war. They understand that if we are to cut off that economic suction as a means of keeping this country out of war, it is the 87 percent and not the 13 percent that we must eliminate. Isolation, in an economic sense, involves cutting off all our exports. The people know very well what this would mean for American industry and agriculture. This is real economic isolation and it is a policy which no supporter of the arms embargo has yet dared to put forward.

Our people know that an isolationist policy is not a realistic one. They know that the practical policy is one that recognizes their sympathies for democracies, which reiterates our demand to keep out of war and which strives to advance our economic welfare, as the best method of guaranteeing the security and contentment of the people of this country.

I found one last conviction everywhere among the people of the West. I found the conviction that nothing in this war must be allowed to interfere with the peaceful processes of the liberal readjustment which our country has undertaken during the past 7 years. I found a renewed devotion to the principles of our national administration. I found a new determination to continue the programs that have been inaugurated for the general betterment of the people. No abandonment, I am sure, of the national program under the pretext of wartime appeasement or other misleading slogans will be tolerated. Real wages must not be allowed to decline—our civil liberties must not be curtailed—the rights of labor must be maintained and extended—profiteering in war exports must be prevented—our social-security program, our national youth program, the work program, and the national housing program must be maintained. It has been my proud privilege to have had a small part in the development of these programs. I know what they have meant to the people of the United States. They represent a type of progress of which the American people can well feel proud.

Scarcely less than the involvement in war, our people fear the righteous condemnation of us by the rest of the world; that we profited by death and were content to sit back and reap profits while others gave their blood on the battlefield. All the regrettable mistakes, and perhaps unavoidable ones, such as the nonpayment of war debts, would fade into insignificance beside the dreadful judgment upon America if she were solely concerned in making profits out of the disasters of others.

As a Catholic priest who has given his life to the extension of charity I have not abandoned hope in these dark days. I believe that individuals and nations will again return to Christ and to the practices of His sweet love. I know that mankind will soon tire of the error of its ways and will find its consolation in Him in whom alone it can be found.

In this hour of tragedies I, like other members of Christ's army throughout the world, look for guidance and inspiration to the great common father of christendom, Pope Pius XII. He is constantly encouraging the Christian world to pray for peace and return to sanity and Christian ideals. Let us hope that the leaders of Europe may soon hearken to his voice. Let us hope that they may avail themselves of his wisdom and world-wide understanding when they finally gather around the council tables of peace. It is indeed consoling to us to know that the neutrality program of our great President is so close in all respect to that set forth by the Supreme Shepherd of our church.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT G. ALLEN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST OF NOVEMBER 1, 1939

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from today's issue of the Washington Post:

[From the Washington Post of November 1, 1939]

NEUTRALS HAVE RIGHTS

Certain conscientious Members of the House who strongly favor repeal of the arms embargo as a matter of national self-interest are nevertheless in doubt as to the propriety of such action at this time. They argue that repeal involves a change in national policy in the midst of an international conflict and is, therefore, unneutral.

If neutrality is regarded as a strait jacket, fettered upon a nation at peace by the action of belligerents, that contention would have a measure of plausibility. Actually neutrality has never had any such meaning in international law.

If neutrality implied wholesale surrender of rights by a nation at peace, it would follow that in time of war only belligerents possess freedom of action. As Secretary Hull has pointed out, belligerents have never hesitated to change their rules, practices, methods, and policies in various directions during the progress of hostilities. In making such changes, combatant nations are properly guided by reasons of national self-interest. It is well to remember that this standard is an equally valid guide for neutrals. The only restraint imposed upon the latter by international law is that their rules and regulations regarding neutrality should apply to all combatants.

On that score there is no room for any criticism of the administration bill. President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull sought modification of the existing neutrality law many months before war broke out in Europe. When thwarted by the failure of the Senate to act during the closing days of the last session, notice was given that modification of the law would be urged when Congress reconvened. The repeal of the embargo and the other proposed changes in the neutrality law thus follow a line of policy advertised to the world long before Germany invaded Poland.

Even if no such prior notice of intent had been given, the United States would not be precluded from changing its neutrality policy whenever national interest seemed to make such change desirable. Statutes defining that policy are a matter of domestic legislation. And to suggest that we have no right to change our laws because Hitler or Stalin might not like the alteration is equivalent to saying that, in this particular field, Hitler and Stalin control the policy of the United States.

Obviously under existing circumstances, the lifting of the arms embargo would operate in favor of Great Britain and France. It would permit them to make use of the traditional advantages that arise from the possession of superior sea power. It is equally true, however, that the so-called cash-and-carry provisions are certain to operate to the disadvantage of Great Britain and France.

At a time when their shipping is being subjected to the hazards and depredations of submarine warfare, the British and French will have to divert merchant vessels to transport supplies purchased in the United States. The new law also drastically changes the rules regarding credit in their disfavor. But there is nothing unneutral about this, since these restrictions apply theoretically to Germany, just as the advantages of embargo repeal are also theoretically available to the Nazis.

Both embargo repeal and the cash-and-carry provisions constitute a change in American policy, both changes to be made applicable in wartime. If the one change were "unneutral," so would the other be. If international law opposed modification of the ban on the sale of arms it would similarly oppose any and all other changes in the existing neutrality law. But the fact is that no such restrictions are imposed on neutrals by international law.

There is also the argument of those who agree that there would be nothing at all unneutral in repealing the embargo if the intent behind that action is neutral. But the intent, these critics assert, is to assist France and Great Britain at the expense of Germany.

Since the Allies would have to pay cash down for any munitions and then transport them in their own ships, it cannot be said that the "intent" of helping the Allies is very pronounced. It might with equal reason be said that there is an unneutral intent to help Germany in hedging the sale of munitions with restrictions which are in no way necessary in a policy of real neutrality.

Even in the simplest of private cases the question of motive is difficult to establish. It is all but impossible to prove in the complicated field of international law. Certainly in the present debate this artificial complication need not bother the most scrupulous of Congressmen. His conscience will be clear if his intent is to vote in the way he thinks America's interests lie. Whether Hitler or Stalin or Chamberlain or Daladier dislikes that vote need not for a moment concern him.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER G. ANDREWS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

STATEMENT BY A CONSTITUENT

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a statement referring to the present Neutrality Act by a student of international law residing in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent.

The statement is as follows:

THE NEUTRALITY LAW MAY NOT NOW BE CHANGED WITHOUT THE CHANGE CONSTITUTING AN UNNEUTRAL ACT BY THE UNITED STATES

If a neutral nation violates one of these provisions, it subjects itself (1) to financial responsibility for loss caused by such act and (2) gives the belligerent country affected by such act a right to treat the previously neutral country as an enemy. Although various international-law text writers have questioned the soundness of the principle which permits nationals of a neutral country to supply arms, ammunition, and implements of war to both sides, all international-law text writers admit that for a country to supply these articles only to one of the belligerents may be properly interpreted by the other belligerents as an unneutral act. It has also been recognized that though the nationals of a neutral are entitled to trade with both belligerents in the usual course of trade, the neutral country cannot itself assist either side or so regulate its affairs as to be of assistance to one side. These distinctions will be found in Moore, International Law Digest, vol. 7, pp. 955 et seq.; Wharton's International Law Digest, vol. 3, pp. 516 et seq.; Hall, International Law, 5th edition, pp. 598 et seq.; Snow, Cases on International Law, pp. 461 et seq., and Fiore Droit International, 2d edition, pp. 1561 et seq.

As far back as 1796 Attorney General Lee (see 1 Opinions of the Attorney General, 61) pointed out that though belligerents may come into the territory of a neutral nation and there purchase or removed any article whatsoever, unless the right so to do was denied by statute or order it would be a clear violation of neutrality nevertheless it would be a clear violation of neutrality as defined under international law if the statute or order was made with the object of impeding the operation of either belligerent power.

Again, on October 13, 1855, in a communication of Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, to Mr. Buchanan, Minister to England (British and Foreign State Papers, 421, 424), it was specifically pointed out that in upholding the right of American nationals to trade with the enemy that "as this Government has had no connection with these proceedings, neither belligerent has any just ground of complaint against it."

Again, during the war between Chile, Bolivia, and Peru, in a communication of Mr. Buchanan, Minister to the Argentine Republic, to Mr. Hay, Secretary of State (No. 584, December 1, 1898), it was said:

"While it is generally conceded that the traffic in arms and munitions of war by private persons without intent to aid either belligerent, is admissible as a commercial transaction, subject to the risk of capture, yet that, when the shipment is made by agents of the belligerents on a scale so large as to convert them into important aids to the war, neutral governments should use due diligence to prevent such traffic with one of the belligerents, so that it may not be required to sanction similar operations on the part of the other belligerent and thus tolerate the conversion of its territory into a center of expeditions in conflict with its neutral character."

In the case of The Bermuda (3 Wallace, 514), Chief Justice Chase, speaking for the United States Supreme Court, said:

"Neutrals in their own country may sell to belligerents whatever belligerents choose to buy. The principal exceptions to this rule are, that neutrals must not sell to one belligerent what they refuse to sell to the other. * * *."

Mr. Moore, in his International Law Digest (vol. 7, p. 973), summarizes the distinction between what a citizen of a neutral may lawfully do and the activities of the government of the neutral which would involve a breach of the international law principles of neutrality, thus:

"But, there is also a broad distinction between what a neutral government may permit its citizens to do and what it may do itself. This distinction was altogether lost sight of by Senator Matt. Carpenter, when, in discussing the sale of arms during the Franco-German War, he expressed the opinion that the Government of the United States might have freely sold arms to France without violating the duties of neutrality. Nothing should be clearer than that a neutral government is bound to abstain from doing any act whatsoever that is in its nature unneutral. It should seem obvious that a neutral government cannot itself sell arms to a belligerent without a flagrant violation of neutrality any more than it can itself supply money to a belligerent without a breach of neutral duty. When France supplied arms and money to the United States in the early days of the American Revolution she showed her sense of the real nature of the transactions by conducting them indirectly through a fictitious commercial firm; and when, in February 1778, she formally became the ally of the United States she merely avowed her real position. And yet no one now contends that Great Britain, France, and Germany failed in their duty when they omitted to prevent their citizens from selling arms to the United States and purchasing the bonds of the United States in 1861–65 and 1898, or that the United States failed in its duty when omitting to prevent its citizens from selling arms to Britons or Boers or from purchasing British consols during the Boer War, or that it has failed to perform its duty in similar respects during the Russo-Japanese War."

Again in 1872 a question was raised in the United States Senate as to the propriety of sales by the United States of certain ordnance stores which were found to be unusable by the Government. The Senate Committee on the Sale of Arms on May 11, 1872 (Senate Rept. 183) took the position that "a national policy (had been) adopted by us prior to the commencement of hostilities" to sell these arms to any purchaser neither belligerent could claim that the continued sale after hostilities constituted a belligerent act. In spite of this communication by the Senate committee, all of the international text writers criticize even as limited an expression as this on the ground that there is a distinction between nationals and the Government may not do any act such as sell arms to ether side during a state of hostilities. Thus Hall, in his treatise, says:

"The vendor of munitions of war in large quantities during the existence of hostilities knows perfectly well that the purchaser must intend them for the use of one of the belligerents, and a neutral government is too strictly bound to hold aloof from the quarrel to be allowed to seek safety in the quibble that the precise destination of the articles bought has not been disclosed."

Mr. Snow, in his cases on international law, states that he hopes the Senate report "does not express the settled law of the United States on this subject. It confounds the rights and duties of a neutral state with those of the private citizens of a neutral state, which is a very different matter."

Again, in 1914, much the same question was raised. An embargo bill was then pending before Congress, and Great Britain indicated through its Minister that it would consider such an embargo an unneutral act. Both President Wilson and Secretary of State Lansing communicated to Great Britain the view that such would be an unneutral act, and the embargo bill was not passed.

Again, in 1915, Germany, I am informed, urged the United States to pass an arms embargo. In a note by the State Department to the German Ambassador it was said:

"Any change in its own laws of neutrality during the progress of a war which would affect unequally the relations of the United States with the nations at war would be an unjustifiable departure from the principle of strict neutrality."

All the reasons which have been assigned by the President and his various published statements show that his reason for desiring the repeal of the neutrality law now on the statute books is so that the United States may furnish to England and France the materials with which they may successfully continue their war. There would be adequate authority, therefore, for showing that the repeal was intended and did in fact operate as a favor to one side and a harm to the other. This would come specifically within the definition of an unneutral act. Germany would therefore instantly have the right, under the rules of international law, to take steps of retaliation or reprisal against American ships, and might, in fact, have a right to indemnity or other pecuniary payment. Germany might even take such steps against our coastal trade if her submarines were in a position so to do. This would only be a proper application of the principle of international law that a neutral may not after the outbreak of the war so modify its legislation as to assist one of the belligerents.

Although Fortune's poll shows that the American people are about equally divided as to whether we should supply materials to England and France or not, the poll shows overwhelmingly that the American people desire to remain neutral. Those who favor supplying materials have been informed by the President that they may do this and still remain neutral. As appears in the above memorandum, this is impossible, and we must therefore conclude that the American people overwhelmingly would not approve of the repeal of the Neutrality Act if they realized that this would constitute an unneutral act and might involve us immediately in the war.

The Thirty-sixth Division Association Endorses Cash-and-Carry Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JED JOHNSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

RESOLUTION BY THE THIRTY-SIXTH DIVISION ASSOCIATION

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the World War veterans who served in the Thirty-sixth Division, one of the several National Guard divisions, with a record of outstanding service and accomplishments on the front lines, recently held an annual convention in the city of Fort Worth, Tex. This association of Oklahoma and Texas men, after much deliberation, went on record wholeheartedly endorsing the proposal of the President of the United States to lift the present embargo and enact a strict cash-and-carry law in its stead. The resolution of the Thirty-sixth Division Association is as follows:

Resolved, That the Thirty-sixth Division Association, composed of World War veterans of the said division from the States of Texas and Oklahoma, endorse the plans and purposes of the President and Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States as reflected in the legislation sponsored by him, now pending in Congress, providing for the abolition of the arms embargo and the establishment of a cash-and-carry plan and other things, and the members of this association from both said States call upon the congressional representatives from both States to support the adoption of such legislation; and that this resolution be communicated to said congressional representatives and to the press.

I, Dallas J. Matthews, secretary of the Thirty-sixth Division Association, certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a resolution adopted at a regular meeting of said association held in the city of Fort Worth on October 8, 1939, as the same appears on the minutes of said meeting.

Witness my hand and the seal of said association this the 10th day of October 1939.

DALLAS J. MATTHEWS, Secretary.
Gen. JOHN H. HULEN, President.
JED JOHNSON, Vice President.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH E. CASEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY RT. REV. MSGR. JOHN A. RYAN

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the Right Reverend Monsignor John A. Ryan, director of the Social Action Department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, over the Columbia Broadcasting System, Tuesday, October 24. His topic was Shall the Embargo Be Lifted?

In this broadcast, I am neither representing nor appearing under the auspices of any organization or institution. I am speaking only for myself, as an American citizen who believes that he knows something about the principles of international morality.

Much time has been wasted and millions of words uttered, within and without Congress, in an empty and futile dispute concerning the meaning of neutrality. Those who denounce the existing embargo on the sale of munitions to the belligerents maintain that it is unneutral because it favors Germany and is unfavorable to England and France; the opposing group declares that to lift the embargo would be unneutral because it would help England and France and injure Germany. Both groups are right.

In the present critical situation, the primary concern of our people and our Government is to keep out of the European war. Both the champions of the embargo and the proponents of repeal agree about this. Some of the arguments advanced by the former are illogical and unfair. They declare that to lift the embargo would be to take the first step toward involvement. This is a misleading metaphor and an unproved assertion. The only semblance of proof brought forward rests upon the assumption that history repeats itself. Selling arms to one belligerent party, we are told, "got the country into the last war and would have a similar effect now." As a matter of fact, history never repeats itself in exactly the same way after a change has taken place in the environment. Now, the knowledge, the determination, and the attitude of American people with respect to participation in war, have greatly changed since 1917. Moreover, it is simply untrue to assert that the sale of munitions was the one, or even the principal, cause of our entrance into the Great War. Other factors contributed mightily to that unfortunate decision. Some of those no longer exist.

Happily, the repeal of the embargo would not only be consistent with our national welfare and safety, but would be in conformity with the precepts of morality and religion. Some of the utterances by isolationists, both inside and outside of Congress, imply that our country has no obligations of love and charity to any other country. These men advocate not only political but moral isolation. They contend that the injustice inflicted by the Hitler government upon the peoples of Poland, Germany, and Austria, and the manifold injustices which it will perpetrate over wider areas if it is successful in this war, are no moral concern of ours. They remind us unpleasantly of Cain, who scornfully asked, "Am I my brother's keeper?" They imitate the Priest and the Levite who passed by on the other side, "remaining neutral" to the suffering and helplessness of the man who "went down to Jericho and fell among robbers." The person who asserts that we should be impartial and indifferent in our attitude toward the conflict between the Hitler government and the Allies, repudiates not only Christ's gospel of brotherly love but the principles of natural morality.

States, no less than individuals, are subject to the moral law. And they are bound not only by the precept of justice but likewise by the precept of charity. In the present crisis our country is morally obliged to do all that it reasonably can to defeat Hitler and destroy Hitlerism. Victory for this evil genius and his evil principles in this war would mean the destruction of Christian civilization throughout a large part of Europe. This tragic result would follow inexorably from the Nazi philosophy and the Nazi policies which have been pursued during the last 5 years.

Upon what specific grounds do I base this assertion? First, the Hitler government has been continuously engaged for more than 5 years in a cruel and insidious campaign for the destruction of the Christian religion in Germany, and latterly in Austria. In a joint pastoral letter issued about 4 years ago by the hierarchy of Germany, the bishops protested against "the propagation of a new paganism," and declared that the Hitler government was attacking not merely "a particular article of faith but the very essence and fundamentals of the Christian religion * * *." Three years later, or about 1 year ago, another joint pastoral letter of the German bishops, declared that in the intervening 3 years the persecution of religion had become "more hostile and more violent," and that the government was striving for "the uprooting of Christianity in general and the introduction of a faith that no longer has the least relation to belief in God and the Christian belief in a future life."

In December 1937 the late Pope Pius XI declared that there had seldom been a religious persecution "so serious, so terrible, so painful, and so sad in its deepest consequences" as that carried on in Germany. "It is," the Holy Father continued, "a persecution where neither the use of violence, nor the pressure of menaces nor the deceptions of cunning and the lie, are missing."

The attitude of the American Hierarchy toward the present regime in Germany was expressed at their annual meeting held in Washington in November 1937:

"Today the sense of all religious-minded men and women throughout the world is outraged by the satanic resourcefulness of these leaders of modern paganism and by the incredible excesses committed by them in their attempt to exterminate religion and to blot out from the minds of the German people all true knowledge and love of God."

Second, the Hitler government has consistently and continuously flouted and denied the principles of charity, justice, truth, and liberty which were brought to Germany by St. Boniface more than twelve hundred years ago and which have been diffused, developed, and made effective by Christian teaching alone.

Third, the Nazi philosophy and the Nazi government have substituted the absolute and totalitarian state for democracy, for a government of and by the people. They have outraged in a hundred ways the dignity of the individual and the decencies of life in Germany; they have brazenly and contemptuously violated all the natural rights of German men and women. These enormities have, indeed, been most severe and most conspicuous against the Jews, but they have been quite as deliberately and as definitely inflicted upon the Catholics and the Lutherans.

Fourth, while we do not know what Stalin will do, we can be certain that he will derive greater encouragement from a Hitler victory than from a Hitler defeat.

No genuine believer in Christianity or in the moral law can be neutral or impartial or indifferent in this awful situation. No intelligent man who holds that states as well as individuals have duties of charity to one another will deny that the United States is under moral obligation to do all that it reasonably can, to employ every means that can be employed without disproportionate inconvenience, in order to defeat Hitler and save Christian civilization in Europe. The United States is not morally bound to participate directly in the conflict, and it ought not to do so, but it is morally obliged to use every means short of war to prevent the moral, spiritual, and economic devastation that would follow the triumph of Hitlerism. To permit the sale of munitions and other materials under a cash-and-carry system would not cause us unreasonable inconvenience or grave risk. On the contrary, it would help to keep us out of the war. Supplying Britain and France with munitions would enable them to win a speedier victory and to make the war shorter. The shorter the war, the less likely are we to be drawn into it.

The moral question confronting America is not that of "punishing villains in Europe," whether living or dead. It is the question of contributing so far as we reasonably can contribute to the valiant effort now being made by Britain and France to prevent the triump of paganism and barbarism in Europe. As the president of Fordham University, Rev. Robert I. Gannon, S. J., said recently, "Hitler is the most pestilential and altogether infuriating character of all times." In order to find enemies of the human race comparable with this moral monstrosity one has to go back to the fifth century Hun, Attila, who came to be called "the Scourge of God," or to the twelfth century Mongol, Genghis Khan, who believed that he had a divine call to conquer the world. And it is a question whether Hitler's capacity for evil is not greater than was that of either of those terrifying and devastating barbarians.

Relief for Drought- and Flood-Stricken Areas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JED JOHNSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago a meeting was called by the Speaker of the House of Representatives of many Members of Congress representing the flood-stricken area of the South and the large drought-stricken area of the Central, Midwestern, and Western States of the Union to consider immediate relief for such drought- and flood-stricken areas of the United States.

At this meeting I presented a resolution to the conference urging that it go on record in support of the following program to meet present distressing conditions in such areas:

First. The appropriation or allocation of additional emergency funds to adequately meet the situation and to be expended as follows:

(a) Extension of soil-conservation work in all the drought- and flood-stricken areas;

(b) Extension and improvement of farm-to-market roads in order to relieve the desperate unemployment situation;

(c) Construction of deep surface ponds and the building of dams for the conservation of water and the prevention of floods.

Second. The early consideration of legislation to extend crop insurance to cotton.

Mr. Speaker, I believed then as now, that this Congress cannot ignore this unusual drought and flood situation. Although the floods have devastated and ruined the crops in Alabama, Mississippi, and other Southern States, we have had an unprecedented drought in Oklahoma and other Midwestern and Western States that has wrought havoc to farmers over a wide area.

It is, of course, encouraging to know that the President of the United States has made it known that the drought and floods should be treated as a major disaster and is willing to borrow and trim other appropriations in order to meet this emergency. This action will, of course, be helpful. But at best it is only temporary relief. The tax-burdened, drought-stricken farmer must receive considerably better prices for his products if he is to longer remain on the farm. Today I have received a resolution passed by the Farmers Union of Oklahoma and sent to the Oklahoma delegation dealing with this drought and unemployment problem in Oklahoma. The resolution in question is as follows:

Whereas continued general drought in Oklahoma has deteriorated growing cotton crops to extent it probably won't mature to exceed 50 percent of a normal crop in the State of Oklahoma; and

Whereas the 1938 farm program provided a minimum 52 percent of parity loan to farmers on their wheat and cotton; and

Whereas said loan has not been vitalized by Department of Agriculture for season 1939: Therefore be it

Resolved, We petition your honorable delegation urge upon President Roosevelt and Secretary Wallace immediate need setting up necessary regulations to vitalize loan legislation on cotton. If something is not done immediately, farmers are going to be forced to sell their cotton to pay mandatory debts and big syndicate cotton speculators will own the cotton at a time when there might be possibility of the farmer getting decent prices for his cotton crop owing to the abnormal war conditions.

Investigation of Un-American Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE SKIPPER

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial, appearing in the November issue of the Skipper, a school publication of Columbus University, Washington, D. C., expresses an opinion on the continuation of the Dies committee that is reflected in the Gallup Poll, and at the same time the article reflects the change in public opinion that has taken place all over this land concerning the work of the Dies committee.

[From the Skipper of November 1939]

THE DIES COMMITTEE

Most congressional investigations are a waste of the taxpayers' money. Many of them are prompted by the selfish political interests of Senators and Representatives up for reelection. Politicians live on favorable publicity and an investigation in Congress is an excellent springboard for front-page stories regarding the statesman's fervent activities in behalf of his constituents. Even a hasty perusal shows that little legislation of a constructive character has been enacted as a result of these congressional investigations.

The current inquiry by a House committee into un-American activities is a notable exception to our blanket indictment. At its inception we were inclined to believe that it was merely another witch hunt designed to bring its author onto page 1 of the country's newspapers. Events have proved us wrong on our original assumptions. The committee, headed by Representative DIES, Texas Democrat, and more familiarly called the Dies committee, is performing an excellent job and one that deserves the admiration of every thinking American. The committee may have made minor mistakes; it may make more of them. On the whole, however, we believe that the few dollars allowed by Congress for this inquiry are a mere bagatelle in contrast to the work achieved by this committee.

Not so long ago we agreed with liberals of every color that the name "Communist" and "Fascist" should be used sparingly. Only a year ago, it seems, a Communist was a worker who asked for more money from his employer. The word was so commonly used that it almost completely lost its original connotation. The same is true of the use of "Fascist." Everyone not a Fascist, according to the Fascist, was a Communist, and vice versa. In short, the words became a meaningless household joke.

Came recently, however, such startling disclosures by the Dies committee that we must perforce admit the existence in this country of a menace that should be stopped in its tracks.

We are not advocating the suppression of free speech or of the right of any man or woman in the United States to join political parties of his own choice. We are merely supporting the Dies committee policy of bringing to light some of the nefarious and ambitious schemes of Communists and Fascists working zealously for the destruction of this Government. The disclosures themselves, we believe, will have the desired effect. Communism and fascism, if brought to light with all of its weird ramifications, will not thrive among a democratic people. Public opinion, without laws and repressive legislation, will kill both of these foreign germs.

The blatant arrogance with which Communist and Fascist organizations operate in this country is what amazes us. In their own countries this gentry would be suppressed, fined, jailed, and executed within 24 hours. Yet here they are treated with a great deal of sympathy, if not with downright grace. This is one of the paradoxes of a democratic form of government. The Government and its people foster, aid, and treat with gentility the very people who are seeking their destruction. Perhaps it is better that a minority be allowed to exercise its prerogatives rather than touch the foundation stones of a democracy, a very sensitive structure which, history shows, can topple with great celerity.

We are indebted to the Dies committee for disclosing the officers, members, and finances of these Communist-Fascist organizations. We know now better where we stand. We know where they stand and we shall know how to deal with these people in the future.

We cannot understand all the noise sent up from the Communist-Fascist camps over the Dies "persecution." To brand the investigation a "persecution" is just so much nonsense which carries no weight in intelligent circles. If they have nothing to hide it is difficult to understand the secrecy that shrouds their activities. It is almost an obvious principle that representatives of organizations appearing before congressional investigations have nothing to fear if their houses are in order. The secrecy with which Communist-Fascist organizations operate in this country creates a definite suspicion of their "noble" goals and accomplishments. Why do they seek to hide their financial backers? Where are the headquarters of these organizations? What are their real purposes as contrasted with their avowed purposes? Why do they not operate in the open and why do their members become embarrassed when their names are disclosed?

The Dies committee has offered an answer to some of these queries. But it should be continued, especially in these days of foreign conflicts. Congress should appropriate sufficient funds for the continuation of this work which, we believe, is one of the most important safeguards against attacks on American democracy that we have today.

The Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. BOEHNE, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

LETTER BY HON. JAMES E. WATSON, FORMER SENATOR FROM INDIANA

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter, dated October 22, 1939, by the Honorable James E. Watson, former United States Senator from Indiana, addressed to the editor of the Evening Star, and which appeared in that paper on October 30, 1939:

[From the Washington Evening Star]

It is very evident that, had Congress never passed an embargo act, it would not enact one now, and especially the kind that is on our statute books now.

Probably not a half dozen Senators could be induced to vote for it as an original proposition, for it immediately would be construed all over the world as a nonneutral act.

And it seems to me quite evident that the present act is nonneutral, for it undoubtedly inures to the benefit of one country. This was not intentionally done when the act was passed, but circumstances have so completely changed in Europe that our present law works to the advantage of Germany and discriminates against England and France.

In order to be perfectly neutral, we should do neither, but the present temper of our people is for our Nation to be just as helpful to Britain and France as we possibly can without getting into war ourselves.

Before the passage of this law in 1935 everybody believed that we were entirely neutral in all of our international relations, and, therefore, it is manifest that the Embargo Act is the only obstacle that stands in the way of at least a partial restoration of that status and feeling.

It seems quite certain that, with that act repealed, we would be well-nigh restored to the condition that existed before it was passed, and hence it is altogether desirable to repeal it, unless we encounter greater difficulties by repealing it than now exist, and that has not yet been demonstrated by any facts adduced or any argument advanced by the advocates of the existing law.

Both sides to the controversy are convinced that international law has nothing to do with this proposition. We had the right to pass the Embargo Act and we have the right to repeal it. It is wholly a domestic matter and we are under no obligations to present the question to any other nation before taking action.

Under international law we always sold everything we had to sell to other nations that wanted to buy, even in time of war, and our right to do so has never been questioned.

The Embargo Act was passed with the very best intentions, but it now seems to have gotten us into difficulty from which we cannot be extricated unless we repeal it, and repeal undoubtedly could be effected without interfering with international law or with our relations with any other nation, with the possible exception of one.

To retain the Embargo Act is, therefore, to the advantage of just one nation and to the disadvantage of many others.

Germany cannot complain if we want to restore the condition of neutrality that existed before this act was passed, and England and France, on the other hand, would undoubtedly be delighted to have it done.

It is said that if we pass the proposed law Germany will not have access to our markets because she has no navy. That is unfortunate for her only. It is not our fault but her misfortune, and there is no requirement of international law and no item in the comity of nations that compels us to prevent England and France from taking full advantage of their fortunate situation in this regard.

With the Embargo Act repealed and a cash-and-carry plan adopted, all nations can come here and buy whatever they have the money to pay for and carry it away in their own vessels, subject to whatever dangers naturally accrue in time of war.

When a Member of the Senate I voted for the World War, but that problem did not rise to disturb us at any time during that conflict, for, under the rules of international law as far as they could be observed in time of war, every nation had the right to buy or sell in any market where the articles they desired could be obtained.

We were literally forced into that war because Germany engaged in a ruthless attack upon our commerce upon the seas. Her submarines sank many vessels, destroyed many cargoes, and killed many Americans, and these outrages so aroused our people that Congress was compelled to go to war as our only recourse.

Now, the simple truth is that all of those outrages can occur under our present existing law and doubtless will if it remains on the statute books; whereas, if it is repealed, and if substituted for it the proposition now before the Senate is enacted into law, such losses cannot occur for the simple reason that both ships and property will be prevented from sailing into danger zones where such destruction can occur. In other words, there is not a shadow of doubt but that the proposed law would keep American ships out of present regions of danger.

Therefore, the present law, or anything that could be done pursuant to its provisions, is not a guaranty against our involvement in war, whereas the proposed law necessarily would prevent our being dragged into war by reason of the destruction of our property on the high seas.

Let it not be forgotten that no arms, munitions, or implements of war can be carried on our own ships under any conditions if this proposed law be enacted, nor could anything in any of these categories be carried in foreign ships from our shores until all title to them had been transferred to the foreign buyer.

So it is very plain that if any materials, or the ship, or the crew, or the passengers on such foreign vessel should be destroyed, there would be no action for our Government to take that would involve us in war because of such destruction. This is just as plain as that two and two make four.

JAMES E. WATSON,
Former United States Senator from Indiana.

OCTOBER 22.

The Small Town Editors of Arkansas on Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, since the convening of this extraordinary session of the Congress on September 21 for the purpose of deciding the American course of neutrality during the present European war, much has been said in the two Houses and throughout the Nation about the attitude of the American press on the subject. As is so often the case, the masses on both sides have been charged with being influenced by certain militant minorities. There has been much comment about editorials appearing in the larger newspapers of the Nation; that the reason most of them favor revision of the present neutrality law is that they are simply catering to big business, which is another way of saying "big advertisers." Those papers which have favored not disturbing the present law have been charged with being influenced by German propaganda.

My district is on the Ozark plateau. Ninety-eight percent of its people are American-born. Ninety-nine percent of them are Anglo-Saxon. The largest town in the district is less than 10,000 in population. We have no big business. There is no racial issue. There are no American bund organizations. My people are principally home owners. They are comparatively well educated. There are two great universities, one of them the State university, in my district. The newspaper editors in the Third Arkansas District are well educated and do their own thinking. Why, then, should theirs not be a good cross section of American opinion? Why should they not be as free to make up their own minds and to arrive at a safe and sound conclusion as have been the leaders of American thought at any time in American history?

It is my pleasure, therefore, to quote from various editorials.

Editor Grover S. Lindsey, writing in the Benton County Democrat, at Bentonville, on October 5, says:

It is our sincere hope that opponents of the Roosevelt administration will not allow their personal political convictions to dictate to their better reasoning when the proposed repeal of the arms embargo act is brought to a vote. Several Republican leaders, perhaps with an eye toward the Presidency, have announced that they will fight the President's proposed revision of the 1937 arms-embargo act to a bitter finish.

It is a deplorable state of affairs when political beliefs are allowed to curb legislation that is undoubtedly for the good of the country. Surely no one doubts the President's sincerity in his attempts to keep the United States out of war. His opposition is largely from the ranks of his political enemies.

We are fairly sure that the Congress will see fit to alter the present so-called neutrality legislation to meet the needs of the country, but it is probable that such a change will come only after many time-wasting debates and a great amount of arguing by New Deal opponents, both within the Democratic Party and without.

John R. Newman, editor of the Harrison Daily Times at Harrison, said in his paper of October 11:

The people of northwest Arkansas, lacking any appreciable foreign population and getting along nicely without any communistic or bund movements, are willing to trust President Roosevelt and go along with him in his avowed purpose of maintaining peace.

The United States is entitled to trade and traffic in goods and materials just as much as other neutral countries. These other countries have not been accused of trying to enter the war because they sell to belligerent nations. The cash-and-carry plan, which entails keeping our ships out of dangerous waters, would avoid the pitfall which plunged us into the last war.

We have no sympathy with the pro-German idea that we must penalize England and France in order to avoid the appearance of favoring them. That smacks a little of intimidation, and it doesn't work in the United States. The bully-boys of Europe should confine their propaganda, along with their wars, to their own continent.

Editor Tom Shiras, writing in the Baxter Bulletin at Mountain Home on September 22, said:

A great many people do not comprehend the significance of the present neutrality law, which the President tried to get the last Congress to revoke. This present war has cut off our foreign markets, and if this law is not repealed our surpluses will climb and climb. The repealing of this law does not mean that we have to help any particular nation, but means that we can sell them all. If this law is not repealed, unemployment will continue to get worse instead of better, and we will drag on for another 3 years or more, getting worse and worse off all the time. If this law is repealed everyone will have a job and we can go ahead full steam, and catch up on some of the big losses we have suffered for the last 8 years. This section of Arkansas will be helped by the repealing of this law. It will start our zinc, lead, and manganese mines going again, and in a few months, if the World War can be taken as a precedent, they will be bringing north Arkansas over a million dollars a year additional income. It will also stimulate prices for all farm products and livestock and give us a chance to get ahead. If this country should run head-on into a war, we would be going full speed instead of having to spend a year getting fire under the boilers and steam up. Our opinion is probably no better than yours. We do not think that repealing of this law would be liable to get us into war any sooner than if we did not repeal it. We believe that at least 9 out of 10 people want to see Hitler licked. It won't make any difference if we sell the European democracies or if we don't. If we get into war it will be because France and England begin to skid. That is our greatest hazard. If they hold their own we are safe. If the Germans begin to pound them down we think we will get into it, laws or no laws. We had better be ready with full pocketbooks than empty ones.

O. Klute Braswell, editor of the Star Progress at Berryville, in his issue of September 28, said:

So far as we have been able to estimate the facts, the one thing on which the American people, almost without exception, are united, is a deep and sincere desire not to be drawn into the European war—or any war.

We are hearing and shall hear more arguments and debate on the question whether the proposed changes or repeal of the Neutrality Act will or will not bring us closer to war. There is no living man who can answer that question with certainty. Only the event can decide. The answer may come in a few months or in a year or two.

There is no doubt whatever that the vast majority of Americans are sympathetic with the British and French and Polish and bitterly antagonistic to Hitler. Whether the desire to see Hitler defeated and Hitlerism and all it stands for wiped off the face of the earth will become so overpowering as to swing American sentiment toward taking an active part in the war is another question to which no one today can give a true answer.

Certainly, if acts of the dictator nations infringe violently upon the rights and liberties of America as a nation, it would be hard to stem the urge to fight for the freedom for which we have fought before. But if this country should ever go to war, it will this time be with a firm determination to make the peace that will follow victory a far more just and enduring one than was the peace negotiated at Versailles. The seeds of the present war were sown by the terms imposed upon the vanquished nations in the peace treaty.

America would never stand for another victory of that sort.

Ed W. Coulson, editor of the Journal Advance at Gentry, wrote on October 11:

As our foremost aviator, Col. Charles A. Lindbergh has been quite a popular hero. As a radio commentator he surely got off on the wrong foot when he censured Canada for joining England in her fight against Hitlerism.

Tom West, editor of the Lincoln Leader at Lincoln, said on October 12:

The people of the United States have agreed on one thing, and that is that we must stay clear of this war as long as it is humanly possible to do so.

To have enacted legislation that will aid in keeping us out of war is the reason that the President called this special session of the Congress. There is at present on the statutes a law that forbids the sale of certain so-called war commodities to belligerent nations. These include finished products, such as ammunitions, airplanes, etc., but under the present law all other items that are salable, such as wheat, iron ore, aluminum, etc., may be sold and transported on ships of this Nation. Therein lies the danger, for almost anything is considered contraband and war materials by fighting nations. Ships that are caught carrying these items are either confiscated or sunk. The sinking of an American ship might be the spark that would send us into this affray as it did in the last war.

In recognition of this fact the President suggests a measure that will keep our ships from carrying anything to nations at war, thus preventing an excuse to sink any boats of our Nation. At the same time he wishes the embargo lifted so that we may sell anything to any belligerent country, so long as they pay cash for it here and carry it away on their own ships. This seems to me the only safe and sane way out of the dilemma that we are in.

In the past month I have asked many people in this district their opinion on this subject, and last week I ran the questionnaire in the paper about it, to which there was a good response, and I have as yet to find the first person in this district who does not favor the measure that the President suggests.

Mrs. Abbie K. Grammer, writing in the Gravette News Herald, Gravette, on October 20, said:

Just now we would like to see the Embargo Act applied in such a way as to prevent the sale and shipment of arms in anybody's ship. We all want to keep America out of war. To do that we must be neutral. It seems to us that the repeal is to favor one side or the other, or else why repeal the embargo at this time?

Editor Everett W. Pate, of the Rogers Daily News, Rogers, said in his Ediscope of October 10:

The present trend of events in Europe makes me more firm in my belief that the proper course for the United States to pursue is one of independent aloofness and honest neutrality. Yes, isolation, if you will.

My conviction grows that every European nation loves the United States for just what they can get out of us. If we should become embroiled on the side of England and France, either in a commercial or military alliance, we would be thrown overboard the very minute such action would advance the cause of either England or France, regardless of any fine-spoken assurance of undying brotherly love. The memory of the fates of Czechoslovakia and Poland is horribly fresh in my mind.

Former State Senator Festus O. Butt, of Eureka Springs, writing in his paper, the Carroll Courier, in the September 14 and 21 issues, said:

Neither the present nor the proposed law seems ideal. The proposed new law lets down the bars as to selling war materials. Under the present neutrality law it is hard for us to nose into the quarrel, but if our good President can get it changed as he wants it, it will not only cease to be hard to nose in but almost impossible to keep out.

Do not allow "saving democracy" to make shivers run up your back. We tried it once and mighty nearly destroyed democracy by our butting in.

It is not our scrap.

Editor J. Milam, writing in the Informer, Jasper, said on October 7:

We talk about not arming the belligerents. We have already armed them. We shipped junk to Japan that was shaped into guns to kill Chinese. The Germans secretly armed themselves before they became talkative, and the motors of the ships they use to fly over cities to drop explosives were made in America.

Editor George L. Wright, of the Boone County Headlight, Harrison, said on September 21:

We are inclined to agree with the President that there is nothing unneutral in offering to sell any nation anything it wants to buy, to be paid for on delivery at our own ports.

Don Matthews, editor of the Mountain Echo, Yellville, said in his issue of October 11:

The cash-and-carry cohorts have the edge now but the isolationists haven't given up the ship by a long shot and they have potent weapons at their disposal.

If both sides insist that victory for the other side would make American armed intervention certain, a lot of people may believe it whether or not it is true and thus make a drift into war easy.

Editor Lessie S. Read, of the Northwest Arkansas Times, Fayetteville, said in the issue of October 17:

We agree with President Roosevelt's program in every essential. We believe that it is far better for us to be allowed to furnish supplies to belligerents in Europe, including Germany, than for American men, American dollars, and American labor and industry to be drafted for the defense of our shores. Let's keep the war in Europe by all means.

And Mrs. Roberta Fulbright, also of the Northwest Arkansas Times, wrote in the October 17 edition:

It is unthinkable that these United States should not repeal the embargo.

It is interesting to note that although the editors disagree as to the advisable course, there are two vital points upon which they agree:

First. That we must and shall stay out of the war.

Second. That we are now ready to retreat from our freedom-of-the-seas policy.

Holding on to the embargo is a partial retreat. Repealing the embargo and forbidding our ships from entering the combat zones is a complete retreat.

As it appears to us now, either a partial retreat or a complete retreat from this same freedom-of-the-seas policy that helped to involve us in three other wars is in the interest of peace.

Goose-stepping Is Not the American Way—Too Many Military Officers Are Being Named to Government Posts Traditionally Held by Civilians

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, while enactment of neutrality legislation, so-called, holds the spotlight of national attention, there are certain omens in the wind which demand the attention of this House, and particularly of those Members who claim to be champions of American liberties.

Before Members of this Congress even entertain a single thought of adjourning this special session, and I am convinced we should not adjourn, we owe it to our people whom we represent to ascertain just how far the iron heel of American militarism is to be imbedded into the daily routine of this peaceful Nation.

We should also dispel the fog that has encircled the "industrial mobilization plan revision of 1939."

We should further determine, through a study, just what emergency powers the President has for his discretionary use in this national emergency which was proclaimed effective on September 8, 1939, by President Roosevelt.

This Nation is at peace. The President, in his fireside chat, expressed the belief we could maintain that peace. The administration leaders have held, although I have not agreed with them, that repeal of the embargo would contribute to that peace.

Then in the name of peace why do we find the military being shoved to the fore on so many fronts here? Let us not be unmindful of modern history in Europe which has revealed that where the military, with its dictator, has moved in, the liberties of the people are "blacked out."

Surely we will not let pass unnoticed recent maneuvers by President Roosevelt, whereby high-ranking Army-Navy men have been placed in key strategic positions in the Federal Government. The most recent can hardly be brushed aside without thought or consideration. I refer to the appointment of an Army officer to an all-powerful position over the industries and labor of this Nation; namely, Chief of the Wage-Hour Division of the Department of Labor. I say "all powerful" because, acting as "administrator" under the provisions of the wage-hour law, he can obtain for the Government unlimited information and data through his prerogatives to enter industrial plants "to determine whether any person has violated the provisions of this act or which may aid in the enforcement of this act."

This appointment appears to be merely another step in the growing tendency of President Roosevelt to supplant civilians in high Government positions with military or naval men. Lt. Col. Philip Fleming, who has been detailed by the President as head of the Wage-Hour Division, was obtained from the Army Engineers. I am advised he has been a highly competent engineer and administrator in that branch of the armed force, and I cast no reflections on his personal qualifications.

GOOSE-STEPPING IS FOREIGN TO AMERICA

However, when such steps continue, I am compelled to pause and survey the situation and raise the question as to whether the President is moving toward placing this country under the "crack-down" tactics too familiar to these men who have been drilled and trained in the way of the military. Furthermore, industry and labor alike have reason for deep concern. After all, goose-stepping is something foreign to the American way.

Other occasions when President Roosevelt, already famed for breaking traditions, gave posts traditionally held by civilians to military and naval officers include the assignment of Admiral William D. Leahy, United States Navy, retired, as Governor of Puerto Rico; Col. F. C. Harrington, United States Army, as W. P. A. Administrator; Rear Admiral Christian Peoples, United States Navy, Director of the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department; and Brig. Gen. Edwin M. Watson, former military aide of the President, recently made one of the three high-ranking secretaries at the White House and now reported headed for a foreign post for this Government. There have been others in positions of somewhat lesser importance.

DISPEL THE FOG AROUND I. M. P.

Likewise we cannot overlook the fact that Mr. Roosevelt is now the full-fledged, active Commander in Chief of the United States Navy and can switch from the chair of the Chief Executive at the Cabinet meeting to the chair of the Secretary of the Navy. By his failure to fill the vacancy caused by the recent death of the Secretary of the Navy, President Roosevelt is now in the position of also holding that portfolio.

With industry and labor alike under the control of an Army man in the Department of Labor, with an Army man in charge of 10,000,000 unemployed workers, and with the wheels of industrial mobilization already being oiled, the matter becomes of vital interest to every man, woman, and child in the Nation.

Again I say, if there is to be any headway made toward prosperity under free enterprise in the United States, the fog surrounding this industrial-mobilization plan should be dispelled by President Roosevelt and some assurance given industry relative to just what the Federal Government intends to do while acting in the name of the national emergency already proclaimed by the President.

Secretary of Commerce Hopkins recently declared that there is need in the United States for "greater consumption by the public as well as increased capital expenditures by business." Coming from a new dealer, that is news, but the distrust that is being bred throughout the country as the result of the hush-hush behavior of the administration toward this industrial-mobilization plan will certainly not be conducive to carrying out the expression of Secretary Hopkins. There will be no increased capital expenditures by business as long as it is concerned about the prospects of the military authorities moving into their establishments or controlling their activities. Our investing public is not trained to invest private funds to be controlled by a military.

It occurs to me that the President is already superseding the 1939 industrial-mobilization plan in the national emergency which he has declared.

In part 2 of the plan I find this paragraph under the heading of "Army and Navy procurement planning in time of peace":

> In the preceding pages there has been discussed the types of supervision and control that may be required for the utilization of our national resources in the event of a war emergency of major proportions. The organization proposed for obtaining this coordination has also been outlined. It has been pointed out that, while Army and Navy officers, with the cooperation of qualified civilians, are responsible for the preparations of plans for the establishment of these coordinating agencies, their operation will be undertaken by civilian administrators appointed by the President.

In part 1 of the plan it is revealed industries would be classified as war industries and nonwar industries and that the War Labor Administration is to maintain "close cooperative relations between labor, industry, and government."

The administrator of the wage-hour law is in a key position in respect to this provision. Even under the industrial mobilization plan civilian administrators are provided. But did the President appoint a civilian wage-hour administrator? He did not. He went to the military forces for his administrator.

WHO KNOWS EMERGENCY POWERS OF PRESIDENT?

Then, too, there is the question of powers of the President in time of national emergency. The Senate has tried to learn what powers exist, but even the United States Attorney General admitted his compilation made for the Senate is not complete and "that the Executive has powers not enumerated in the statutes."

Concentration of vast peacetime powers in the hands of one man is alien to American principles. The Attorney General has informed the Senate that to ascertain what emergency powers have been given the President since the founding of our Government and which are still at the disposal of the Chief Executive may be ascertained only "by careful and painstaking search of the entire body of Federal statutory law." As the law making body of this Nation, it is about time we determined for ourselves and for our constituents just what the President can do when he declares a national emergency. If he can effect a complete social and industrial reorganization of the lives of our men, women, and children through powers of national emergency, then let us so inform the people and ourselves. For that reason I am in sympathy with the proposal for a determination at this time of the authorized powers of the Presidency during a state of emergency such as the Nation is now in, as the result of Mr. Roosevelt's proclamation of September 8.

DUTY OF CONGRESS TO REMAIN IN SESSION

Under our Constitution, if this session of Congress adjourns sine die, there is no way by which we may reconvene ourselves before January 3 irrespective of what may develop. We can only convene in the interim at the will of the President. Mr. Roosevelt has declared that an emergency exists. Under such an emergency the place for the Representatives is in the National Capitol, close to their Chief Executive, close to their Cabinet officers, and close to the source of accurate reports of happenings abroad—such events being the reason for this special session.

This attitude is no reflection upon the President. It is just common sense. The people who elected us to represent them, the people who hired us, expect us to be on the job in times of national emergency, and inasmuch as the President has declared that such an emergency exists, I feel that the place for us to be is here at the seat of government and center of activity. Therefore, I have today introduced a resolution calling for the continuous session of this Congress until the date provided in the Constitution for the beginning of the next regular session in January.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY MOST REV. F. J. BECKMAN, ARCHBISHOP OF DUBUQUE, OCTOBER 29, 1939

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a radio address delivered by the Most Reverend F. J. Beckman, archbishop of Dubuque, on Sunday, October 29, 1939, over the national hook-up.

This address is timely, for we are now led to believe that this is to be a religious war, or a war of hatreds based upon the suppression of religion. This propaganda is issued by the very people that have abandoned their belief in God—the Communists and those who adhere to their philosophies.

Here is a representative of a religion that is supposed to have suffered from persecution, yet he comes out boldly and declares himself against socialism and communism. In other words, the gentleman who spoke is a pro-American, and believes in the principles set forth in the Constitution of the United States.

It is this point that I am anxious for the Members to observe because it follows the line that I have been advocating as a Member of the Congress of the United States. This Nation cannot survive unless we return to the fundamental principles upon which it came into being, and conditions today within the United States should be sufficient evidence that we are departing not only from the principles of the Government but from the advice of the first President of the United States, George Washington. Had we adhered to his advice, there would have been no entangling alliances. We would not be here today considering an act which is for no other purpose than to involve the United States in an entangling alliance with nations now at war in Europe, in a struggle in which every citizen of all countries have no interest and to which they are strictly opposed at this time. When I say citizens, I mean the common or middle-class of people—the people who must bleed, suffer, and die in all wars. I believe it is time that this great group of people asserts itself and aids in shaping national destinies instead of leaving them in the hands of international exploiters.

I shall ask you to read these remarks and give them serious consideration because they are pertinent at this time. The address is as follows:

> My dear fellow Americans, I realize that it is somewhat unusual for a member of the hierarchy to venture as far as have I into the present neutrality debate by our Congress. I want to say that in doing so I have, before God, not been motivated by a spirit of disunity or disrespect for existing authority. I want to say now that I have been motivated in taking my stand against the lifting of the embargo by two vitally important reasons: The first being that I could stand no longer to see the Catholic Church in America being used for private and political ends; the second reason being that I am firmly convinced of the fact that the present European war is a most unjust and un-Christian conflict—an economic war based on greed which will only benefit international communism. Convinced of this fact I could not do otherwise, in conscience, than to condemn, for my flock at least, any governmental action which would contribute to the continuation of that war.

The present war is not, in my well-advised opinion, a just war, much less a holy war. It is propagandized as such by the sinister forces of international communism. The Communist antichrists want American and all Christian nations to engage in this war. Their agents here will stop at nothing to involve us, for well do they realize that a war-exhausted America is the only hope of communism for America. Some of our would-be Catholic leaders have already succumbed to the propagandists and taken recent occasion to proclaim with them. "This is a holy war. Stop Hitler America with the Allies. Christianity against communism," etc. etc. To these misguided individuals I would say (and I trust with the full approval of thinking Americans): "We Catholic leaders are not by any stretch of the imagination in sympathy with Hitlerism; we detest the antireligious implications in that word; we abhor with our supreme pontiff, Pius XII, the spread of pagan ideologies and materialism throughout the world; but we cannot as Christians be in sympathy with an internationalist godless group which has provoked and is endeavoring to sustain this war. It is only the international Communist who, entrenched in high governmental positions of many nations, could so cleverly mask a plot to destroy Christian civilization with the slogan: 'This Is a Holy War.'"

Communism, my friends, like a cancer in the vitals of Christianity, depends upon growth for its survival. It feeds and fattens on international chaos, and war is its choicest bread—war, with its unspeakable horrors, which tears to pieces not only mortal bodies but, what is most terrible, destroys the spiritual in the soul of man; war, with the ensuing hatred and bitterness of peoples against the false leaders who betray them into it.

If there could be a prayer on the lips of the Communist, rest assured, my dear Christian friends, that prayer would be: "Lord, give us war! Give us the chaos of hell! Away with reason and order! Give us war!" That is the private cry of the godless horde today. It is the Communist hymn of hate. If we listen well we can hear that hate theme running through all the pretty phrases of the propagandists who shout for our distraction, "This is a holy war."

There is an old saying: "Fool me once, shame on you; but fool me twice, shame on me." Many of us were tricked and fooled by the propaganda in the last war. It was simpler then, for we were easily won over on the slogan "Make the world safe for democracy." It should not be so simple this time. I, as but one member of the hierarchy of the church in America, am standing at this microphone today because I know, with good Christian people everywhere, that our religious leaders cannot afford to be duped again. Our people demand, and justly so, that we take the leadership in preventing any possible encouragement by the United States of that frightfully unjust and immoral war in Europe. Our people demand that we, as their spiritual shepherds, uphold the right, clarify the issues, and fight to the last man of us against any attempt to make this glorious America an ally of internationalism. Our people demand that with one united voice, and courageously throwing off the shackles of those who would encumber us, they demand that we rise up and brand the Communist traitors in our midst for what they are. With all our strength we are morally obligated to cry: "This is no holy war, people. The Holy Father has not proclaimed it as such. Look well; this is the Communist's war. This is an economic war based on greed, and under no circumstances may we lend comfort to either party in the conflict."

Why has not Great Britain declared war on a Russia which invaded poor Poland? Why do we read so little in the secular press about the persecution of religion already under way in Sovietized Poland, 13,000,000 of whose population Great Britain and France mercilessly handed over to Soviet Russia? Why, in the near past, was an embargo on arms good enough when the so-called loyalists had the upper hand, but not good encugh when the tables were turning in favor of Christian Spain? These questions all merit the same answer: Look for the Communist motive. And if, in the fact of any altruistic reasons which may be advanced for such action—if we, the spiritual leaders of America, yield to this "holy war" propaganda a second time, and lend any sanction whatsoever to the parties of this conflict—if we do these things then shall we be delivering Christ Himself into the bloody hands of the international Communists.

We hear any number of cries today that the church is in politics. If a clergyman talks for the government its not politics; but let a clergyman talk against the government no matter how wrong it may be on a given issue—then immediately the cry: "The church is in politics." How my Christian blood does boil when I hear such. The answer to this charge must be clearly given: "The church is not in politics; but politics is shamelessly attempting to use certain churchmen." As Christ, in anger, drove the money changers from His temple so must and shall we drive the politicians out of the church they would use for their own ends. Christ through all His ministry rarely demonstrated anger, but there came a day when even His patience with the hypocrisy and the effrontery of the times was exhausted. Then in a righteous rage He set an example of courage for spiritual leaders the world over to defend with physical force, if need be, the principles of right.

Taking our precedent from Him who so nobly set it, we are today fast growing out of patience with those who would use us for their ignoble ends. There are individuals aplenty who need a retreat from the glamour of government and governmental patronage. There are those a plenty, my dear friends, who call themselves Christians and disgrace their God-given religion by employing it as a "front" for questionable activities. To these individuals we would say: "Where is the integrity we taught you to respect and cherish? In the name of Heaven what has happened to your perspective of the right? If you have not the vision to see the right at least have you the courtesy of remaining silent while others fight your battle for you. You have no right before God to deliver the church at the back door of politics. Be a credit to us, not a debit. Keep faith with those to whom you owe everything. Keep faith with God, yourself, and your fellow man."

We all love America. We have a solemn obligation to support our leaders in all measures which are just and good. But we also have a grave obligation to fight fearlessly any measures which are clearly not based upon a Christian morality. Our people look to us for a constant defense of truth; they expect that we will at all times vigorously espouse the cause of right as against wrong. Further, they have a right to expect that we will stand united for the right, despite abuse, criticism, or persecution. Our religious leadership should be of such strong character as to insure proper governmental leadership by inculcating in a people the desire for such. But if and when the spiritual leadership of any nation becomes forfeit to governmental leadership regardless of right or wrong, then, indeed, is the beginning of national catastrophe.

It was the great John Henry Newman, who later became the outstanding Cardinal Newman, who said: "There can be no safety for religion except under constitutional government." That statement has certainly proven itself through the wreck of religion in Communist Russia and the suppression of religious liberty in Nazi Germany.

In our beloved America only today can it be said that the fires of constitutional government are still alight. But many things have happened lately to give us cause for worry. I say and I firmly believe that unless the spiritual leaders of this country are quick to act in unitedly demanding, with their people, that representative government be representative, that democracy be democratic, that right be recognized and clearly cited to those who are the servants, not the masters, of the people—I say that unless we act quickly in the proper discharge of our moral obligations the causes of constitutional government in this country will be seriously endangered. The embargo issue now before Congress has many deeper implications than most of us realize, among them being the recent disgraceful repudiation of the American people, the pleas of whom for the retention of the embargo have been scorned publicly as coming from "inspired sources." In my opinion, this action constituted an unprecedented threat to representative government.

Our eyes now turn to the House of Representatives where we have good reason to hope are the men of the people; men who have stood aghast and watched one legislative group ignore the voice of America; men who are and should be weary of "being told" and who now prepare to do a little telling on their own account; men whose every decent, democratic impulse cries out against those who are attempting to belittle them as legislative members. These are the people's representatives, the last guardians of democracy. They will not break faith with us if we are clear and firm in our expression to them. We have a solemn obligation to call for and register conscientiously, immediately, that expression with our Representatives. That expression, my dear American friends, will be our only defense if the youth of this country will not be betrayed again into the European trenches. That expression we pray will be entirely consistent with the recent words of a young man who brought a typical message to our attention. I readdress it direct to the Members of our House of Representatives. It concludes, "Remember, our blood is not for Europe; it is for America only. But in the warmth of our young hearts there is love enough for all men. Please extend that love by keeping and extending the embargo on hate."

In response to that message I tell my people now that they can never expect to keep faith with their youth if they do not keep faith with Christian morality as pointed out to them. I tell my people now that the time is near when, unless they act quickly, democracy and communism will be at swords points in America. If war comes—and we may apply it as coming to us—in the words of our Holy Father, "All may be lost." If that time comes let it not be said that my voice was inarticulate for the right.

Courage now. Do the right thing fearlessly. God bless and keep the America we love.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, November 1, 1939

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, as I stated on this floor only day before yesterday, 647 speeches have been made in the Congress concerning the pending neutrality legislation and therefore I feel that no further speech here would change a single vote. It was my purpose the day before yesterday only to explain the rule and the procedure under the rule covering the consideration of this epochal measure. As nearly the full membership was present, I wished to authentically familiarize all with the unusual procedure covered by this special rule, which has regrettably and erroneously been designated and heralded throughout the press by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] as a gag rule. It is gratifying to realize that nearly every Member, Democrat and Republican, was, after my explanation of the rule, satisfied that it is a most liberal and fair one, giving ample opportunity for more debate, allowing amendments, and opportunity for at least five different yea-and-nay votes.

If there had not been so much nefarious and willfully false propaganda leveled at this pending measure, I would not request permission to extend these remarks in the RECORD. This extension of remarks will, of course, have no effect upon the votes of Members, because the vote on the proposed legislation will have been taken shortly after these remarks reach the country, and a real Neutrality Act, the product of a patriotic and intelligent Congress, and signed by an equally patriotic and intelligent President, will be law despite the willfully mischievous, diabolical, reprehensible, regrettable barrage aimed at it by a small portion of our less worthy citizenry through the press, on the air, and by the machinations of the German-American bunds and other Communist-Nazi-Socialist organizations. Let the vote of this Congress be the most effective answer to those machinations.

The United States, a great Christian nation, in the absence of a declaration of war by Japan or China, unfortunately has permitted, by an iniquitous so-called neutrality law enacted in 1935, the shipping of munitions and airplanes for the bombing of unfortified cities and women and children of China against all concepts of international law and elemental humanity.

Another totalitarian country, Soviet Russia, would stamp out the very consciousness of God for all humanity if it were possible to do so. And that unfortunate country may under our neutrality law buy unrestrainedly airplanes and munitions in this country and reship them to Germany.

It has been undeniably demonstrated that in these totalitarian countries there is not a vestige of political, civil, or religious freedom.

The Embargo Act of 1935, for which I myself voted, I am sorry to confess, soon after its effective date demonstrated that it contained important defects. That is, of course, the history of much of our legislation, and we all realize that when we enact legislation. Time and application must show the defects and how to remedy them to the best advantage.

The pending proposed neutrality law, which would supplant the ill-conceived Embargo Act, will to a greater extent safeguard our beloved country from being drawn into the holocaust inspired by the insane, bloodthirsty, uncivilized Hitler regime, only recently wed to Stalinism. What an unholy alliance!

In my humble opinion the best way to keep the United States free from war is to change the Embargo Act by a cash-and-carry provision so that those who are opposing aggression may stop Hitler before the United States becomes involved.

Our present so-called Neutrality Act is helping Germany by cutting off the democracies from a natural source of supplies, while Italy, Russia, and Japan can buy here to build up their war machines and divert part of their production to Germany. Four totalitarian aggressors may soon threaten the democracies, and if they go down the United States may have to defend democracy in both North and South America with very little help.

The present embargo on arms, ammunition, and instruments of war gives Germany a distinct and unmerited advantage. It puts a premium upon aggression deliberately planned and prepared for. It penalizes the British for building during many years and at very great cost a large and efficient navy.

Looking at this matter from the purely materialistic side—and this is of least importance—will Members of Congress actually insist that the workers of America who need employment shall continue to walk the streets or live on relief appropriations while contracts for supplies are turned down, or will the Nation insist that America take her position on the firm ground of international law and sell to all countries who are willing to pay for the goods and carry them home?

It is not necessary to answer, or try to answer, many of the charges and accusations hurled here and there upon the floor of the House. Following the enlightened suggestion of President Roosevelt that we refrain from injecting politics into this all-important question, I have not answered or tried to answer some of these untruths, half truths, false accusations, and groundless charges.

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, I readily concede that we have many thousands of honest men and women who have been for years members of various worthy peace organizations. I myself have been a member of and contributed to practically all such organizations because I, like practically every other good American, am definitely opposed to war.

As I stated on the floor in March 1938, I helped to defray the expenses of several lecturers who spoke before university assemblies in 1912 and 1913 for universal peace in an effort to ward off the oncoming war. I am not a stranger to wars and their devastating results. My stand now is as it always has been. I have not changed my attitude to inconsistently meet occasions and the thoughts of others. I am and always have been opposed to militarism, and I am, like you, a believer in a real democratic form of government.

Many of the peace organizations we have in mind have during the last year and a half endorsed President Roosevelt's worthy preparedness program. These organizations have sensed the Nazi-Communist multiplying encroachments and subversive propaganda in this country, and they have fallen into line to help our leader combat them. Yet, on the other hand, we have many thousands of well-meaning fellow citizens who have not sensed that they are being used and being influenced by this malevolent, liberty-destroying pubilicity emanating from the sources I have mentioned.

It is regretted that many columnists and publicists have through the press and on the forum for political and other selfish purposes misrepresented our President by saying that he is trying to involve us in war. Think of that! A President of the great United States trying to embroil 135,000,000 peace-loving citizens of the United States in a war. Nonesense, I say. Some of these marplots have gone so far as to aver that the President has reached a secret agreement that calls for our joining the democracies in war. Shame! I might as well identify these culprits. I refer to the German-American bunds, the German-American National Alliance, and Coughlin.

It is far from my purpose to indict the Germans en masse. The self-appointed leaders in Germany are solely responsible. I have not read history without purpose, and therefore I know the valuable contributions in many fields of useful endeavor of the Germans of yesterday. We all know that, in the absence of a representative government in Germany, the commonalty had no voice in making the current war. I am happy to record that I know very many outstanding, intelligent, patriotic citizens of my own city who are of German extraction, and am still happier to record that they all deeply and consistently resent the baneful activities of Hitler and the bunds.

The President has repeatedly said he not only hopes sincerely that the United States can steer clear of the impending barbaric conflict, but he believes we will be able to escape the catastrophe if we chart the proper course. He pledges himself and his administration unreservedly to exert every possible effort toward avoidance of the whirlpools and crosscurrents of involvement. Our President is doing all possible to keep our country out of war. Our governmental regulation at this time will not even permit a single American to travel on a ship of a belligerent.

I want to ask the good but misguided men and women of America whether they think the yellow journalists and voluble pulpiteers of the Coughlin stripe are in a better position to judge the foreign policy of this great country than is the President of the United States with his accurate and thorough sources of information created by our great and good diplomatic service. As for myself, recognizing the profound knowledge and patriotism of the President and our Secretary of State concerning foreign affairs, because, as I have said, of their accurate and thorough avenues of approach, and reposing infinite confidence in their plans and purposes, I am wholeheartedly supporting the President's proposal as the best means of becoming and remaining neutral in fact, and avoiding involvement in the existing conflict.

It is a joyful reflection that there is so much freedom in our country, a degree of freedom not enjoyed elsewhere on the globe. For this we all are profoundly grateful. We would not have it otherwise. In practically every other country the newspapers and other publications that put out these false articles about our President's attitude as expressed in the pending legislation would be banned; and the pulpiteers, lecturers, lobbyists, and propagandists would be charged with high treason.

I have in my humble way, from the beginning of the public debate concerning this important subject, taken the view that the President's attitude is absolutely correct, and tried to point out that the more violent opponents of the plan, who are maligning the President day in and day out without restraint and without reason, are Nazi-Communist inspired, with the result that I myself have been continually attacked. These attacks have been and are so ridiculous, so ill-founded, so illogical, so senseless, that I have ignored them, and I shall for the time being continue to do so.

Let us not be deceived by this propaganda about our young men and their parents. As I have tried to point out, it all comes from the Nazi sympathizers, such as the German-American National Alliance and the bunds, who aver that repeal of the embargo will aid the democracies and will be to the disadvantage of Hitler and Stalin. It is not the safety of the American youths and the comfort of American parents that are concerning these Nazis. They seek solely to advance the cause of Hitler and Stalin; but they will not succeed, as will be shown by the vote soon to be taken on the pending bill. As has been stated by the venerable Senator GLASS, more than 88 percent of the American people are in sympathy with the democracies of Europe, according to a Gallup poll. This does not mean that the remaining 12 percent do not favor the democracies; it simply means that they were not heard from or did not care to take sides in the impending controversy. If our action on the pending bill should aid the democracies, will it be against the best interests of our country? Indeed not. If so, it would be a blessing to America and the democracies and will have a tendency to eliminate future wars and their deplorable consequences. It will enable willing and honorable men and women to live normally and free from fear of force and regimentation.

In conclusion, at this time the hands of the President and his advisers should be free to take advantage of every favorable opportunity to safeguard American interests; yet he finds himself and the State Department denied necessary freedom of action by a dangerous remnant of the 1935 so-called Neutrality Act, a provision that when the President recognizes the existence of a state of war between two or more nations, or when war is declared, he must proclaim an embargo on shipments of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to the belligerents. This should be changed, by a return to international law, which we have, except for a brief period, consistently followed, and the accepted practices of all other countries.

Every Gainfully Employed Person Over 18 Years With a Gross Income in Excess of $1,000 Should Be Required To File an Annual Income-Tax Return

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER CHANDLER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, with the increase in annual incomes of those gainfully employed in the United States, it is believed that the time has come for the Congress to consider amendments to sections 51 and 54 of the Internal Revenue Code for the purpose of providing that each individual over 18 years of age, single or married, having a gross income in excess of $1,000 shall be required to file a verified tax return or report with the Department of the Treasury.

At first blush this suggestion may seem of doubtful soundness, but careful consideration of the proposal will make clear the justice and the wisdom of the idea.

Let us analyze the problem briefly:

There are approximately 46,000,000 employed persons in the United States. Department of Commerce reports indicate that of the entire number 15,000,000 people are employed in manufacturing industries, 9,000,000 persons are employed in service industries, 7,000,000 in trade and finance, and 15,000,000 in agriculture and other pursuits. Recent social-security statistics show that in 1938 there were over 30,000,000 holders of social-security cards, with an average annual income of about $900 per worker. Therefore, there should be at least 10,000,000 employees earning over $1,000 per annum. Actually, a study of consumer incomes published by the National Resources Committee reveals that 10,668,000 families receive incomes in excess of $2,000 per annum. In addition, it is safe to estimate that there are several million people throughout the United States who are now liable for income tax but who never file returns. Approximately 5,000,000 individual income-tax returns are filed annually. It should follow, therefore, that from 10,000,000 to 15,000,000 additional income-tax returns would be required by the proposed amendments, with additional income taxes from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 per annum, probably much more.

Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that our revenue laws have placed the burden of taxes upon a comparatively few people, while thousands of citizens who are not tax conscious or are negligent, possibly dishonest, have been able to evade their entire tax liabilities by filing no returns whatever. The reasons for these omissions need not be discussed here. Suffice it to say that the proposed amendments will not increase the tax burden of anyone now paying income taxes but will cause many who are evading their tax obligations to be compelled to meet them.

Moreover, the proposed amendments, if enacted into law, will make millions of our citizens and alien residents conscious of the fact that taxes are essential for the operation of government, and will emphasize that they, in common with others, have a responsibility for the maintenance of our institutions and the proper discharge of their necessary governmental functions. The effect in many instances will be to challenge the citizen's interest in more economy and greater efficiency in government. It will cause him to realize that, when government costs increase, more taxes are inevitable, and smaller exemptions will be unavoidable.

The honest citizen will not object to or resent being called upon to file a simple tax return under oath, while those who avoid their tax liability will be discovered and compelled to obey the law. However diligent the Internal Revenue Department officials and employees have been or might be in apprehending tax evaders, it is well-nigh impossible under the existing income-tax laws to find large numbers, say, millions, of people who keep no records, and whose names are not on pay rolls, or dividend reports, and whose net incomes are well above $1,000 per annum. If these assertions are correct and accurate, and I have abundant reason to believe that they are, steps should be taken promptly to correct abuses of the law, and bring intentional violators before the courts. The proposals herein made will be of great aid in performing that duty.

Simple amendments would be sufficient to meet the purposes intended. For example:

Section 51. Individual returns: Paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 51 should be entirely eliminated and (1) inserted to read as follows:

(1) Every individual over 18 years of age, single or married, having a gross income in excess of $1,000.

This would eliminate the necessity for any discrimination in this section due to marital status, as "every individual" would include husband and wife—today rightfully so, as many wives are gainfully employed.

Section 54. Records and special returns: This section should be changed as follows:

(a) By taxpayer—Every person over 18 years of age receiving gross income of any kind in excess of $1,000 during any taxable year or period must file a return under oath, keep such records, render under oath such statements, make such returns, and comply with such rules and regulations, as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may from time to time prescribe.

Similar changes may also be made throughout the act, where required to meet the changed wording of sections 51 and 54.

Mr. Speaker, I am not sufficiently informed as to the probable cost of printing and distributing the additional forms, but believe that the expense would be negligible in contrast to the amount of additional revenue that would be realized if the code is amended and the program put into effect. The working out of the details can be left safely to Treasury Department officials. The simplest method would be the best. A small sheet or card, some color other than white, might be included with or attached to every 1040–A tax-return blank and distributed in the same manner as employer and employment cards were distributed by mail carriers when the N. R. A. was in effect. All such cards, where the individual is not subject to tax and where the gross income from all sources is less than the fixed minimum, could be returned with control figures only. For example:

Nontaxable return

Name _____
Address _____
Salary or wages _____ $_____
Other income _____ $_____
Total gross income _____ $_____
Less all allowable deductions _____ $_____
Net income _____ $_____
Less credits _____ $_____
Excess:
Over deductions and credits _____ $_____
Over gross income _____ No tax due.

Signature _____ Affidavit:

Let me repeat, Mr. Speaker, that this proposal, if enacted, will not increase the taxes of any person now complying with the revenue laws. It is a means of bringing in taxes due but escaping collection. No injustice is being worked. The proposition simply is intended to insure fair play to the taxpayer and common honesty from the tax dodger.

The Challenge to the American Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE LEWIS
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, November 1, 1939

ADDRESS BY THE HONORABLE LOUIS JOHNSON, THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the Honorable Louis Johnson, the Assistant Secretary of War, on Thursday evening, October 26, 1939, in connection with the New York Herald Tribune Forum in the Waldorf Astoria ballroom in New York City, delivered an address on The Challenge to the American Army. This realistic discussion of what is "adequate national defense" for the United States deserves serious consideration by all citizens. The address follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, the challenge to the American Army is a distinctly modern problem. It is freely said in some quarters that a democracy cannot defend itself; that the process of modern defense is incompatible with democratic ideals. I have no use for this kind of defeatism. In this respect the challenge is especially a challenge to the American people. In our national life the Army is the servant and not the master of the body politic. By law it is under the command of the President and under control of the Congress. By tradition it limits its public appearances to occasions when the American people desire its presence. By experience it faithfully prepares for all contingencies. But it never knows in advance what its theater of operations will be, should it be called on to take up the burden of national defense.

Accordingly, before we challenge the American Army to prove its competence, we must clarify in our own minds the true military objective. What we all want is adequate national defense, and on this everyone agrees. The problem arises when we try to settle what is meant by the word "adequate." In this realm mere slogans will not do; for you will find that every slogan has concealed beneath it some assumption of a political, rather than a military, objective. You cannot define "adequate national defense" by talking about a navy strong enough to dominate both oceans; or by saying "two ships for one"; or by talking loosely about a standing army powerful enough to send an expedition of military crusaders across the seas to make the world safe for democracy. These attempts at definition are too extreme to be worthy of serious consideration as national policy.

Let me frankly confess that I know of no definition of "adequate national defense" which will cover every conceivable situation. Adequacy is a relative term. What was adequate yesterday we know is not enough today. What may be enough to protect us when the present armament program is realized may prove wholly insufficient in the future. Since the American object is defense, we do not have the privilege of the last word on our military needs. We have to meet world conditions and armament developments.

Consider, for instance, the change that has taken place in the public mind in the conception of the term "adequacy" as applied to the air. Five years ago the Baker board urged a program calling for 2,320 airplanes of all types by 1940. Its members and the Congress which enacted the program into law firmly believed that such a force would protect us against any enemies from the air. Two years ago doubts began to arise. We heard rumors of a mighty air armada that Germany was developing, but still we felt that the recommendations of the Baker board were sufficient. Then, in 1938, we saw the development of the Munich crisis, a development which revolved in considerable measure around the fact that one of the parties to that controversy claimed to have an enormously powerful air fleet. Learning from that crisis, we again scrutinized our air policy, and the President reconsidered the adequacy of our air defense. In January he sent a special message to Congress pointing out the changes that had taken place since the days of the Baker board and urged a new program which, with the whole-hearted support of Congress, we now have enacted. Today we have embarked on a national-defense program which will give the Army a minimum of 5,500 planes by June 1941 and the Navy 3,000 planes by 1944.

I wish we could feel that the program already enacted will suffice us for all time. But who dares be so bold as to foretell the future? All we can hope to do is to meet the national-defense issue in terms of world facts. That we have done in the past. That we must continue to do in the future. Every year we must reexamine our military status in the light of changing developments.

As a minimum today I think all Americans interested in adequate national defense will readily agree to this fundamental consideration:

Our Army and our Navy must be powerful enough to strike on land, on the sea, and in the air at a moment's notice in defense of our avowed policy to thwart all unfriendly efforts toward the establishment of hostile bases on the Western Hemisphere.

The safety of the United States and the safety of every republic in this hemisphere is predicated on the maintenance of American ideals. We are a happy family of nations on this continent. We strive to understand each other. The American family of nations has kept at peace by that method. We have also within our membership a number of law-abiding colonies that belong to European nations—possessions of Great Britain, of France, of Holland—but these colonies have observed the ideal of the peace of the Americas. They have been good neighbors. We have no fear that any of them will try to dominate this hemisphere and we live with them in tranquillity, but we are committed, along with the other American republics, to the proposition that, aside from these recognized European colonies, no overseas power shall acquire territory or threaten the integrity of any nation within the New World. That is our understanding of the Monroe Doctrine, now made into a cooperative pact by the declaration of Lima and given immediate reality by the very recent declaration of Panama a few weeks ago.

Time and again, in the past, we have had to invoke the Monroe Doctrine against un-American influences on this continent and each time we successfully thwarted them. In 1866 we compelled Maximilian and the France of Napoleon III to drop their imperialistic designs in Mexico. In 1895 we checked Great Britain from venturing further into the Caribbean Sea. In 1902, when the German Fleet visited Venezuela to carry out the policy of its imperialistic Government, President Theodore Roosevelt forced it to withdraw.

In the future, as in the past, we must be ready to defend our American policy against hostile intervention. In these days of the long-range bomber and the protracted cruising submarine, the security that our oceans have afforded us against the traditional methods of attack has become less potent. Our armed forces must therefore be strong enough to defend America against the newer, as well as against the old, weapons of aggression.

To achieve adequate national defense for our Army today we need men. We need money. We need munitions. We need physical reserves of supplies to cover at least the first 6 months of any major emergency, or better, until our industry can go into mass production and mass delivery of war supplies. We need civilian factories trained in the art of producing munitions so as to be able to guarantee our fighting forces a flow of materials throughout a war of any proportions.

All these needs are cogent, but above them all is our greatest need, the element of time.

Time to enlist, train, and equip men; time to spend money wisely, so as to assure ourselves a maximum result for our investment, time to manufacture munitions, many of which have no counterpart in civilian life; time to train a civilian industry to shift from a peace to a war basis with a minimum of waste, delay, and confusion; time to plan, time to experiment, time to perfect. Time! That is the challenge to the American people. That is the challenge to the American Army. Adequate national defense rests as much on adequate organization as on any other single factor; and organization takes time.

In 1917–18, time worked for our Army but only because our Navy and our Allies were able to overbalance our weakness on land. While we were selecting men and mobilizing resources, British Tommies and French poilus, backed by their peoples, were giving lives and pouring out treasure. While we were transporting soldiers to cantonments for training, our ships were convoying Allied troops to concentration points for battle. We declared war in April 1917 but it was May 1918 before we were able to put a full division in the front lines.

When our now famous First Division struck at Cantigny on May 28, 1918, in our first offensive, American doughboys went over the top wearing British helmets and carrying British gas masks. Our artillerymen in support came rolling along in caissons drawn by horses belonging to the French Government. They computed their ranges and their deflections with French aiming circles and French "scissors" instruments. They fired French 75's, using French ammunition.

In the World War the blunt fact was that the Allied armies in Europe gave us the luxury of 14 months to get ready. Will that be true again? If another emergency comes, will we be acting behind a screen of allies, or indeed, will we have allies at all? Can we really expect, when that day comes, that our enemies will concede us time to organize?

How vital this factor is was illustrated by the war now in progress. If the Poles could have had time to mobilize fully, the lightning speed might have been lost from the remarkable Blitzkrieg. If the Germans could have had time to build up complete reserves, the weapon of the British blockade would have given them little concern. If the British could have had time to complete their air forces, the threat from the skies would have caused them no terror. Time, now as always, plays a dominant role in the destiny of nations.

To meet the challenge of time we should, in my judgment, provide the Army right now with sufficient funds for the training, the organization, and the equipment of an initial protective force of Regulars and National Guardsmen of at least 600,000. Such a force, while larger than any before in our peacetime history, is commensurate with the grave responsibilities that we at this time hold toward the American Hemisphere.

You will notice that this is a force designed to be used on this hemisphere; it does not suggest in the slightest training for warfare overseas. As we see matters today adequate defense does not require the training of an Army for operations beyond the sea.

But this relatively small and strictly defensive land force does need adequate tools with which to work. They must have modern guns and ammunition, modern tanks, combat cars, and airplanes—all the matériel necessary to enable them to serve as a first line of land defense in any emergency.

Further, these must be M day troops. That means they must always be prepared for any contingency. They must be ready to serve when needed—not after the development of mobilization or production plans which can be made effective only in a distant tomorrow. They must be on call today and every day.

These are our needs. They are our needs now. When we tackle the job of meeting them in the shortest possible time, however, we find serious obstacles. Here is what we have done: We have already launched a program for airplanes to the number of 5,500 and have set June 30, 1941, as the date for its completion. Try as we might, we could not achieve the objective far short of that time without sacrifice of quality. We already have embarked on an armament project toward the equipment of an initial protective force. Yet, despite our fervent desire, and our determined efforts to hasten delivery, we must face a lapse of 18 months before the job is completed. We have already agreed that the need for an expansion of our existing land forces is compelling, yet months may elapse before the funds provided for the increase can be translated into soldiers, recruited, equipped, and trained.

Let me emphasize training; and that, too, requires time. Discipline, that cool ability enabling many men to work together in time of stress, cannot be attained in a hurry. No brief periods of training can supply it. Campaigns may bring it, at a fearful price; but the real method is daily experience, in hardship and in endurance. In 1917 and 1918, we gained it but only after months of intensive combat and bitter experience in battle.

Important as discipline always has been and still is to the soldier, warfare today adds another challenge to the man in arms. He must be not only a disciplined fighter but a skilled mechanic. Be he officer or enlisted man, he must have a firm grasp of the powers and the capabilities of his weapons, as well as the strength and the courage to use them efficiently and intelligently. Guns, tanks, planes, and the other numerous battle accessories today call for craftsmen skilled in handling machines, as well as fighters bred in maintaining discipline. Any ordinary chauffeur can drive a car, but the pilot of a heavy tank who must traverse varied terrain, climb over steep hills, drive through thick forests, wade across deep gullies and speed along wide-open fields while planes from above and artillery from the flank shower him with a deadly spray, must indeed be a mechanic in arms.

The final challenge to the American Army is to its leadership. Here more than in any other country in the world, a rare combination of qualities is required. Not only must they develop in the ranks the skill of the artisan and the discipline of the soldier; not only must they create in the services of supply the smooth-working organization of transport; not only must they be able to mobilize in production the mass manufacture which lies behind defense; they must also have that rarest of qualities, the ability to be master in one field and servant in another. For the national defense is not a policy in itself. It is the servant of the peacetime policy of a peaceful people. The measures of defense are not methods of revolution; they are methods to safeguard our free democratic institutions. Our commissioned officers, from the subaltern to the ranking general, merely direct an arm of an essentially civil government.

And this, it seems to me, is the fundamental assumption in dealing with the problem of adequate national defense. The institutions we create, the mobilizations we work out, the plans we make, must not determine our national objectives. They must not place any businessman in fear lest defense be used as an excuse for revolution. No laborer must be allowed to think that a defense program can be used as a pretext to deprive him of his recognized rights. No free American must believe that the defense of democracy on this hemisphere means losing democracy in the process.

It is true that the keynote of our defense policy must be flexibility; we do not make world conditions. It is true that as processes of war involve increasing strata of population our defense measures must cover a greater segment of the national life. It is true that the discipline of defense has ceased to be the discipline of an army and has become the discipline of a nation. But this very discipline, this very increase in area, and this very flexibility must be dominated by the ultimate goal—the defense of our institutions as we like them. This is, and must always be, the underlying premise of an adequate national defense; it is, and must always be, the challenge to the American Army; it is, and must always be, the challenge to the American will to keep America free.

St. Lawrence Waterway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, one undertaking of great interest to the people of this country is the so-called St. Lawrence waterway project.

We are all familiar with the fact that this undertaking will mean that ocean-going ships can sail the Great Lakes and that the people of the Midwest will be accorded the benefits of lower freight rates on account of water transportation.

I am glad to note the news dispatch that Canada has advocated a willingness to resume formal diplomatic conversations with the State Department of the United States. This press dispatch indicates that Premier Mitchell Hepburn, of Ontario, is adopting a friendly attitude and that he is now favorable to the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty so that ocean-going vessels may sail from the Atlantic to the Great Lakes.

I hope that these press dispatches are true and that an understanding may soon be reached by the Secretary of State in this country and the Premier of Canada, Mr. King, so that a treaty may be submitted to the Senate for ratification. From the newspapers the other day I quote the following significant paragraphs:

President Roosevelt announced today that he was reviving negotiations for the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterways treaty.

He said at his press conference that he was reorganizing the International Joint Commission which drafted a treaty some time ago so the draft could be taken off the shelf at the State Department and dusted off.

This is good news for the northwestern section of the United States. It is my purpose to confer with the new International Joint Commission and to render whatever assistance I can toward bringing about a treaty between the United States and Canada.

The Test of Patriotism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. FRANK MURPHY

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Frank Murphy, Attorney General, at the National Conference on Civil Liberties in New York City on October 13, 1939. The address is entitled "The Test of Patriotism."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Five months ago, when the Western World was still clinging to an uncertain peace, I was privileged to meet with a group of municipal officials and to discuss with them the subject of civil liberties. I had occasion to say that in my settled conviction the finest contribution which America has made to civilization is our loyalty to the idea of civil liberty.

Tonight, when much of the Western World is torn by a fierce and bloody war, I want very heartily to reaffirm that conviction.

It is true that in certain parts of the world, might for the moment appears to be triumphant over right. It is true that in many countries the traditional civil and religious rights of the individual are no longer recognized.

These are realistic facts that we must realistically face. Common sense dictates that with virility and courage we must prepare ourselves to guard all the magnificent physical and spiritual resources that make up our national heritage. To let our defenses weaken, to be soft or infirm in our attitude toward national security, would be a faithless and unworthy thing.

But while we must be strong to protect our democratic heritage, we can and must still recognize that the heart and soul of our heritage is the civil liberty of the individual, and that in protecting our physical wealth we must not destroy our spiritual wealth of freedom. For civil liberty is still the finest possession of the American people. It is still that priceless thing without which life loses its dignity and becomes only a hopeless form of spiritual slavery.

And by the same measure that civil liberty is precious to us, we must be willing and determined to defend it against the forces that threaten to destroy it.

In a world filled with many uncertainties, there are some things that are certain.

We know that in the hearts of the American people there is a great, steadfast desire to keep out of war. It is a desire for peace that no public servant or political leader in this land can afford to underestimate.

But we also know that in a world where force has been unleashed, the mere desire for peace is not a guaranty that a peace-loving nation can remain at peace.

It is not enough for us merely to say that we want peace and that we abhor war—that we will have no part of war. When the world is aflame with war, or gravely threatened by war, it is the duty of a responsible government to do something more than talk peace. First, it must take active steps to prevent unnecessary involvement. Second, it should make itself ready to resist attack—not only attack from without, but attack from within as well—attack by sabotage and subversive activities.

I am concerned tonight to discuss our defense from internal aggression. For we cannot be unmindful of the fact that the present attack on peace and liberty in Europe originated in the internal aggression of powerful groups against the democratic authority of their own lawfully established governments.

But in our zeal to protect ourselves from internal aggression, we must be on guard that we ourselves are not guilty of aggression against the civil liberties of our own citizens. We must not fall victim to the infection of despotism that in recent years has been sweeping the world. For if we suppress civil liberty, we suppress democracy itself.

In our own land, this generation has seen a little of what happens when a crisis develops and the Government is not prepared to protect its people against internal attack. I have in mind the period of the World War and some of the wrongs against liberty that were done in the name of patriotism.

I believe we all should recognize that however tragic the wrongs that were done, they sprang from misdirected zeal rather than evil intent.

We should remember that in the feverish, wartime atmosphere—an atmosphere which inevitably is dangerous to liberty—average citizens—normally calm and reasonable—became so imbued with the rightness of their cause that opposition or criticism was intolerable to them. Not only could they brook no open disagreement with national policy, but the failure of others to share their own attitude became in their eyes evidence of lack of patriotism. We remember, some of us, the outrageous treatment heaped upon that great patriot and statesman, Robert La Follette, who today is so ably succeeded in the United States Congress by his fine, courageous son, Senator LA FOLLETTE.

From suspicion and distrust, it was for some people an easy step to violence and vigilante activities. In some communities, irresponsible, extra-legal organizations assumed functions that belonged properly to the civil authorities. And in some cases the civil authorities themselves were carried away by a hysteria of fear. Defenseless men and women were mistreated by such groups on mere suspicion. On many occasions, the constitutional right of peaceful assembly was violated, and homes were invaded and searched in the dark of night for evidence of disaffection and disloyalty. In their zeal to help defend their country, well-meaning people resorted to methods which in the calm of peacetime would not be considered.

Even if we recognize—as we must—that this condition was not general, it is a picture that friends of democracy have every reason to regret. But I want to emphasize how much I believe that instead of viewing it with rancor toward anyone, we should keep two things carefully in mind.

First, we should remember that much of this was done sincerely in the name of patriotism and national defense.

Second, we should keep in our minds and hearts a firm resolution that while making the security of the country our first and greatest concern in this troubled hour, we will injure not one of the qualities that have made this Nation the strongest haven of democracy and freedom on earth.

I know there are sincere individuals who earnestly believe that in a period like the present, when the country is seeking ways to avoid war but yet must prepare its defense, it is not possible to maintain both civil liberty and a strong defense against internal attack at one and the same time. They are convinced that we must choose between the temporary suppression of civil rights and a weak and ineffective internal defense.

I do not believe that we face any such choice. I do not believe that a democracy must necessarily become something other than a democracy in order to protect its national interests. I am convinced that if the job is done right—if the defense against internal aggression is carefully prepared—our people need not suffer the tragic things that have happened elsewhere in the world and that we have seen, in less degree, even in this land of freedom. We can prevent and punish the abuse of liberty by sabotage, disorder, and violence without destroying liberty itself.

At the time of the World War the country's defense against internal attack was not fully prepared, and events took their natural course. The civil authorities were not trained for their new responsibilities. The door was wide open for irresponsible organizations to set themselves up as agencies of law enforcement. That is precisely what happened.

Today the picture is quite different. The delicate business of combating espionage has been coordinated under the Department of Justice. Under responsible direction, it will be carried on, as it is today, not by overzealous, inexperienced laymen but by men who have been equipped for the work by careful training—training that includes instruction in the rights of the citizen as well as in methods of crime suppression. And we have every reason to expect them to be worthy of their training and instruction.

This work should be done and will be done by responsible employees of the Federal Government, acting in cooperation with the duly constituted law-enforcing agencies of State and local governments. There will be no alignment with agents of vigilante groups or private industrial organizations which are concerned primarily with industrial disputes and labor problems. Enforcement officials will themselves obey the law of the land.

We need, and we earnestly ask, from every citizen and every government an unswerving resolve that for as long as this crisis endures we will keep our heads; that we will not abandon our Bill of Rights: that whatever measures we may adopt for our defense against subversive activities, we will use them just as calmly and judiciously as we do firmly and resolutely.

But given a thoroughly prepared internal defense, given the proper mental attitude of calmness and cool reasoning, we need something more. We need a sound sense of direction—a clear understanding of our own policy and our own position.

First, we need to remember that in an emergency it is right and just for our democracy to be on guard not only against internal attack by foreign agents but obstructive activities by people in our own ranks as well.

We have a right to expect that once a policy has been formulated and adopted by constitutional, democratic procedure, it will be accepted and observed by all as an expression of the sovereign will of the people until such time as the policy is changed by constitutional methods. Even those who disagree with it should do their part to make it effective. This is the democratic way in peacetime; it is the democratic way in time of war.

And here we can take our lesson from those democracies abroad that failed to deal vigorously with illegal activities against the democratic process and that now are only memories in the minds of men.

The second thing we need to remember is that an emergency does not abrogate the Constitution or dissolve the Federal Bill of Rights. That is not only good sense, it is good constitutional law.

Seventy-three years ago—1 year after the Civil War—the Supreme Court declared in the famous Milligan case that, "The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances."

To the many friends of civil liberty gathered at this conference I want to give the emphatic assurance that in this emergency, as well as in time of peace, the Department of Justice embraces that policy without reservation. And because we are convinced that it represents the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the American people, we are determined to apply it and to practice it as thoroughly and intelligently as men are capable of doing.

We are aware, and the people should also be aware, that this will be no simple task. It is a problem of steering an even course that will invade neither of the two boundaries that I have mentioned. In brief, it is a problem of finding a sound basis for maintaining public safety without encroaching on the Bill of Rights.

In enforcing some laws, we must not violate other laws. In upholding the Constitution, we must not infringe on the priceless heritage of civil liberty which the Constitution guarantees. To do that—to suppress or suspend the Bill of Rights—would be to destroy the very democratic principles that we are seeking to preserve. It would be to yield to the same autocratic psychology that we want to keep out of this country. We must not let that come to pass. We must have it understood that while we will oppose firmly and vigorously any illegal activities, we will do so in a responsible manner and within the orbit of the Constitution. That is the American way.

The immortal Justice Holmes laid down a formula which I believe will help us to keep a true course. In a celebrated wartime case involving the very things we have discussed here tonight, he wrote these lines:

"When men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas * * *. While that experiment is part of our system, I think that we should be eternally vigilant against attempts to check the expression of opinions that we loathe—unless they so imminently threaten immediate interference with the lawful and pressing purposes of the law that an immediate check is required to save the country."

The willingness, the determination, the ability, to follow that democratic principle, so ably stated by a great friend and interpreter of democracy, will be, in my estimation, a real test of patriotism in this or any future crisis.

The true citizen of America will remember that loyalty to our tradition of civil liberty is as much a part of patriotism as defense of our shores and a hatred for treason. He will never forget that civil liberty under the American system is a legal right in time of war as well as in time of peace—that, whatever the time, it is liberty for all, irrespective of the accident of birth.

The true American will remember that, whether it be peacetime or wartime, there could be nothing more unpatriotic in this land of many peoples and many creeds than the persecution of minorities and the fomenting of hatred and strife on the basis of race or religion.

He will realize that if, in the atmosphere of war, we allow civil liberty to slip away from us, it may not be long before our recent great gains in social and economic justice will also have vanished. For a nation that is calloused in its attitude toward civil rights is not likely to be sensitive toward the many grave problems that affect the dignity and security of its citizens. We must not let this crisis destroy what we have so dearly won.

Many years ago, in the midst of another great emergency, Abraham Lincoln put this question to the Congress of the United States: "Must a government of necessity be too strong for the liberties of its own people, or too weak to maintain its own existence?"

Let us, in this troubled hour, answer that question as befits a great and enlightened democracy. Let us prove for all time that ours is a twofold strength—the physical strength of self-defense and the moral strength of unflinching devotion to our own ideals.

The Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ZEBULON WEAVER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

LETTER FROM WORLD WAR VETERAN

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written by a former World War veteran to Col. Charles A. Lindbergh:

OCTOBER 14, 1939.

Mr. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH,
Care of Radio Station WOR, Newark, N. J.

DEAR SIR: Last night, October 13, I heard your radio address in which you enunciated certain views of yours concerning the arms embargo, these views being, as I understood them, the prohibition by this Nation of the sale of bombing planes and offensive weapons of war to any belligerent nation. In the course of your address you also made certain remarks concerning the sovereignty of the Dominion of Canada and the bond between the United States and Europe.

Your address is so inconsistent with Americanism as handed down to me by my forefathers, who helped to create the United States, and is so opposed to the fundamental concepts of freedom upon which this Nation is based that I do not believe any real American should permit your address to go unanswered.

Insofar as your remarks concerning the mandatory prohibition of the sale of offensive arms and airplanes are concerned, let it suffice to say that a nation is justified in resorting to war in defense of itself or in order to right a wrong to its friends, particularly a wrong to a weak friend who could not defend itself. Such has been the teaching of theologians, such has been the policy of this Nation since its beginning, such is the natural law of mankind as exemplified in the law of self-defense, and such is the law of Christianity as concerns a neighbor or friend unjustly attacked. Certainly, Poland was most barbarously attacked by Germany and no one knows who would have been next. Did you know? You did not say.

Thus, it is self-evident that both England and France are justified in waging war against Germany, in fact they must do so if the pledged word and honor are to guide the relations between man and man and between nation and nation. To do otherwise would be to exalt force above justice, lying above truth, and brutality above charity. Would you want that? You did not say. Since England and France are justified, in fact, required by honor, in waging war upon Germany, the aggressor, it naturally follows that those nations are rightfully permitted to use all lawful weapons of war, defensive and offensive. Why then, Mr. Lindbergh, do you draw the line between pursuit planes and bombing planes, between antiaircraft guns and heavy siege artillery?

Is it solely because you believe the bombing plane and the siege gun are barbarous and inhuman weapons? If so, did you tell Mr. Hitler that while you were in Germany being wined, dined, feted, and decorated by the Nazi Government? If you did not, when you knew and fully appreciated the methods Mr. Hitler intended to pursue against his neighbors to gain his ends, why didn't you? Do you believe the bombing and destruction of Poland a barbarous and inhuman event? Have you ever said so?

Why not? If you did not understand and fully appreciate the methods intended to be used by Mr. Hitler, why your purported advice before the Munich Pact, of the folly of opposing Mr. Hitler? If you did know the methods intended to be used by Mr. Hitler, why did you not then publicly condemn any resort to such weapons either by Mr. Hitler or anyone else? Can your continued silence in this respect be construed as the act of a sincere lover of peace and justice, and if not, how should it be construed?

Since it is a principle of military science that the best method of defense is often the attack, how can you truthfully say or logically prove that the use of bombing planes and heavy guns by the Allies is offensive rather than defensive, particularly when the original aggressor, the nation that started the offensive, was Germany?

So, Mr. Lindbergh, is it not reasonable to conclude, since it is lawful for England and France to use bombers and heavy guns, that it is not unneutral or un-American for the United States to sell such instrumentalities to any belligerent who can come and get them? Is it not true that neither international law nor justice requires a neutral nation to cease or prohibit the sale of any of its goods, commodities, or manufactured products to a belligerent nation?

As to your remarks about Canada, Mr. Lindbergh, do you believe that Canada has a right to tell the United States what her relations should be with other nations? If not, on what lawful or just basis do you tell Canada what hers shall be? Since, according to American traditions and principles, the right to rule resides in the people of a nation, and since the people, and they alone, have the lawful power to choose their form of government, haven't the people of Canada the right to choose their own form of government and through that government to exercise the various forms of sovereignty, including that of waging war? Has Canada ever asked the United States whether she should go to war or not? Why not? Because the United States is a sovereign nation and exercises the rights of a sovereign nation, just as Canada does.

So, Mr. Lindbergh, you show your complete lack of understanding of the principles on which the United States was founded and which she has consistently upheld, including the principle of self-determination by a free people of their form of government. What you ask for, Mr. Lindbergh, is not a free and sovereign Canada, but a Canada under the control and domination of the United States, perhaps not quite in the same manner that Austria and Czechoslovakia are under the control of Germany, but at least in the manner that Estonia and Lithuania are under the control of Russia. That is not Americanism, Mr. Lindbergh, but its very opposite, for it recognizes no real liberty of action by a small nation but merely the exercise of such privileges as its larger neighbor permits.

Be a real American, Mr. Lindbergh, understand and expound the ideals and principles of the United States, and get down on your knees and thank God that the American people created a liberty-loving Nation which fully respects the rights of all nations, great or small. The United States has given you everything you have, Mr. Lindbergh, and the least you can do is to respect and uphold the principles of freedom and justice on which the United States is based.

Therefore, Mr. Lindbergh, respect the sovereignty of Canada, and again get down on your knees and thank God, this time that our Canadian neighbor has been a good neighbor and a true friend for many years to the United States; yes, perhaps even before your first ancestor ever set foot upon the soil of the United States. Reflect upon the fact that the announcement of the establishment of great air-training schools in Canada does not even cause a ripple of excitement in the United States, because all true Americans know such air bases are no threat to the United States. Is any more tangible evidence possible of the deep and abiding friendship that exists between these two free nations? Yet such a friendship does not satisfy you? Why? It does not satisfy Mr. Hitler, either. Finally, would we in the United States have the same feeling of security if Canada was allied with certain other nations of Europe, Germany for example? I know the answer and so do you. No.

You say the source of the bond between the United States and Europe is of race and not of political ideology. Again you do not understand American traditions, Mr. Lindbergh. We speak the English language, our laws are fundamentally based upon the English common law, and to a great extent our concepts of liberty and freedom come from the English. What claim did the American colonists assert at the start of the American Revolution? Was it not their rights as British subjects, which rights were being withheld and abrogated to a great extent through the influence of a German who at that time sat on the throne of England?

Of what racial descent was Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Adams, Franklin, and the vast majority of those who fought the American Revolution, wrote the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, and who guided the destiny of this Nation when it was small and weak, and who finally welded a great Nation? Yes; our racial bond here was with the British Isles but I am American enough and thus fair enough to admit that the sons and daughters of other nations helped some then and later came in large numbers to America and have shared in its development, and all praise to them.

There are bonds, however, Mr. Lindbergh, which unite more permanently than those of racial descent. These are the bonds of ideals and customs, namely, religious, political, and legal and civil and ethical. Of these, our religious ideals are from Christianity (although religious freedom is permitted), as is exemplified by words in the Declaration of Independence and even by words on our coins. Our political and legal and civil ideals are derived fundamentally from those of England, refined and adapted, of course, to America. Our ethical ideals are those of fair play and honor, which we inherited from our British colonists. So we have a bond with Christianity. We all know how Christianity fares in Germany as compared to how it fares in England, France, and Canada. You never mention Christianity, however; that is the trunk from which stem the branches of freedom and the rights of man. We have a bond with political and legal and civil liberty and we all know how they fare in Germany as compared to England, France, and Canada. We have a bond with the ethical concepts of fair play and honor, and we all know how they fare in Germany as compared with England, France, and Canada. Those things represent the higher things for which man has striven through the ages. They are the ties that bind freemen everywhere. So you see, Mr. Lindbergh, there are bonds between the United States and some other nations deeper than the bonds of race. As a matter of fact, from the viewpoint of race, we should all be Americans without any hyphens. Racial superiority is a German theory, not an American, Mr. Lindbergh.

So, Mr. Lindbergh, the bonds that unite; the things that represent the very soul of America; the traditions that, thank God, have been handed down from generation to generation for over 300 years in America—are the superiority of Christianity over paganism and atheism, the superiority of free political and civil institutions over totalitarianism, and the superiority of honor and justice and fair play over lying, injustice, and cheating.

You are famous, Mr. Lindbergh. I am not, but I do not envy you after listening to your address. Quite the contrary, for I have the priceless heritage of having in my veins the blood of those who helped to settle Maryland in 1634 and to give the world religious freedom and all that stems from that; the blood of those who fought in the Revolution, the War of 1812, and the Civil War; and the blood of those who, in high positions, helped to guide the footsteps of a new nation and to set up its institution. From those ancestors I have inherited that deep devotion for those ideals which have made the United States great. My task has been to receive those ideals from those who went before me, honorably uphold them, and then pass them on to my children. That is a larger task than it may appear at first glance, but it is an honor. I have tried to fulfill my duty.

My prayer is that I may always do my duty to God and America. I, too, deplore war with its destruction, death, and despair. I also pray that it may never again come to America or be the lot of Americans. This for my sons, for your sons, and for all of my fellow citizens. When I pray, I do so as one who volunteered and went overseas in the World War, who shed his blood at the front in France, and who returned home crippled for life physically. I did my duty then, and if need be—which God forbid—I am willing to again offer the last measure of devotion, wherever and whenever I can be of service to the United States, at home or over the seas. Honor, duty, and patriotism were handed to me by my forefathers unsullied; I shall try to hand them to my sons in the same condition, and I hope that they will be able to do so to their sons.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES W. TISDALE.

The Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

ARTICLE FROM CHICAGO HERALD-AMERICAN OF OCTOBER 23, 1939

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Chicago Herald-American of October 23, 1939, entitled "Political Parade":

[From the Chicago Herald-American of October 23, 1939]

POLITICAL PARADE—WE NEED THOSE ARMS OURSELVES

(By George Rothwell Brown)

WASHINGTON, October 23.—The cold-blooded, callous indifference to the critical necessities of this country which has been shown thus far in the extra session by the House of Representatives marks a new all-time low, even for "rubber-stamp" New Deal Congresses.

The subservience of the so-called Democratic leaders to White House command increases as election year, 1940, draws on apace, and the conviction deepens in the politician's mind, as he thinks of his job security, that the war will break down the two-term tradition, and that the President will again be renominated, this time for an indefinite term—that is to say, for the rest of his life.

Not a finger has been lifted by House Democrats, in absolute control of that body, to remedy any of the Nation's existing ills.

Under the supine leadership of RAYBURN and BANKHEAD, not a thought has been given to the 10,000,000 people still out of jobs in the United States.

For 7 of the 11 years of this artificially prolonged panic, the Democratic New-Deal coalition is clearly responsible.

Today one senses at the capital that the party which in July anticipated defeat in next year's elections today counts solely upon being saved by the European war.

The national defense in this country today is in a deplorable state.

There need be no concealment about it. Every foreign spy knows it.

Yet at the Senate there is no thought whatever in responsible quarters for safeguarding the defenses of America, but thought only of safeguarding the defenses of Great Britain and France.

Not once in the debate, so far as this writer knows, not even by the opponents of embargo repeal, has any statement been made tending to show how devastating to the national defense of the United States the repeal of the arms embargo might prove to be.

The hypocrisy which originally clothed the demand for repeal of the arms embargo has been stripped off.

Only congenital idiots doubt that the whole purpose is that the United States may aid France and England in defeating Germany, a country with which we are at peace.

If the embargo is repealed, and munitions and airplanes and airplane parts are supplied by American industries to the allied European powers, this can only be at the expense of our own defenses.

It will be argued in rebuttal that the munitions industries will be stimulated in this country, that they will go into heavy production, and that in the event of an emergency—meaning our own involvement in the war—we can instantly cause the cancelation of foreign contracts, and begin at once to draw upon these munitions plants for our own Army and Navy requirements.

This begs the question. The scarcity of arms, munitions, and armaments for our own armed forces is acute and immediate.

Congress is poorly informed, or informed not at all, upon some of the most vital situations.

The airplane contracts with France have stripped the United States of the finest pursuit bombers we possessed.

Congress has made lavish appropriations for airplanes for the Army, and it is true that contracts have been let, but it will take a year to build them.

Before the Senate votes finally on repeal of the arms embargo, a committee should call before it the experts of Army and Navy, and get a complete picture of the possible consequences to our own national defense.

Such a committee would learn plenty. Why vote in ignorance?

Preservation of Property Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

RESOLUTION BY THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF REAL ESTATE BROKERS

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted by the National Association of Real Estate Brokers:

Whereas the very foundation of a democracy such as the United States of America and the preservation of its social institutions and of a stable society within it is dependent upon widespread ownership of the land on the part of the citizen and his full enjoyment of the rights that flow from that ownership; and

Whereas legislative acts in various States and in the Congress of the United States have been introduced and in certain cases still are pending, the effect of which would be to impair the benefits of land ownership; and

Whereas some of such acts even go to the extreme of attempting to defeat existing titles established over long periods of time: Be it

Resolved by the National Association of Real Estate Boards at Los Angeles, Calif., October 27, 1939, That we deprecate attempts on the part of government, whether municipal, State or Federal, to acquire certain benefits of ownership by legislation under the guise of the public interest or to deprive citizens of their rights of property without due process of law and adequate compensation.

NOTE.—This is a statement of a general principle, intended to cover, among other things, such cases as have arisen in Texas, California, and other States where an ownership question has arisen as to submerged lands on navigable waters.

Anniversary of Gift of the Statue of Liberty to the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

STATEMENT AND ADDRESS

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein the following statement and speech delivered on the occasion of the fifty-third celebration of the anniversary of the gift of the Statue of Liberty to the United States by France:

STATEMENT BY REV. HERMAN F. REISSIG, CHAIRMAN, AMERICAN COMMITTEE FOR PROTECTION OF FOREIGN BORN

It is important, in celebrating the anniversary of the dedication of the Statue of Liberty, that we pause to recall the great role played by the immigrant in the building of America. Too often do we overlook the debt we owe to the foreign-born while certain people, as a result of the war in Europe, are today intensifying their efforts to besmirch the name and intentions of the foreign-born. On this day, dedicated to the memory of the Statue of Liberty and all the statue signifies in our American history, it is incumbent upon all clear-thinking and conscientious Americans to give the lie to those who would attack the foreign-born and deprive them of their rights.

Those forces seeking to bring the foreign-born into disrepute are in reality seeking a means of attacking the rights of all Americans. We must on this birthday of Lady Liberty—who has always welcomed the immigrant and held her torch of freedom outstretched toward him—rededicate ourselves and our country to those principles of equality and justice which have always characterized our dealings with the immigrant in our midst.

The American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born calls to the attention of the American people the urgent need to revise our naturalization laws to enable all noncitizens to become naturalized American citizens. In this way can we best fulfill the promise of freedom and equality which the Statue of Liberty has always held out to native- and foreign-born.

ADDRESS BY LEONARD COVELLO

Friends and fellow Americans, when I first saw the Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor I was 10 years old. My mother and I, together with my small brothers, were coming from Italy to America to join my father, who had preceded us to the United States to prepare a home for us here. On the voyage across there had been a storm at sea. We were glad when we were at the end of our long journey and saw the great Statue of Liberty rising out of the sea with arm extended in welcome.

At the close of the World War I stood again on the deck of an incoming ship, straining my eyes for a sight of that statue and the skyline of New York City. It was not the first time since I had become a citizen of the United States that I had been to Europe and home again. Many times I had watched for the sight of land in the ocean that meant that America was near. But in 1919, returning from war service overseas, the figure of Liberty in the harbor was like that of a friend, waiting to welcome me home again. I was glad to be back, and I was stirred by a new sense of appreciation of what America means and stands for.

Many of the sons of immigrant Americans had gone overseas. As Americans they had tried to serve the cause of democracy. And in Europe they had learned how the souls of men crave freedom and equality, of which the Statue of Liberty has become a symbol to the world.

As a man, experienced in the knowledge that only war can give, I was better able to understand the meaning of the words "liberty," "equality," "tolerance," and "justice," which are the essence of the American ideal. The symbolism of the beacon light in the uplifted hand of the Statue of Liberty is clearer to a man than it is to a child. But, even as a child, I would sometimes remember how the Statue of Liberty looks, as it stands in the harbor, arm uplifted, a light for the world in its hand. I used to feel that I wanted to give something fine to America, because of the way in which America gives, to immigrants of all lands, the opportunities that are a part of freedom and democracy.

The children of Americans of foreign birth were born on American soil. They are a part of America; they belong to America and America belongs to them; it is their native land. Today, there are 42,000,000 people of foreign origin in the United States. I believe that most of these Americans of foreign origin feel—as I have often felt—that they would like to give worth-while services and contributions to America, in appreciation of what America has endeavored to give to the peoples of the world.

To the immigrant and his children, the ideals of liberty are not a myth. The immigrants that came to the United States brought with them memories of wars and of sacrifices made by themselves and their forbears for the cause of freedom. For freedom is a natural heritage that belongs, by right, to all mankind; and liberty, I think, has a deeper meaning for those who have made sacrifices for the sake of liberty, more, perhaps, than it does for those who have never been called upon to make sacrifices for the cause of freedom; and I know that both foreign-born Americans and native-born Americans share a common tradition of sacrifice, made by past generations of men and women who have fought and died—or lived and served—in the cause of liberty.

For all of us, it is significant that this great Statue of Liberty, in the harbor of New York City, came to us as a gift from one of the freedom-loving nations beyond the ocean. This fact, it seems to me, is symbolic of the common bond of brotherhood that exists among all men: a bond which shall, in time, find expression in a larger world freedom—a freedom strengthened by a brotherhood among men that shall make hatreds and wars impossible.

This gift to the United States from France—this Statue of Liberty—stands not alone for liberty; it stands, as well, for understanding and comradeship among nations. Out of such understanding and comradeship, there shall come, finally, peace and brotherhood, for which all men are constantly striving.

War—by which peace and freedom are being destroyed throughout the world today—only strengthens in the hearts of men, a desire for peace; it makes all the brighter the torch of liberty in a war-darkened world.

Peace, good will to all mankind, equality, tolerance, freedom, justice—a haven of refuge for the oppressed—these are the things for which America stands in the minds and hearts of the foreign-born peoples that have founded their homes in the United States. And to these people, the Statue of Liberty is a sign to the world that eventually—as Thomas Jefferson hoped—freedom, like a consuming flame, shall destroy—wherever they may exist—intolerance and hatred and oppression among the peoples of the world.

Sam D. McReynolds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I should certainly be derelict in a sacred duty if I completed my first session in the Halls of Congress without paying tribute to my distinguished predecessor, the late lamented Judge SAM D. MCREYNOLDS. The post I occupy is hallowed with the memory of the services he rendered to his State and his Nation. I bring to this assembly, not only my personal lament, but the voice of the entire Third District of Tennessee, united in its sorrow for the passing of the man whom they loved and honored.

Judge MCREYNOLDS for 20 years graced and distinguished the bench as judge of the Sixth Judicial Circuit in the Volunteer State. His personality softened the accuracy and correctness of his decisions, his mien dignified the court, and his brilliant mind left deep its impress on the jurisprudence of the State.

When elected to the National Congress in 1922, he brought to his seat the mellowness and maturity of a life most men would then have been willing to acclaim as a fulfilled and successful career. A larger and more useful public service was in its incipiency. Seventeen consecutive years the citizens of the Third District were privileged to be represented in Washington by this man who so consecrated his personal life to a sacred public trust.

In 1932, his elevation to the chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Affairs marked the beginning of the final glorious chapter of a man whose life had been dedicated to the public weal. As chairman of this important committee during a period of international unrest, his service transcended the local bounds of a congressional district and his stature assumed national importance. His leadership stamped him forever with the imprint of statesmanship. When on July 11 of this year Judge SAM D. MCREYNOLDS was called home to his well-earned rest and reward, this earnest east Tennessee patriot's passing was mourned by a sorrowing Nation. The United States had truly suffered a loss. Yet, for all of his glorious public service, the most compelling memories of Judge MCREYNOLDS are associated with his private life which, as so many of his colleagues have said, was most exemplary. He was truly a kind husband, an indulgent father, and a warm and consistent friend. Add to this his ability as a lawyer, his service as a judge, and his accomplishment as a statesman and the dimensions are those of a man who has been truly destined to receive the blessings of history.

Address Before Conference on War Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH E. CASEY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 2, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH E. CASEY OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me:

No man of intelligence today would even attempt to address an audience on a subject remote from war. It is our immediate and omnipresent concern. Nevertheless, the issues of war and peace as such are not before us. This Nation, after proclamation by the President, is a neutral nation—at peace. And I pray God that it may ever remain so.

But neutral though we may be, we are not insulated from the effects of war abroad. And it is about one of these effects that I propose to talk today—the effect of war on prices generally and the cost of living.

For most consumers the cost of living is never low. It is always too high in terms of their wage, salary, and, perhaps, other income. Most consumers just never seem able to bring both ends together in a friendly gathering. This is true during periods of falling or stable prices as well as during periods of rising prices. Rising prices simply make a bad situation worse. And if there is a substantial rise in prices the cost of living becomes higher than too high.

My first thought, as was yours, when we witnessed the market jump of the last 2 months, was what happened during the last war. And the record shows that the really significant price increases did not start on a broad sweep until late in 1915, although certain commodities did get out of line almost immediately. Once prices gained momentum, however, they reached for the sky. Wholesale prices, as a matter of fact, increased by 75 percent during our period of neutrality.

Without stopping to detail the breadth and degree of price rises, it suffices to say that even before April 1917 it became imperative for the Government to take action—action, in many cases, of the most drastic kind.

Some of you may even remember the War Industries Board and the Price Fixing Committee, the Food Administration, and the Fuel Administration, and the Railroad Administration. Prices were fixed and priorities granted, business and industry was licensed, and profit margins determined.

There are those who feel that each generation must learn its own lesson—but a few lessons we learned during the last war we will not soon forget.

In the first place we learned that government can't abdicate in a time of crisis, and permit the economy to be manipulated by self-appointed conservators. For we learned that when business is left to its own devices, it boosts prices—profits, wages, production, inventories, and even patriotism to the contrary notwithstanding.

In the second place we learned to our bitter regret that when we finally did devise certain price controls, it was too late. The damage had been done long before they were in effective operation.

And we learned another lesson. We learned that price controls based upon the idea of "business self-regulation" in the sense of self-regulation through the devices of trade associations and the like, are deceptive and misleading. They are not controls—but simply another form of the illusion that a man is the best judge of his own case.

We learned by trial and error; and we made many mistakes—mistakes, however, which we shall not repeat again.

But the pessimists who say that we never learn by experience have some evidence at their side. Since the outbreak of the European war, there occurred sharp price increases which, in my opinion, can be explained only on the hypothesis of ignorant speculation or downright profiteering.

Buyers and bidders who were not seeking goods for their own use, flooded the markets with orders for the sole purpose of obtaining goods for resale at a higher price. Without stopping to analyze the basic differences between 1914 and 1939; without pausing to consider where new buyers were coming from or how goods accumulating on the shelves would be paid for; and ignoring, as if it were a casual thing, the repercussions on the Nation as a whole, they bought, stupidly and blindly, but they bought.

They bought so much so fast that in 1 week, to take a single example, the price of sugar jumped 34 percent. Was there a shortage of sugar? There was not. Was there an increase in the consumption of sugar? There was not. Was there ever a reasonable possibility, a suspicion, that the sources of supply would be closed or inadequate? There was not. Nevertheless, the price of sugar jumped 34 percent.

Despite large existing sources and supplies of sugar, the poignant memories of wartime shortages and high prices proved too much—professional traders and housewives alike succumbed to the dread epidemic of panic buying.

Wholesale food prices have gone up 18 percent; cotton goods, 12 percent; woolen and worsted goods over 21 percent. On the average, wholesale prices have gone up about 5 percent. Should this rate continue for a full year, wholesale prices would be more than 30 percent above the August level.

Prices at retail have also taken a rise as you all know. On the average the increase has probably been of about the same magnitude as the wholesale price rise. But for many commodities, advances have been marked. In 12 typical cities scattered over the Nation the retail price of butter showed increases as much as 19 percent; of flour as much as 28 percent; and lard, essentially a meat-packing byproduct, as much as 35 percent.

Certain of our businessmen, as well as our consumers, had apparently forgotten (1) that the increase in exports late in 1914 was due largely to the fortuitous circumstances that European crop yields during that year were poor; (2) that industrial activity in the United States did not turn up until well into 1915; and (3) that the upward sweep of commodity prices did not begin until the latter part of 1915. And not content with disregarding the experiences of the last war, they distorted its lessons by telescoping the developments of 18 months into a period of a few weeks.

If commodity speculation continues long, it leads not only to higher prices for the products you buy, but also piles up burdens of indebtedness. Temporary profits on inventories are capitalized, securities are issued, and property is passed from hands to hands. But when the boom breaks, as it must, the country finds that it has added nothing to its means of production and must bear the heavy weight of ever-growing debt.

Unless the inventories now being accumulated are matched by increased purchasing we shall experience the same inevitable consequences as we did in 1937. In fact, many expert observers are of the opinion that a recession is in store for the winter of 1940.

That profit seekers and price boosters have not changed their habits since 1916 is shown by the 1936–37 experience. Opportunities for high profits were available through an expansion of output, but business—particularly big business—was not willing to make them in the way best suited for the Nation as a whole. Instead, prices were boosted, so that the inevitable result was the sharpest industrial decline on record.

Today we find many examples of the same type of greed. Within the last 2 months the price of cylinder oil has risen 68 percent, while the price of crude oil, from which it is made, has mounted only 11 percent; the price of zinc has, for no logical reason, gone up 34 percent; copper has risen 20 percent; and oleo oil has advanced 43 percent. These commodities are all produced domestically in adequate quantities for domestic needs.

I want to give a concrete illustration of the boom and aftermath aspects of the current situation. Cotton textiles is as good as any. The price of raw cotton to mills has been little affected by the European war. In fact, it is lower today than during the summer months. Yet cotton-textile prices are up 23.3 percent, and the mill margin is 50.6 percent higher. There can be little question but that profits have increased. At the same time inventories have piled up, as is indicated by the recent report that print-cloth sales were estimated at only 50 to 60 percent of current production. Certainly prices have not been set so as to permit high levels of consumption. The law of supply and demand is being applied by mills to net them a speculative profit on the inventories now being accumulated. Unless someone here or abroad comes along to buy up those inventories, sooner or later there will be a slump, and a serious one, in cotton textiles. Until then the consumer pays—as he always does—by higher prices.

Inventory speculation is one danger; but another, and perhaps more serious danger, lies in the field of administered prices. I state it as a fact that there exist areas in our economy where prices are privately set and privately controlled with little or no regard to market demand and supply—areas in which the impersonal controls of a competitive economy are inoperative. For the moment I'm not interested in the mechanics of private price control or the legality of private price control—these problems are now being investigated by the Temporary National Economic Committee, which begins its study of the steel industry next week. But I am deeply concerned by the fact that it is in these industries, too, that prices frequently shoot up at the first sign of increased demand, regardless of the fact that the particular industries are operating below capacity.

Think of it: at a time when increases in the rate of operation are lowering unit costs and increasing profits many times over, the costs of living are further increased by deliberately planned increases in prices. In time of peace, these monopolistic price practices are at best dangerous, and lead to recurrent depressions; but in times of emergency, they constitute a menace to the safety and well-being of the nation which may not be tolerated.

There are those who seek to justify such increases on the ground that business today has a right to profits that otherwise would be deemed inordinate in order to make up for the lean years of the past; that business has a right to exorbitant charges in order to raise the average of profits over the years.

The argument, however, is suspiciously one-sided.

Will business also concede that labor is entitled to a fourfold or higher return as compensation for years of part-time employment and depressed wage rates? Will business agree that farmers are entitled to double or triple prices for livestock and dairy products and produce, because there were times when crops were left to rot in the field and livestock was slaughtered to avoid the effects of increased supply?

By no means. Nor do the farmers or laborers make any such suicidal demands. Reasonable wages and reasonable prices are all that they ask. And reasonable returns, based upon existing conditions, are all that any businessman can expect.

I say with emphasis that the consumers of this Nation will not guarantee the profits of business or insure business against its losses. And any attempt to exact such a guaranty by hold-up prices will be met by measures as stringent and severe as any that a long memory of wartime conditions will recall. Business banditry of this kind will not be endured. We will not soon forget that during the war profits after taxes were 225 percent of the pre-war figure.

Consumers already are demanding that something be done. Hundreds of complaints are pouring into Federal agencies from consumers all over the country. They are demanding not only that measures be taken to prevent further boosts but also, and more emphatically, that reductions be brought about.

To combat profiteering on the part of producers, consumers as private individuals have only two methods which they can adopt to prevent not only the decline in current purchasing power but also the drastic aftereffects of rising prices. First, they can refuse to buy from the worst offenders, and, second, they can attempt to match cost-of-living increases with wage increases. Both of these I recommend.

But in all candor I do not believe that prices can be kept within bounds by such limited weapons. After all, consumers' strikes have only a limited scope and wage increases are bound to be obtained only slowly if at all. For this reason I believe the chief reliance for preventing unwarranted increases in the cost of living must be upon the Government.

I do not like glib analyses in pat categories, particularly the kind which pose their dilemmas on the brutal balance of an "either" and an "or." But I affirm that the economic situation which confronts us today must be expressed in just those terms.

The "either," as I see it, is an intelligent price-and-purchasing policy on the part of business. The "or" is Government regulation in the best interests of consumers and producers. Business must either exercise its public powers in the public interest or government, in response to deep-rooted demand, will better serve those interests by management or regulation.

Nor is the Government today unprepared if the threat of price inflation should become real. The present situation, I hasten to reassure you, is far different from that in 1914.

Monetary and fiscal powers are already lodged in the Treasury, the Federal Reserve Board, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and the State Department. These provide almost complete means for the control of credit, internal and external.

The speculative exchanges are subject now to the supervision of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Commodity Exchange Administration.

Transportation, communication, and power rates and service are under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Power Commission, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Maritime Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, and the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

Housing and construction are deeply influenced by, if not dependent upon, the various lending and guaranty agencies—P. W. A., W. P. A., H. O. L. C., F. H. A., F. C. A., and others.

In the commodity field international movements may be largely regulated through the several import and export controls, the Maritime Act, and neutrality legislation.

Direct price mechanisms already exist for coal, oil, and farm products.

These, I know, may prove insufficient. And the moment that price inflation appears, if it does, Congress will not hesitate to act.

Data of price behavior and movements are already being gathered by the great departments of Government—Justice, Treasury, Commerce, and Labor, by the Federal Trade Commission, by the Federal Reserve Board, by the Bureau of Mines, and by others. Complete information will be available.

The President, moreover, has asked the Temporary National Economic Committee to be watchful of prices and undue price rises. Extraordinary increases by particular industries will be met by Government subpenas and public hearings.

If excessive profits threaten the balance of the economy, excess-profits taxes will be imposed with a speed that will belie the traditional languor of the democratic process.

If antitrust laws are being violated, prosecutions will follow with a vehemence spurred by the existence of an emergency.

If literal compliance with the clumsy prohibitions of the Sherman law still leaves room, as it well may, for dangerous antisocial activity, the full light of Government investigations and publicity will be turned on, at once, without hesitation. For there is no force stronger in a democracy—this democracy—than the power of an enlightened public opinion. If there is profiteering this Nation of consumers will know where the guilt must be placed.

If the Government's own procurement program is hamstrung by unwarranted pricing, the Government might well enter into production on a competitive basis for the products of which it has need. If the less direct controls fail to stem the flood of profiteering, the principle of the yardstick can be extended from power to other fields.

If bottlenecks appear in production, and there are complaints of inadequate resources, a system of priorities will be adopted, to direct the flow of raw materials to the industries where they are most needed.

And if chiseling and profiteering persist, a system of direct price control will be instituted either of particular strategic commodities in the raw material or semifabricated stages, or general price control throughout the various steps in production and distribution.

One thing is clear: That the Government will not—indeed cannot—stand by, unconcerned if price inflation and dislocations appear. For it is on the avoidance of these things that our welfare depends. Our national defense will be decimated by undue price rises. And from the point of view of our internal welfare, it is imperative that we meet our national shortages in essentials such as housing, transportation, medical equipment, services and supplies, power, and the other demands of a civilized nation.

Some there are who purport to disregard the possibility of peacetime regulation, on the ground that somehow, something in the Constitution guarantees their right to blackmail the Nation because of their strategic position in the economy. And the Supreme Court is looked to as the citadel which will affirm that right.

But cases are made on legislation already enacted—and the N. R. A. was law for 2 years before its validity was questioned by the Court. Moreover, I venture to suggest that a different court may take a different view of the power of the Government to govern. I cannot believe that the powers of the Congress of the United States—the only body to which the people may look for relief—are so circumscribed and so weak that it will be unable to protect the Nation against the most vicious and dangerous kind of internal attack—profiteering

I am told, however, the "business" is "property," and that the due-process clause forbids the Congress to regulate or take such property.

Let me answer this in the words of Mr. Justice Holmes, a name not unknown in Boston:

"Delusive exactness is a source of fallacy throughout the law. By calling a business 'property' you make it seem like land, and lead up to the conclusion that a statute cannot substantially cut down the advantages of ownership existing before the statute was passed. An established business no doubt may have pecuniary value and commonly is protected by law against various unjustified injuries. But you cannot give it definiteness of contour by calling it a thing. It is a course of conduct and, like other conduct, is subject to substantial modification according to time and circumstances both in itself and in regard to what shall justify doing it a harm" (Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U. S. 312, 342–343 (1921)).

And here, too, I find Mr. Justice Brandeis concurring: "We must not forget," he tells us in the words of Marshall, "that it is a Constitution we are expounding * * * this Court has repeatedly sustained the exercise of power by Congress, under the various clauses of that instrument, over objects of which the fathers could not have dreamed * * *. We have likewise held that general limitations on the power of government, like those embodied in the due-process clauses of the fifth and fourteenth amendments, do not forbid the United States or the States from meeting modern conditions by regulations which 'a century ago, or even a half a century ago, probably would have been rejected as arbitrary and oppressive.' * * * Clauses guaranteeing to the individual protection against specific abuses of power must have a similar capacity of adaptation to a changing world" (Olmstead v. United States, 277 U. S. 438, 472 (1928)).

I note with satisfaction that the Holmes-Brandeis tradition has not been ended on the Supreme Court. Indeed, it has just begun.

Letter to Members of House Appropriations Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

LETTER BY HON. JERRY VOORHIS OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, as I stated on the first day of this session, it is my earnest conviction that something should be done toward the repeal of the 18-month provision contained in the Relief Appropriation Act of 1939, which was passed by the Congress.

It seems to me that since we have experienced a sharp increase in the cost of living, an adjustment should be made also in the "security wage" to make it more in accord with the rising cost of living.

I am, therefore, asking permission to include with my remarks the following letter to the Honorable EDWARD T. TAYLOR, chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, copy of which was sent to all members of that committee, asking their earnest consideration of proposals which seek to bring about adjustments in the Relief Appropriation Act immediately after the passage of the neutrality bill.

OCTOBER 26, 1939.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TAYLOR: When the House passed the Relief Appropriation Act for 1939 last spring, it contained one provision against which there were most serious objections. This was the provision requiring that anyone who had been employed by the W. P. A. for 18 months must thereafter be summarily dismissed for a period of 30 days.

I realize that there was nothing in the law to prevent the reemployment of these people at the end of that time. As a practical matter, however, in view of the large number of people certified and in need of employment in certain areas, the 30-day lay-offs have actually turned out to be permanent dismissals. Furthermore, the people who have suffered from this provision have, I am certain, not been people who were unwilling to try to find jobs in private industry or so-called "chiselers." Rather, they have been women employed on sewing projects, attempting to support their children, and older men who have passed the age where industry will offer them employment. For these two groups, W. P. A. is more important perhaps than for any other group in the country.

I have received a very large number of communications, not only from my own district, but from all over the Nation, pointing out the difficulties to which this provision has led and expressing the earnest hope that it could be modified. In Southern California, there have been a great many protests from sponsors of projects to the effect that persons in very great need of W. P. A. employment, who were competent to perform the work of given projects, have been laid off and other persons absolutely unqualified placed in key positions out of necessity due to this requirement of law. The result has been not only great suffering on the part of individuals and their families, but also a decided reduction in the effectiveness of the W. P. A. program itself.

I believe I am not the only one who has introduced bills to change this provision. I believe also that a very large number of Members of Congress, even among those who voted in favor of this provision originally, would be very glad if it could be eliminated. I can see no good reason why action should not be taken on this matter at once.

In addition to this, we find that all people in the Nation are up against the problem of a sharply increased cost of living. The price of foodstuffs in particular has sharply increased. Since the W. P. A. wage is supposed to be a "security wage," it seems to me that some adjustment of this wage in accordance with the rising cost of living would be entirely necessary and proper at this time.

Of course, we all hope that the time will come when the fundamental solution for unemployment will be worked out and put into effect. Until that time comes, however, I think it is evidently true that the strength of our democracy depends in large measure upon the provision in the best and most effective way at our command for keeping people who would otherwise be compelled to subsist upon some form of dole busy at constructive work.

I am writing to ask most earnestly if the Appropriations Commitee would not be willing to consider these matters immediately after the conclusion of the vote on the neutrality measure.

Sincerely yours,

JERRY VOORHIS.

Dies Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT OF OCTOBER 26, 1939, AND ARTICLE BY JAY FRANKLIN FROM THE WASHINGTON EVENING STAR

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein an editorial and an article by Jay Franklin. The editorial is from the Boston Evening Transcript of October 26, 1939, and the Franklin article is from the Washington Evening Star. I commend their reading to the Members of Congress and to the readers of the RECORD as indicative of common-sense views on the publication of a mailing list of a left-wing organization and the consequent harm and injustice visited upon innocent people.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that by the same logic and by analogy, it can be charged that every Member of Congress belongs to the Silver Shirts because we are on the mailing list of Mr. Pelley's magazine Liberation, published at Asheville, N. C., and the official organ of his pro-Nazi and Jew-baiting organization. We are likewise all affiliated with Father Coughlin because we are on his mailing list, and there is regularly sent to us issues of the weekly magazine Social Justice through the columns of which one may be regaled by startling and mysterious stories about Jew mendacities, international bankers contemplating the destruction of mankind in their own interests, "red" Communists with and without beards and with and without bombs in either hand, lurking under every bed or office desk.

So, Mr. Speaker, if one is to be adjudged guilty of complete subservience to and membership in an organization by the fact that his name has been placed upon the mailing list of such organization, I very much fear that the Members of the Congress are lost to all patriotism and hope of salvation. It is a crisis which must give us all pause. Let us take drastic steps now to anticipate the dread future which impends with all of these "reds" running around loose, all plotting dire things against the whites! It amazes me that the membership of this body is so complacent and contains men who are still able to show a sense of humor and crack jokes occasionally, and who manage somehow to heed Caesar's plea in the Shakespeare's Julius Caesar:

> Let me have men about me that are fat;
> Sleek-headed men, and such as sleep o' nights.

So, accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I submit these two editorials in the interests of general enlightenment. They are fair samples of many others which might be placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as an indication of a viewpoint entertained by writers throughout this country. No one can accuse the Boston Evening Transcript of being a Communist-front newspaper. As for me, Mr. Speaker, I am most delighted that the President of the United States and his charming and talented wife have each individually expressed their disagreement with the publication of the mailing list of the Washington, D. C., branch of the American League for Peace and Democracy in no uncertain terms.

The articles are as follows:

[From the Boston Evening Transcript]

SUICIDAL POLICIES

The Dies committee in one action may have torn down much of the respect and support it had been building up for its work during its second series of hearings. When it published the names of 536 Government employees yesterday on the grounds that they were either members or on the mailing list of the allegedly Communist-dominated American League for Peace and Democracy, it has unquestionably revived most of the charges that were first made against it.

During the first year of its hearings this committee was charged with fomenting "red" scares, with striving to embarrass the Roosevelt administration, and particularly with endeavoring to smear the National Labor Relations Board and thus to fortify a resurgent open-shop drive. When the committee buckled down to its second session it seemed that it would give the lie to most of these accusations. Its procedure was improved; it had added a liberal member, it balanced its investigations better as between Communist and Fascist groups, and it had abandoned its policy of providing anyone with names to call with a national rostrum.

But its latest action must make its recent converts draw back. Mr. DIES has admitted that all members of the League for Peace and Democracy are not Communist. Yet he knows that the odor of radicalism will stick to those whom he names. Moreover, he has presumably released the names of those who were merely on the mailing list and whose contact with the league may have been merely the donation of funds to the Spanish Republic.

Special suspicion will be aroused, in view of earlier charges against the Dies committee, by the inclusion of Edwin S. Smith's name. Mr. Smith is one of the more vigorous members of the National Labor Relations Board, presiding over the act which DIES has been accused of wanting to impair and weaken. One must wonder what good reason can possibly be accomplished by the publication of these names.

The spontaneous anger of Representative DEMPSEY, one of the committee's own members, and his denunciation of the action as a smear campaign furnishes further doubt of the committee's wisdom in this instance.

The publication of these names followed another rash outburst from the Dies committee, this time exclusively from its chairman, Mr. DIES. The indictment of Earl Browder, American Communist leader, apparently went to his head, for he promptly proclaimed that:

"There isn't a leader of any of these organizations (Fascist or Communist) who hasn't violated some penal law." He said there was ample evidence to prove this.

Well, if that is so, there seems slight need for continuing the Dies committee. We doubt, however, if Mr. DIES wants to end his work now.

With the outbreak of the European war, there was special need to walk quietly and to speak calmly. It is easy to convert the tense and hysterical emotions of wartime into witch hunts and "red" scares. The "red" hunt conducted by A. Mitchell Palmer at the close of the World War swept this Nation with such winds of intolerance that the Bill of Rights was all but uprooted. It would be easy, with rumors of espionage and sabotage rife, to whip up those same winds today.

All in all, we think the Dies committee has some fence mending to do if it is to continue its potentially useful work.

[From the Washington Evening Star, October 27, 1939]

WE, THE PEOPLE—WATCH YOUR STEP BROTHER ELK, YOURS MAY BE A COMMUNIST GROUP FRONT

(By Jay Franklin)

After consulting the precepts of the political bible, I am seriously considering having my Phi Beta Kappa key beaten into an ornamental gold toothpick for presentation to Representative MARTIN L. DIES, of Texas. For I have no desire to find myself in jail because I left my car parked eight inches from the curb.

Here's how it works. Mr. DIES has just made public a long list of Government employees who were members of the League for Peace and Democracy. It used to be the League Against War and Fascism, but changed its name when it seemed likely that there might be a war against fascism. Now it seems that some American Communists were members of the League for Peace and Democracy, so Mr. DIES announces that it is a Communist "front" organization and singles out its members in Government service for the uneasy honor of publication—as though a desire to prevent war and preserve democracy were an "un-American activity." And at the same time Mr. Earl Browder, a native-born Kansas boy who ran for President on the ticket of an American political party in '36, is arrested for being leader of the Communist Party. Sure, the charge is some monkey business with passports but everybody knows that he was arrested because he was a Communist leader, just as everybody knows that Mr. Fritz Kuhn was arrested for being the leader of the German-American Bund and not because Mr. Thomas E. Dewey [and not the bund members] believed that he had embezzled the bund's funds.

PHI BETA KAPPA—SH-H

So I am worried about my membership in Phi Beta Kappa. It is entirely possible that I have been misled in assuming that my possession of the little gold key is the reward for getting a flock of "A's" at Yale twenty-odd years ago. It is possible that the society's proclaimed belief—that "love of wisdom is the guiding power of life"—is a front for the Illuminati, the Jacobins, the Know-Nothings, or the Elders of Zion. After all, the letters "Phi Beta Kappa" are Greek and Greeks are foreigners, aren't they? And foreigners are aliens and aliens are suspects and suspects are agitators and agitators are "reds" and "reds" are Communists.

For that matter, how can I feel whether some of these desperate members of the League for Peace and Democracy are not also members of Phi Beta Kappa? They might be. Wheels within wheels, and the red star of Moscow dangling in masquerade on my unsuspecting abdomen all these years. Why not? If there are Communists in the League for Peace and Democracy that make the league a Communist "front," and if members of that "front" are also members of Phi Beta Kappa, that makes Phi Beta Kappa another Communist "front." And that makes me a Communist. Q. E. D.

PRACTICALLY IN JAIL

So I am worried. For if I am a Communist, as defined by Mr. MARTIN L. DIES, of Texas, in his efforts to perpetuate his House Committee on Un-American Activities, then I am exposed to the rigors of the law which punishes gangsters for rum running by sending them to prison on income-tax charges; that punishes Kuhn for leading the bund by charging him with the theft of his own organization's money; that lacks the courage to arrest Earl Browder for being a Communist—which is entirely legal—but indicts him because of what he allegedly did with his passport application. If it is to be open season on me, I am vulnerable on a thousand fronts. Sometimes I cross a street before the lights change. Sometimes I park overtime. I don't always pay my bills on time. Perhaps my chimney smokes; perhaps my income-tax return was not precise to the last decimal point. Perhaps I have been lacking in respect for some of our elected officials.

The rest of you can take your chances—Elks, Red Men, C. I. O., Masons, Knights of Columbus, Ladies' Aid Society, Father Mathew

Society, and Epworth League. But I'm worried. I think I stood near a Communist in the New York subway last winter and, since communism is the scarlet fever of congressional politics, I may have contracted the "red" rash without even knowing that I had accidentally become un-American.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILL M. WHITTINGTON
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, the most satisfactory neutrality legislation is based on international law. I have thought about neutrality from every angle. The causes of all wars are different. The nations of Europe are armed camps; armaments inevitably make for war. Every country should be free to deal with the crisis resulting from each war as it arises.

My whole thought with respect to neutrality is to promote the interests of the United States and to keep the United States out of war. There is much misunderstanding in the country and there have been many loose and unsound statements made on the floors of Congress respecting neutrality. The United States should continue its policy of good neighbor among the nations of the world. We accord to other nations the form of government under which they desire to live. At the same time we assert our right to maintain the form of government under which we live. Other nations are entitled to their forms of government and to foster their political ideals and ideologies so long as their attitude does not undermine American ideals.

We stand for freedom in religion and in government. We believe in the right to worship God according to the dictates of our own conscience. We stand for freedom of the press. We accord to other nations similar rights, but we oppose all efforts to undermine the freedom for which we stand. It has been asserted that if we retain the existing embargo, England and France will stop the war. The implication is that England and France are responsible for the war. Who started this war? If England had not supported Poland, the world would have had no respect for the British Empire. Whatever may be the ideologies of Great Britain and Europe, the world knows that Neville Chamberlain, Prime Minister of Great Britain, did his dead-level best to prevent war. The world knows today that Hitler started the war and that only Hitler can stop it.

Again there has been loud denunciation of communism, nazi-ism, and fascism. These ideologies are repugnant to me. I cannot understand a denunciation in one breath and an advocacy of measures that promote these policies in another. Existing arms-embargo legislation discriminates against Great Britain and France and favors Germany, Italy, and Russia.

DELUSION

It is a tragic delusion to say that the sale and transportation of munitions involved the United States in the World War. It is equally tragic to say that the repeal of the embargo will involve the United States in the present war. Only 13 percent of our total war exports to the Allies in the 30 months immediately preceding 1917 were of munitions, while 87 percent were of other commodities. Again, the one thing that got us in the World War was the destruction of American lives and American ships by German submarines. Not one of the ships sunk by the German submarines carried munitions. All of the loose and extravagant arguments in behalf of retaining the arms embargo to keep us out of war are based upon foundations that are false and upon a tragic delusion.

In the light of the World War it is clear that the only danger of our involvement lies in the fact that our ships under the existing law are free to traverse the seas with cargo for belligerents. Keeping American ships out of combat areas is the key to the peace of the United States. It is time for the Congress of the United States to consider the question from a national viewpoint. As individuals we are entitled to our sympathies and religious views, but as Representatives we act for the people of the United States in passing legislation with respect to our relations with other nations.

CASH AND CARRY

All concede that our neutrality legislation should be amended. The so-called cash-and-carry provision expired by the passing of time on May 1, 1939.

OBJECTIVES

The Senate bill is preferable to the House bill, which I sought to amend and which I supported. The pending legislation has two aims: The repeal of the present Arms Embargo Act and a comprehensive program regulating our commerce. It strengthens the cash-and-carry provision of existing law and it regulates the commerce of the United States with belligerent nations. These are the two objectives.

Under existing law American citizens and American vessels may enter war zones and may also enter the ports of belligerent nations. Under the Arms Embargo Act, arms, munitions, and implements of war cannot be sold to belligerents, but their ingredients and constituents can be sold. Cannons and airplanes cannot be sold, but scrap iron, gas, oil, corn, cotton, and wheat can be sold, and under existing law they can be delivered in American vessels.

THE PURPOSE

The purpose of the Senate bill is to strengthen existing neutrality legislation all along the line. It provides for the passing of title before shipment to any and all property that may be sold to belligerents. It thus eliminates the cause of involvement of the United States with any belligerent. American vessels are prevented from carrying on any kind of trade with belligerents. American citizens cannot travel on any vessel of a belligerent. It prohibits the arming of any American vessel in combat areas. It prohibits credit to belligerents. It strengthens existing law against making loans to belligerent nations. It provides that all commodities leaving the United States shall be paid for before they leave the port and that they shall be carried in foreign vessels.

MUNITIONS SOLD IN PEACE BUT NOT IN WAR

Under existing law arms, munitions, and implements of war may be sold in peace but not in war. Nations may buy to prepare for war. They may buy for offense but not for defense.

There is no inhibition against the sale of gas, oil, and scrap iron, and the raw materials that are used in the manufacture of munitions. Nations that are pursuing the path of peace are thus discriminated against by their inability to buy munitions when they are attacked and war is declared against them.

INTERNATIONAL LAW

Under international law the sale of arms, munitions, and implements of war is allowed. A mistake was made by adopting an arms embargo in the years 1935, 1936, and 1937, just as a mistake was made during the administration of Thomas Jefferson in adopting an embargo on commodities in 1807, which was repealed in less than 2 years. In repealing the Arms Embargo Act the United States is thus returning to the policy that has been pursued since the Republic was founded except for a period of the past 4 years. All concede that the regulation of the sale and transportation is for the Nation to deal with as a domestic problem. The pending bill places safeguards on the sale and transportation of arms and ammunition as well as commodities. In fact, to keep out of war we are waiving and sacrificing our rights and our freedom on the high seas. The United States is within its rights under general or international law in safeguarding the Nation and protecting the United States from becoming involved in war.

PEACEFUL NATIONS

The smaller and peaceful countries of the world have depended upon international law to purchase munitions when war is forced upon them. The small and peaceful countries are therefore helpless unless they can enjoy this privilege. I assert the United States cannot remain neutral as long as the arms embargo remains on the statute books.

PARTIALITY

It has been stated by the advocates of the Arms Embargo Act that to sell arms, munitions, and implements of war to belligerents is to encourage mass murder. What about their sale in peacetime to be stored for use in war? Again, raw materials such as cotton and scrap iron can be used to manufacture bombs that will be used to destroy innocent populations, and they can be sold to belligerents.

UNNEUTRAL ATTITUDE

It has been strenuously asserted that to repeal the Arms Embargo Act would aid Great Britain and France and discriminate against Germany.

Germany found fault with the United States before the war. Germany will seize on any pretext. It will be impossible to please Germany. The fact is that the existing embargo contributes to the plans of Germany and her associates. The purpose of the repeal is not so much to aid England and France as it is not to give aid and comfort to Germany. If we are not willing to aid England and France in the war, we should not be willing to aid Germany. Russia is not at war. Italy is not at war. Yet, under the existing law, arms, munitions, and implements of war may be sold to Russia and Italy. It is true that there is an inhibition against the sale or reshipment to a belligerent. However, there is no reason why Italy cannot use the arms and munitions made in the United States and sell their manufactures in Italy to Germany. There is no reason why Russia cannot follow the same policy. Existing embargo operates in favor of Germany and against Great Britain and France. The provisions against export and reshipments may be violated, but if not violated they can be avoided.

If the embargo is not repealed, England and France have no authority to obstruct the shipments of implements of war to Italy or Russia. The arms embargo operates in favor of the nations that are bent on war and against the nations that have stood for peace.

Something is said about offensive and defensive weapons. The United States manufactures both. One will kill as quickly as the other.

CRITICISM OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE

It does no good to criticize the Government of England and France. All have made mistakes. So has the Government of the United States. If England has extended its empire, the United States has extended its domain. The one desire of the people of the United States is peace with all nations.

REPEAL NOT UNNEUTRAL

Under international law, in her own interests, the United States may repeal the embargo. Such was the policy during the administration of Thomas Jefferson. Such was the policy during the Ethiopian and Spanish conflicts, when the embargo was enacted. Moreover, the House had passed a partial repeal of the embargo before the present European war broke. The President of the United States announced that if war occurred in Europe, the Congress would be convened in extraordinary session to amend existing neutrality laws.

Warring nations have always been permitted to buy, and neutral nations have enjoyed the right to sell munitions. Belligerents have the right of blockade. Neutral nations today, under international law, can sell arms, munitions, and implements of war with the sole exception of the United States. But it is said that some nations have adopted an embargo on arms. These nations are small and are in the war area. Ours is the largest and greatest nation in all the world. I favor the policy pursued by Washington, Lincoln, and Wilson.

Again it is said that if we repeal the Embargo Act, warring nations will sink our ships. Denmark is a neutral country, but only recently one of her ships carrying a cargo of butter was sunk. Sweden is a neutral, and yet but a short time ago a Swedish ship carrying wood pulp was sunk. The arms embargo does not offer any assurance of peace. It only discriminates; it makes for war.

It will be difficult for the United States to stay out of the European war. We tried to stay out of the Napoleonic wars and finally we fought the War of 1812. We tried to stay out of the World War, and finally we were engaged in the greatest of all wars. The United States should remain neutral in deed and in truth. Congress should repeal legislation that is in favor of one belligerent and discriminates against the other. The Embargo Act should, therefore, be repealed.

We do not plan to lend money to England or France. We do not plan to engage our country in war. We do not plan to send our sons across the sea to fight another war.

LESSON

We have learned our lesson. Twenty-two years ago we determined to make a European war our own. We spent money without limit. We gave the flower of our young manhood. We sent battleships to Europe. We sent volunteers, and that not being enough, we conscripted and sent over there shipload after shipload until 2,000,000 of our men stood upon French soil. We spent $40,000,000,000 or more, and when we asked for the payment of our war debts when Europe was beginning to prepare for the present war, we were called Shylocks. The people are determined to keep out of European wars that have been raging intermittently for a thousand years. We stand for America first and America always.

The repeal of the arms embargo with the safeguard embodied in the pending Senate bill should contribute toward the neutrality of this country. The welfare of the human race demands that the United States remain at peace. We must make sacrifices to salvage civilization following the European war.

British Propaganda in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

ARTICLE BY PORTER SARGENT

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Porter Sargent on propaganda.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITISH PROPAGANDA IN THE UNITED STATES—THE EFFECTIVE MACHINE THAT GOT US INTO THE LAST WAR IS BEING OILED FOR NOISELESS ACTION AGAIN

(By Porter Sargent)

England in the last war was able to marshal the nations and the resources of the world against the Germans. No such widespread cooperation can be counted on today. The aid of the United States, then, is even more vital. Not only must Germany be smashed but the traditional enemy Russia and the menace of communism must be eliminated if British Empire and trade are not to vanish.

To bring us into the last war Britain put her best brains into her propaganda efforts. Now for 3 years an improved technique under skilled and trained propagandists has been working on us. The most essential feature of the propaganda is to keep it concealed, to deny that it exists. Such denials come chiefly from the mouths of American stooges and Anglophiles. To detect, to uncover, and to attract the attention of Americans to this subtle under-cover propaganda is a difficult and ungrateful task, but the most needed.

The clumsy Germans make no bones at all of claiming the unprepossessing Goebbels a propaganda genius—and in his noisy broadcasts it is perfectly apparent that he agrees with that view. As 25 years ago, with the coming of the new war the British set up a "Ministry of Information," whose improvised propaganda machinery under Lord Macmillan clanks so noisily it has become a matter of ridicule. But behind it the Foreign Office and its associated intelligence services with subtle political sense have perfected a miraculously smooth working organization under their No. 1 propagandist, Sir Robert Vansittart.

The British Empire was the conception of Disraeli. Flattering Victoria as Empress of India, he managed her skillfully. But England's politician statesmen continued to deride his imperialistic bombast. It wasn't till the eighties that the English were really sold on the empire idea. Kipling was one of the most successful in building up the idea that the islanders carried the "white man's burden." The vilified and "filthy Boers" gave them pause. But until long after Victoria's jubilee the Empire rode high, unchallenged, with a world-be-damned attitude, its only fear the Russian "bear that walked like a man."

Not until Germany grew in strength so as to threaten British trade and necessitate her being set back, did it become necessary to establish propaganda agencies. Clumsily organized at first during the war, before the end they had developed a far-reaching organization and a technique that changed the views and opinions of all the peoples it reached. Such measures as had been taken before the war to educate the British people, the people of the colonies, or the foreign neutrals, were still truthful. Nicolson in his Diplomacy tells us it wasn't till the war was on that it became necessary to tell lies. And today the one lie most successfully put forth by the propagandists in England and America has been that there is no British propaganda organization.

The key men of England who, behind the scenes, are now playing an important part in Britain's imperialistic adventures are referred to in England as "Lord Milner's Kindergarten."

"Milner's young men," the builders of empire, most of them Oxonians, were brought together and trained by Lord Milner, who was British High Commissioner in South Africa after the Boer War.

The core of the group was Fellows of All Souls, a nonteaching college, practically an exclusive imperialistic club of aristocrats. There were Geoffrey Dawson, then known as Robinson, now editor of the London Times, who was for a time one of Lord Milner's private secretaries; and Robert Brand, who with Philip Kerr (now Lord Lothian) reorganized the South African railways, but later went into the "City" and became a banker.

Lionel Curtis was regarded as the intellectual leader of this group. He acted as town clerk of Johannesburg, and later was one of the founders of the Royal Institute of International Affairs at Chatham House, of which he was honorary secretary from its inception in 1921 until 1929, and in which he is still active. Chairman of its council is Lord Astor of Cliveden.

Closely associated with Cecil Rhodes in the building of his South African empire, Lord Milner, founder in 1902 of the "kindergarten," acted as the Government representative for Rhodes. Lord Lothian has been secretary of the Rhodes Trust since 1925. It is natural then that Rhodes scholarships would eventually effect the union of the Anglo-Saxon nations and bring the erring colonies back under the crown.

LOTHIAN, BRITISH AMBASSADOR

"As Ambassador, it will be Lord Lothian's duty to win new friends for Great Britain in the United States, and to do all that he legitimately can, under accepted diplomatic proprieties, to swing American public opinion to Britain's cause," the Boston Transcript recognizes in an editorial, September 9, 1939. "There will be ever-increasing pressure, as in 1914, to bring the United States into the European conflict * * *. The pressure will come from within and without—from Americans who believe that the United States should again send an army overseas 'to make the world safe for democracy,' and from propaganda agents of the British and French Governments."

As early as May 7, 1939, before the date of Lothian's arrival was announced, Henry Ehrlich, Washington correspondent of the Boston Herald, anticipated: "He is coming here to identify American interest with the British, and there has been no secret about it."

Lothian comes to mop up after royalty and to ingratiate himself. "On the inside," Paul Mallon tells us, "they say the new British Ambassador, Lord Lothian, was instructed only by his Government to 'do anything the Americans like.'"

After his immediate 1½-hour conference with Roosevelt, the President's policy became more ingratiating. For England's No. 2 propagandist is a man of great adaptability, with "an unexcelled record of enthusiastic bandwagon-jumping," as Time, September 11, 1939, puts it. Sharer of Tory hatred of the Russian "reds," he recognized after his trip to Russia that "the existence of the Russian experiment has raised an issue which more and more will have to be faced by western civilization * * * the divine right of property." After visting Hitler in 1935 he reported, "I believe he is sincere," and in 1938 addressing the Royal Institute during the Austrian crisis explained that Hitler "has at last realized the dream of the German people * * * to be a united people. * * * Up to the present Hitler's objective has been justifiable."

The Chamberlain appeasement policy, Willson Woodside wrote in Harpers, December 1938, "is perceptibly shaping itself in accordance with ideas enunciated by Lothian * * * who, as Lloyd George's private secretary and alter ego, carried the Foreign Office round in his attaché case for 2 or 3 years after the war."

Lothian visited Germany immediately after Hitler's accession to power and is said to have played an important part in arranging the British loan to Hitler, of £750,000 in the spring of 1934. He played his part in getting the Tories to accept Hitler as their best defense against the "reds." In an address before the Boston Chamber of Commerce he once remarked, "No country can exist half-capitalist and half-Communist. It is one or the other."

In the series of articles he wrote for the London Observer, Lothian warned that, "If American sentiment became persuaded that the United States was being maneuvered into commitment to war by foreign intrigue or for reasons of politics or finance, it might equally swing back violently to the ultra-isolationism of the Ludlow amendment, requiring a referendum before the United States entered a war."

He shows an intimate understanding of the American attitude and reveals a clear conception of what must be done to bend it to British ends.

After 16 trips to this country Lothian found overwhelming sentiment that France and Britain should be assisted "to buy in the United States all the armaments they need." As for the President, "there is no doubt whatever where his own sympathies lie * * * that it is morally impossible for the United States to ignore the issue which is arising." He found even Hoover, who opposes war, admitting that 7 out of 10 Americans would say that if there is a world war, there is no possible means whereby the United States could keep out. This is told with all complacency, as evidence of the effectiveness of British propaganda.

It is not merely that England Expects—but that it subtly and effectively aids—Every American to Do His Duty. Quincy Howe, in his recent book by that title, explains just how the agencies of British propaganda have functioned in America during the past dozen years. The English Speaking Union is the "spearhead of England's cultural drive on the United States." Interlocking with it is the League of Nations Association, and to some extent the Foreign Policy Association, on the board of whose quarterly organ, Foreign Affairs, sit many members of the union. Howe follows the "British network" into the House of Morgan, which "found it impossible to be neutral;" into the Du Pont empire, associated with Lord McGowan's I. C. I., and into Pan American Airways. Through common directors he sees our radio featuring, as indeed it is now doing, pro-British broadcasters. Publishers and newspapers from the Anglophile New York Times down begin to fall in line behind the pronouncement of Richard H. Waldo, head of the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, who with delightful frankness admitted that "Perhaps the American Revolution and the War between the States were merely growing pains. * * * The whites must stand together. * * * Only the Anglo-Saxon people can provide the leadership, and only the British have the knowledge to make that leadership effective."

The parade these past 3 years of the wooden soldiers of the British army of propaganda through American drawing rooms, clubs, newspaper offices, over speakers' platforms, to the State Department and the White House, may have been wholly fortuitous. But to one who has closely watched the sequence, it would seem that some central intelligence must be at work. Pro-British speakers have been available without fee for every occasion. British authors, statesmen, and Anglophiles have been afforded opportunity to visit this country to address academic and civic bodies. We know from R. H. Bruce Lockhart (Guns and Butter) that such programs were planned for the Balkans by Sir Robert Vansittart.

If Vansittart did not play his part in this wave of advances upon us, then he certainly failed to do what was expected of him. He had been detached from other duties in order that he might coordinate all agencies and efforts and means of enlisting America in the next war. And he had been sedulously screened from public view that he might work unhampered by publicity.

It seemed innocent enough when John Buchan, Lord Tweedsmuir, was planted in Canada as Governor General. Buchan, "kindergartner," official chronicler of the war, apologist for the Government and the Empire, was director of information under the Prime Minister, 1917–18. Skilled, tactful, propagandist, he knows his job. But did Roosevelt know what his job was, when they exchanged visits and Roosevelt pledged allegiance and the blood and treasure of America to defend the Dominion? That was a safe and harmless boast. But it opened the way to more dangerous ventures.

Lothian was not here alone last fall. Lionel Curtis was here. Even Vansittart was here. Probably they met to compare notes and make further plans since carried out. Runciman, before he was sent to Czechoslovakia to prepare for Hitler, was sent to Washington to prepare our administration for what was to come to us.

English newspaper correspondents planted in Washington or metropolitan centers, like Sir Willmott Lewis of the London Times, or casual visitors like Sir Arthur Willert, former chief press officer of the British Foreign Office and former correspondent of the London Times, have skillfully presented views in their addresses or writings which have had their influence on public opinion.

THEN CAME ROYALTY

The more tactful approach of these men, skilled operators, has taken the place of the brusque bumptiousness of the majors and colonels who used to pop up in town halls and forums with their obviously pro-British sentiments. All these prepared the ground for royalty's advance agent, Anthony Eden, the white knight, who took innumerable pawns in the business world and the administration, opening the way for the Queen, who saved the King from being checkmated. Of course our gullible National Association of Manufacturers was led to invite and pay Eden, and the King and Queen condescended to make this side trip after their arduous conquest of Canada. England has always made us scramble for the opportunity to sacrifice ourselves and pay well for it.

Meantime, Americans in England were being "given the works," and Kennedy, our Ambassador, had come to heel of British tory influence and from half a dozen British and Scottish universities received honorary degrees. All this was on the highest social plane. C. S. Kent, business manager of the London Times, when he came for strictly business during February and March 1939, announced that his visits to the chief newspaper offices were merely social. Immediately following the headlines and lead paragraphs in our leading Anglophile newspapers became more strongly pro-British. In the next few weeks millions of Americans became convinced that war was inevitable, that we should have to go in. That was the purpose.

With the approach of war itself the really heavy propaganda tanks began to rumble. But quietly, almost unnoticed, Lord Beaverbrook, Max Aiken, formerly of Nova Scotia, arrived September 30 on "personal business" and soon the result of his "personal" influence was apparent in our daily press, in new organizations.

Those directing the campaign proved again that Lord Northcliffe was right. When in 1917 Northcliffe visited American newspaper publishers to intensify Sir Gilbert Parker's propaganda, he remarked, "They dress alike, they talk alike, they think alike * * *. What sheep!" And he may well have added, "It's an easy job we have here." It was in 1917—will it be in 1939?

America's Parlor Pinks Are Indignant

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS

OF NEW JERSEY

Thursday, November 2, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE BERGEN EVENING RECORD, HACKENSACK, N. J.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial appearing in the Bergen Evening Record, Hackensack, N. J., on October 30:

[From the Bergen Evening Record, Hackensack, N. J.]

AMERICA'S "PARLOR PINKS" ARE INDIGNANT

Congressman MARTIN DIES has incurred the anger of many groups by his sensational disclosures of the ramified organizations which are accused of working secretly to overthrow a form of government founded on the so-called capitalistic system in this priceless land which gives them free education, speech, press, assembly, and opportunity. It gives them also the right to publicly purge their political opponents with ballots in the time-tested American way. Just now his bitterest critics are certain leaders of the euphonious American League for Peace and Democracy, which succeeded the late lamented League Against War and Fascism.

Whether the new organization is honeycombed with subversive communism camouflaged by a front of "parlor pinks" and collegiate intelligentsia, we do not of our own knowledge know, but DIES and his committee seem to have gotten painfully under their collective skins. They protest vociferously the publication of a partial membership list, and challenge DIES to waive his congressional immunity to let them sue him for libel. We think they protest too much—that is, unless the company in which the collegiate "pinks" now find themselves is too crimson a blot on their lily-white escutcheons.

But why blame DIES? He didn't inveigle these members of the intelligentsia into joining an organization which witness after witness has sworn is merely a front for working Communists who take their orders direct from Moscow; and, if those witnesses lied, why all the bitter denunciation of DIES for publishing the roster of what purports to be an American patriotic organization? Surely, if the American League for Peace and Democracy is like Caesar's wife, its members ought to be proud to stand up and be identified by their American friends and neighbors.

But the suspicion grows that thousands of Americans of respectability and liberal tendencies have lent their names to organized euphemisms which cannot stand the careful scrutiny of their neighbors. Their errors have been mostly in their omission to properly investigate rather than in their commission to secretly effectuate the hidden purposes of the national organizers of such pseudo-patriotic organizations. Most of them never inquired about the antecedents of those organizers, how they lived, or who paid them for their work. American joiners seldom do. Too many of them listen to a plausible story of a short cut to an ephemeral human goal; they join, repeat a ritual, wave a figurative flag, and later often hold the bag.

Their legal right to do all this cannot be infringed, and that's the main reason why the land of the free is such a fertile field for the Nazis, Communists, or what have you. All of them—goosesteppers, amateur "pinks," and professionad "reds" alike—can thank their stars that tolerant America is a government of law, not of men. Were it otherwise, a figurative Mr. Dies instead of giving them a blast of publicity in a free press might give them a blast of gunfire in a dark cellar.

Admittedly our American elective, legislative, and juridical way to human rights and progress is tedious and slow, but it is infinitely cheaper and healthier for the ruled and the rulers alike. Ballots are much safer and more humane than bullets in the land where speech is free but where talk is often too cheap. Where the Russian "reds" and the German Nazis come from, the price of opposition talk is death or at least the concentration camp. These adopted citizens know all that, but our native-born parlor "pinks" have not yet had such revealing contacts with the ideologies of their preceptorial dreams. If they were compelled to spend 3 months in those lands of totalitarian slavery, they would jump the first ship back and kiss the soil of the free United States when they arrived.

Yes, they would then see the vast gulf that separates totalitarian enslavement and democratic freedom. In the one, opposition mouths are closed with regimented guns and bullets; in the other, opposition eyes are opened with untrammeled logic and reason. If that editorial conclusion may seem too harsh and terse, it might be well to remember that dictatorial death is even harsher and terser. A trip to Russia or Germany should convince the most rabid American "pink" or Nazi of the logic of that conclusion.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, in discussing the question of American Neutrality and the lifting of the embargo we are all united on one and the most important thing, and that is, a sincere and steadfast desire to keep America out of war. On that point there is no difference of opinion in this House, no partisanship, no compromise.

As to the means and the methods of preserving our neutrality and keeping out of the European war there are varying shades of opinion among the Members on both sides of the aisle. Certainly it will be admitted that neither party as represented in this body has a corner on patriotism and the love of peace. Democrats and Republicans will resist every effort to inveigle America into the war which, however much we may be inclined one way or another toward the belligerents, is admittedly a foreign affair and one to be settled by themselves.

I am interested however in preserving the traditional and fundamental rights of America and her citizens. Under no circumstances will I yield to threats or pressure from either the Nazi-Communist side or, for that matter, the side of the democracies.

It is now and always has been the privilege of America to control her internal policy. We always enjoyed the privilege to manufacture and sell any and all products whether of the mine, mill, or factory. Foodstuffs and manufactured goods under our policy could be and were sold or refused to nations without regard to their reactions. That is our privilege, our sacred God-given right.

We chose as a nation to employ the embargo on more than one occasion against various nations and we have that same unabridged right at the present time. Whether we want to use it or not is, of course, a debatable question.

Whatever the outcome of our collective action here in the Congress it will be the will of the majority, the will of the great bulk of our American citizens.

As I appraise the feelings of our people, and particularly those in my district, the attitude is overwhelmingly in favor of the cash-and-carry provision of the bill under consideration. Certainly there is no doubt about the intended restriction to be imposed upon our shipping and travel in the designated danger zones, and I am confident that the question of lifting the embargo is equally supported by the vast majority of our people.

There will be a sharp reaction among the belligerents and we will be applauded and condemned by one side or other, depending upon whether we change the present law or permit it to remain unchanged. If the embargo is lifted the Commu-Nazi alliance will charge violation of neutrality and will gnash their teeth and threaten dire consequences; if we fail to do so the democracies will complain bitterly and may go equally as far in their expressions of disappointment.

Doubtlessly our votes are important and might have a bearing on the outcome of the European war. In fact, I believe that the lifting of the embargo, restricting our shipping and our travelers, along with the cash-and-carry provision, will be the prime factors in keeping America out of war. On the other hand, if my vote will, purely as an incidental matter, help to strangle and strike down the international thugs and rapists who, under the banners of the Communists and Nazis, enslaved millions of their own people, subjugated and destroyed Austria, Czechoslovakia, and martyred Poland, imposed a reign of terror, persecution, and Godlessness upon Catholics, Protestants, and Jews, suppressed trade-unionism, Masonry, and personal liberties, brutally murdered priests, ministers, rabbis, monks, and nuns, then I want to say that my vote will be doubly valuable and truly American. I have always been taught by my church and by the example of our great American forefathers that all mankind has the right to enjoy these God-given privileges which we Americans enjoy.

I will not be charged as having contributed to the permanent establishment of fiendish militarism by my vote or as having aided and abetted the forces of antichrist which are rampant and threaten the security of the great and peaceful Scandinavian nations of Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and heroic and progressive Finland. I will not be called upon to strike my breast and sorrowfully acknowledge my guilt should Belgium, Holland, or Switzerland, singly or together, be victimized by the war-crazed Nazis.

The fangs of the Commu-Nazis have been bared to the vision of the struggling Balkan nations, and in the path of this peaceful group lies as a prospective victim a great and cultured, peace-loving people within the boundaries of Hungary. The safety and happiness of these people is admittedly not our problem or responsibility, but our votes may be, as an incidental, their salvation. The main purpose of my vote is to preserve traditional American rights and to keep America out of war.

I will not be charged with open, or even tacit, alinement with Commu-Nazis, the murder of Dolfuss, the torture of Schuschnigg, the destruction of peaceful sovereign states, or the murder of countless thousands of peaceful citizens and their spiritual shepherds.

In closing let me express my complete approval of the remarks of my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], and let me add that the slippery, slimy Communists are acting, as expected, in a treacherous, underhanded manner. While reaping the benefits of a neutral, their actions are clearly those of a belligerent and unfriendly to the United States.

In the instance of the City of Flint, Communist Russia is acting as a fence for the disposition of the swag and booty of her criminal ally. An international pickpocket would be classed on a higher plane because of the sporting chance of apprehension and penalty which would follow detection.

Shall We Make Free Speech Responsible?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

STATEMENT BY HON. EMANUEL CELLER, OF NEW YORK

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following release I recently issued entitled "Shall We Make Free Speech Responsible?":

SHALL WE MAKE FREE SPEECH RESPONSIBLE?

GROUP SLANDER, GROUP LIBEL

I am a firm believer in the Bill of Rights and wholeheartedly agree with John Milton, who 300 years ago argued for the utmost freedom of press and speech because he felt that the contest between truth and falsehood is an equal one. But today the situation is an entirely different one. The contest is no longer equal, free, or open. Lying by propaganda has changed the aspects of the encounter between truth and falsehood. Although truth is mighty and must prevail, the process consumes long time, and meanwhile much damage is done. There have emerged expert propagandists, who may worst, if not blot out, free speech and free press. Adolf Hitler discloses a technique in his book Mein Kampf which has been aped successfully in this country by the Coughlinites, the Pelleys, the Kuhns, the Deathereges, and the Christian fronts. They all agree with Hitler that a lie should be told with "unqualified impudent inflexibility," for "of even the most impudent lie, something remains and adheres."

Most of these propagandists have repeated, for example, the alleged lying statement about the Jews attributed to Benjamin Franklin, a statement that has been proved again and again as a diabolical forgery. Yet hundreds of thousands of copies containing this brazen lie are continually being disseminated.

The so-called Protocols of the Elders of Zion have been proven to be a clumsy fraud time and again. Yet even Father Coughlin frequently reprints these discredited "protocols" in his magazine Social Justice.

Not so many moons ago, the Catholic Church was the subject of similar repeated calumnies and falsehoods, which led to the destruction of convents and the burning of monasteries. Most of us remember the machinations of the Ku Klux Klan. We have read with shame the damage wrought by the anti-Masonic party.

HISTORICAL BLOTS ON OUR ESCUTCHEON

In 1777 John Jay, great as he was, sought to deny citizenship to Catholics in New York State on the ground that their loyalty to the Pope meant allegiance to a foreign power. This statement was reechoed a myriad number of times and did great damage to Catholicism.

In 1834 Samuel F. B. Morse, the inventor of the telegraph, writing under the name "Brutus," claimed that the Catholics owed exclusive loyalty to the Pope. The lie was continuously repeated. (The contemporaries of Morse could have said, as we the contemporaries of Lindbergh today can say: "Shoemaker, stick to your last.")

In the same year the sermons of a Congregational minister, the Reverend Lyman Beecher, father of Henry Ward Beecher, led to the burning of Catholic churches.

In 1850 the Know-Nothing Party revived such accusations.

They were revived again in 1890 by the American Protective Association.

And again in the Presidential campaign of 1928 they were revived once more with devastating effect.

Thus history continually repeats itself. Today the Jews are the victims. Yesterday it was the Masons. The day before the Catholics. What shall tomorrow bring forth?

Shall we continue to allow the forces of Nazi-Fascist-Communist propaganda to spread their germs of anti-isms over the radio, through the press and in public assembly, and thus pollute the very structure of our democracy without some antidote?

Shall we do nothing about this wave of prejudice which is manifested in such attacks against minority groups, or shall new legal remedies be employed?

I have offered two bills, one to provide civil remedies for group libel and slander and the other to provide criminal prosecution and punishment for those found guilty of libel and/or slander against minority groups. Attached hereto are copies of both bills.

"A bill relating to defamation of groups—civil remedies

"Be it enacted, etc., That whoever shall send or transmit, or shall cause to be sent or transmitted in interstate or foreign commerce or through the mails any written, printed, or oral communication which is defamatory of any religious, racial, national, fraternal, industrial, commercial, labor, or any other group of persons subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall be liable for damages to members of such group. A civil action to recover such damages may be brought by any member or members of such group in behalf of all. Other members of such group shall have the right to intervene as parties plaintiff in such action. The pendency of one such action shall constitute a bar to any other action in respect to the same communication, unless it appears that such pending action is not being prosecuted diligently, efficiently, or in good faith. The proceeds of any recovery in such action shall be distributed under the direction and control of the court as follows: The plaintiff or plaintiffs who incurred or contributed to the expenses of the suit shall first be recompensed for all their disbursements and the balance shall be distributed pro rata among the plaintiffs who instituted such action or intervened therein. In any such action, the defenses of truth and privilege shall be available to the extent to which they are available in a civil action for libel or slander. The courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of any action under this act."

"A bill relating to defamation of groups—criminal remedies

"Be it enacted, etc., That the criminal code, approved March 4, 1909, as amended, is further amended by adding thereto an additional section to be known as section 346, and to read as follows:

" 'That whoever shall send or transmit, or shall cause to be sent or transmitted in interstate or foreign commerce or through the mails any written, printed, or oral communication which is defamatory of any religious, racial, national, fraternal, industrial, commercial, labor, or any other group of persons subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall be liable for imprisonment for a term not exceeding 1 year, or to a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both. In any prosecution under this act defenses of truth and privilege shall be available. The courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of any prosecution under this act.'"

CIVIL REMEDIES

There is set up in this bill the right to bring civil action for damages in the Federal courts against any person or persons who use the radio or the mails or the press in transmitting in interstate or foreign commerce printed or oral defamatory, slanderous, or libelous statements concerning any religious, racial, national, fraternal, industrial, commercial, or labor group. The civil suit for damages may be brought by any member or members of the group so maligned and shall be brought in behalf of all the members of said group. Any member of such group shall have the right to intervene as party plaintiff in such action. The proceeds of any recovery in such action shall be distributed in part to the plaintiff or plaintiffs who incurred or contributed to the expenses of the suit, and the balance shall be distributed pro rata among the plaintiffs who instituted such action or intervened therein. In such action the defenses of truth and privilege shall be available as in a civil action for libel or slander.

CRIMINAL REMEDIES

Similarly, any person or persons who shall by radio or by press or through the mails send or transmit, or shall cause to be sent or transmitted, in interstate or foreign commerce any written, printed, or oral communication which is defamatory of any religious, racial, national, fraternal, industrial, commercial, or labor group shall be liable for imprisonment for a term not to exceed 1 year, or to a fine not to exceed $5,000, or both. In such action, as in the civil action, the defenses of truth and privilege shall be available.

DIFFICULT PROBLEM

I am well aware of the difficulties attendant upon such suggested remedies. In the case of civil remedies for group libel and slander, I do not believe there is impinged the right of free speech. Simply, damages are assessed against any person or persons found guilty of having libeled or slandered a minority group. That bill follows the traditional liability for libel and slander which has existed in our State courts ever since we have been a nation. There is no jail penalty provided for in this bill. However, where the defendant is judgment-proof, the situation is an unfortunate one, for in such case the remedy would be an ineffectual one.

In the case of criminal remedy for group libel and slander I am on less firm ground. There may be involved the limitation of free speech and free press, for here a jail sentence and/or a fine faces the offender. Such serious penalty must give us pause, since it may have a frightening effect on the editor of a newspaper, on the radio announcer, and even on the private citizen who honestly seeks redress against wrongs. The proposition is, therefore, one fraught with considerable doubt and difficulty. The cure may be worse than the disease.

The remedies involved in the last-mentioned bill may be too drastic. The evil aimed at us may soon blow over. Our present economic disturbances have undoubtedly contributed to the desire on the part of certain persons to set up the Jews as scapegoats. With the coming of better economic conditions there may be no need for such scapegoats. In any event, I seek enlightenment and welcome opinions as to these proposed remedies.

IN FRANCE

It is interesting to note that in France the right exists for representative(s) of any group to sue for slander or libel against the said group. The experience of the French in the operation of this statute has been successful.

The bills above mentioned will be referred to the House Judiciary Committee, of which I am ranking member. I will take no further action at this junction other than the introduction of these measures. I await public reaction.

Nonpartisan Committee for Peace Through Revision of Neutrality Law

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

LETTER BY WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE AND JOINT STATEMENT BY PROMINENT CLERGYMEN

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter which I have received from William Allen White concerning the neutrality proposal now under consideration. I need remind no one that Mr. White is among our country's most distinguished citizens.

In connection with the letter, I ask unanimous consent that there may be published with it a joint statement of a number of prominent American clergymen, brief statements of many well-known and outstanding American leaders, and a list of the committee members associated with Mr. White, and their professional and business connections.

There being no objection, the letter and statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NON-PARTISAN COMMITTEE FOR PEACE
THROUGH REVISION OF THE NEUTRALITY LAW,
New York City, October 28, 1939.

The Honorable FRANCIS T. MALONEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MALONEY: There are two sides to this embargo question and if we take either side we are liable to be drawn into war if the hard-boiled will of the American people does not keep us out of war. I am enclosing herewith some material which seems to me most interesting and convincing about my side of this controversy.

I most earnestly hope you will not drop it in the waste basket. Here are many of the independent leaders of the United States strongly pleading for the repeal of the embargo and revision of the Neutrality Act.

They are entitled to a hearing by every open-minded Congressman, and I am addressing you in the hope that whatever your views, you will consider this appeal of men who have no political ambitions, who are in touch with public sentiment and who are well known in their communities and in the Nation as men of sober common sense.

I know that you will pardon my intrusion and will give this letter your serious consideration. I do not presume to urge that there is only one side to this question, but when I hear a man venting his emotions and clamoring for the retention of the present neutrality law with all of its dangers to American shipping and to the lives of American seamen, I can only say to him "I would to God I could be as sure I am right as you are sure that you are right."

This letter is written in the spirit of a kindly suggestion and is in no sense contentious. May I end as I began, that there are two honest sides to this controversy and I ask only the opportunity to state my case backed by the opinions of others more intelligent than I. And may I add my kind personal regards.

Sincerely yours,

W. A. WHITE.

THE JOINT STATEMENT OF THE CLERGY

We who sign this statement are firmly for repeal of the embargo law because we cannot be ethically or spiritually indifferent in the face of the present universal menace to man's religious liberties. We support revision because we believe its safeguards are not only best calculated to keep us out of war but will throw the vast moral and material weight of this country on the side of liberty in which alone religious institutions can flourish.

We therefore urge our Congress to stand fast and express the will of the people by revising the present law, which puts this country in the false position of supporting wrong, encouraging its spread, and condoning the destruction of all the religious and other liberties that mankind holds precious:

Dr. Cyrus Adler, president, Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

Dr. Robert A. Ashworth, educational secretary, National Conference of Jews and Christians.

Dr. Arlo Ayers Brown, president, Drew University, Madison, N. J.

Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, president, Union Theological Seminary, New York City.

Rt. Rev. Benjamin D. Dagwell, bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Oregon.

Dr. F. Slade Danzoll, St. Michael's Church, New York City.

Rev. William Horace Day, pastor emeritus, United Congregational Church, Bridgeport, Conn.

Dr. Robert C. Dexter, secretary, department of social relations, American Unitarian Association.

Dr. Ralph E. Diffendorfer, corresponding secretary Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, New York City.

Rt. Rev. Hoyt M. Dobbs, Methodist Episcopal bishop of Louisiana and Mississippi.

Rev. J. Stanley Durkee, Plymouth Congregational Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Dr. Samuel A. Eliot, Arlington Street Church, Boston, Mass.

Rev. Frederick J. Fagley, associate secretary, General Council of Congregational and Christian Churches.

Dr. John W. Frazer, presiding elder, Methodist Church, Mobile, Ala.

Rev. Frederick B. Harris, Foundry Methodist Church, Washington, D. C.

Rt. Rev. Henry W. Hobson, bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Southern Ohio.

Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, dean, Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, N. J.

Dr. Edward L. Israel, rabbi, Har-Sinai congregation, Baltimore, Md.

Dr. Morris S. Lazaron, rabbi, Baltimore Hebrew Congregation, Baltimore, Md.

Dr. Justin W. Nixon, professor of theology, Colgate-Rochester Divinity School, Rochester, N. Y.

Rt. Rev. G. Ashton Oldham, bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Albany.

Rev. Harold C. Phillips, First Church Baptist, Cleveland, Ohio.

Rev. Daniel A. Poling, editor in chief, Christian Herald, Baptist Temple, Philadelphia, Pa.

Dr. George W. Richards, president, Theological Seminary of Reformed Churches in United States, Lancaster, Pa.

Most Rev. Bernard J. Sheil, auxiliary bishop, Catholic Diocese of Chicago.

Dr. Minot Simons, All Souls Unitarian Church, New York City.

Dr. Harold Paul Sloan, editor, The Christian Advocate, New York City.

Dr. Robert E. Speer, formerly secretary, Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions and Moderator Presbyterian Chuch in United States of America.

Dr. Joseph A. Vance, First Presbyterian Church, Detroit, Mich.

Dr. Stephen S. Wise, rabbi, Free Synagogue, New York City.

THE PERSONAL STATEMENTS OF MANY LEADERS

"We members of the Catholic faith in the United States must do everything in our power to strengthen the President in his mighty task of guiding America to safety.

"That should give the key to the attitude of American Catholics on the recommendations of the President now before the Congress to keep the country out of war." (The Most Reverend Bernard J. Sheil, auxiliary bishop of the Catholic Diocese of Chicago, quoting the late Cardinal Mundelein.)

"Cannot overstate my convictions in regard to necessity of revision if we are to have any chance of avoiding involvement." (Ernest M. Hopkins, president, Dartmouth College.)

"I firmly believe in my heart and soul that the amendments suggested by the President are best calculated to save us from the scenes that we witnessed in 1917 when our American boys were starting for France. I am appealing to the American people to stand solidly behind the President because he is so clearly right, so obviously on the side of common sense and sound judgment of patriotism that only those who lack an understanding of the issue will oppose him." (Hon. Alfred E. Smith, former Governor of New York.)

"I advocate general revision, particularly repeal of the embargo." (Msgr. John A. Ryan, Catholic University, Washington, D. C.)

"I believe the arms embargo should be repealed and the cash-and-carry plan substituted." (Ida M. Tarbell, historian and writer.)

"Present neutrality law is inadequate; I favor more stringent measures to prevent American involvement." (Robert G. Sproul, president, University of California.)

"We all want to keep the United States out of war. We want to protect our country against involvement in this conflict. We believe it is necessary in this crisis that the strongest of the nations should be in a position to bring its influence to bear upon shortening the war and finding the terms of a just peace.

"The proposed legislation gives the maximum protection to the United States and * * * does nothing that will unnecessarily contribute to the victory of Germany." (Prof. Charles G. Fenwick, Bryn Mawr College.)

"Arms-embargo repeal will keep war farther from our shores than present so-called neutrality law."—Guy Stanton Ford, president, University of Minnesota.

"Reason for supporting repeal is that our chances for peace are greater than under existing legislation."—James M. Landis, dean, Harvard University Law School.

"The United States is now in the position of a bungling amateur magician who puts on handcuffs and then forgets how to extricate himself.

"The people in the United States are going to find out sooner or later that under existing legislation we are an active participant in this war on the side of nazi-ism and communism."—Rev. Maurice Sheehy, head of the department of religious education, Catholic University.

"I favor revision along lines proposed by the President."—Daniel Willard, president, Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.

"Revision would strengthen neutrality. Unrevised act penalizes democracies in favor of dictatorships."—Stephen S. Wise, rabbi, Free Synagogue, New York.

"Today in our great country there is much talk of isolation and neutrality. Those citizens who preach isolation are without doubt thoroughly sincere; they are not aware there is no such thing as isolation. Those citizens who preach neutrality are earnest and honest; they do not realize that neutrality in the face of crime is crime itself."—The Most Reverend Robert E. Lucey, bishop of the Catholic diocese of Amarillo, Tex.

"The repeal of the embargo provision of the present Neutrality Act will increase possibilities for a just and sound international peace, and thereby also promote the peace and security of the United States."—Henrietta Roelofs, former national public affairs secretary, Young Women's Christian Association.

THE NONPARTISAN COMMITTEE FOR PEACE THROUGH REVISION OF THE NEUTRALITY LAW, WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE, CHAIRMAN

W. Lewis Abbott, professor, Colorado College; Chauncey A. Adams, secretary, Vermont Congregational Conference; James Truslow Adams, Southport, Conn.; Cyrus Adler, president, Jewish Theological Seminary of America; Allen D. Albert, Paris, Ill.; Gordon W. Allport, professor, Harvard University; Mrs. Larz Anderson, Washington, D. C.; Paul Shipman Andrews, dean, college of law, Syracuse University; Mrs. James Rae Arneill, Denver, Colo.; Henry A. Atkinson, general secretary, World Alliance for International Friendship Through Churches and Church Peace Union; Frank Aydelotte, president, Swarthmore College; Mrs. Dana Converse Backus, Port Washington, N. Y.; Tallulah Bankhead, New York, N Y.; George Gordon Battle, New York, N. Y.; James P. Baxter, 3d, president, Williams College; Laird Bell, Chicago, Ill.; Harry Best, professor, University of Kentucky; Charles E. Beury, president, Temple University; Hon. Barry Bingham, president, the Courier-Journal, Louisville, Ky.; Mrs. Emmons Blaine, Hubbard Woods, Ill.; T. D. Boardman, San Francisco, Calif.; Dr. Frank C. Boudreau, Milbank Memorial Fund, New York City; Raymond B. Bragg, First Unitarian Society, Minneapolis, Minn.

William A. Brandenburg, president, Kansas State Teachers' College; Mrs. Henry Breckinridge, New York, N. Y.; Mrs. Arthur Brin, Minneapolis, Minn.; Robert C. Brooks, Swarthmore, Pa.; Arlo Ayres Brown, president, Drew University; Dr. Cornelia J. Browne, East Orange, N. J.; Mrs. William Thayer Brown, West Orange, N. J.; Mrs. Edward Browning, Philadelphia, Pa.; Esther Caukin Brunauer, Washington, D. C.; John Stewart Bryan, president, William and Mary College; Edith Burr, Pemberton, N. J.; Jane Humbird Burr, St. Paul, Minn.; Henry M. Busch, professor, Western Reserve University; Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd, Boston, Mass.; Robert H. Cabell, Chicago, Ill.; Robert J. Caldwell, New York, N. Y.; Henry S. Canby, professor, Yale University; Newcomb Carlton, chairman of the board, Western Union Telegraph Co.; O. C. Carmichael, chancelor, Vanderbilt University; Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, New York, N. Y.; Zechariah Chafee, Jr., professor, Harvard University; Harry Chandler, publisher, Los Angeles Times; C. C. Chapman, editor and publisher, Oregon Voter; Harry Woodburn Chase, chancelor, New York University; Mrs. Arthur Osgood Choate, New York, N. Y.; Elizabeth Christman, Washington, D. C.

Thomas C. Chubb, Greenwich, Conn.; William L. Clayton, Houston, Tex.; Rufus E. Clement, president, Atlanta University; Robert C. Clothier, president, Rutgers University; Dr. Henry S. Coffin, president, Union Theological Seminary, New York; Martin J. Collins, president, Graham Paper Co., St. Louis, Mo.; Frederic R. Coudert, Sr., New York, N. Y.; William H. Cowley, president, Hamilton College; Paul F. Cruikshank, headmaster, Taft School; George B. Cutten, president, Colgate University; Virginius Dabney, editor, Times-Dispatch, Richmond, Va.; Rt. Rev. Benjamin D. Dagwell, bishop, Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Oregon; Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, bishop, Protestant Episcopal Diocese of East Carolina; Thurston Davies, president, Colorado College; Harvey N. Davis, president, Stevens Institute of Technology; Rufus C. Dawes, Chicago, Ill.; Rt. Rev. J. Lloyd Decell, bishop in charge, the Methodist Church, Southeastern Jurisdiction; Monroe E. Deutsch, vice president and provost, University of California; Dr. Robert C. Dexter, secretary, Department of Social Relations, American Unitarian Association; Ralph Diffendorfer, corresponding secretary, Board of Foreign Missions, Methodist Episcopal Church, New York, N. Y.; Rt. Rev. Hoyt M. Dobbs, Methodist Episcopal Bishop of Louisiana and Mississippi; Melvyn Douglas, Hollywood, Calif.; Paul H. Douglas, professor, University of Chicago.

Michael Francis Doyle, Philadelphia, Pa.; Miss Mary E. Dreier, New York, N. Y.; Roscoe Drummond, editor, Christian Science Monitor; Stephen K. Duggan, New York, N. Y.; Rev. J. Stanley Durkee, Plymouth Congregational Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, N. Y; Clyde Eagleton, professor, New York University; Frederick H. Ecker, chairman of the board, Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.; William Alfred Eddy, president, Hobart College; Sherwood Eddy, New York, N. Y.; J. Stanley Edwards, Aetna Life Insurance Co., Denver, Colo.; Rev. Frederick M. Eliot, Boston, Mass.; Samuel A. Eliot, Boston, Mass.; Dr. Haven Emerson, Columbia University; Silas Evans, president, Ripon College; Hazle B. Ewing, Bloomington, Ill.; Rev. F. L. Fagley, associate secretary, the General Council of the Congregational and Christian Churches; Geraldine Farrar, Ridgefield, Conn.; Samuel S. Fels, president, Fels & Co., Philadelphia, Pa.; Charles G. Fenwick, professor, Bryn Mawr College; Marshall Field, New York, N. Y.; Thomas K. Finletter, New York, N. Y.; Dr. Morris L. Fishbein, Chicago, Ill.; Dorothy Canfield Fisher, Arlington, Vt.; Edgar J. Fisher, Institute of International Education, New York; D. F. Fleming, professor, Vanderbilt University; Guy Stanton Ford, president, University of Minnesota; Kirk Fox, editor, Successful Farming, Des Moines, Iowa; Jay Franklin, Washington, D. C.; Rev. Dr. John W. Frazer, Methodist Church, Mobile, Ala.; Douglas S. Freeman, Richmond, Va.; Alfred C. Fuller, president, the Fuller Brush Co..; Helen Gahagan, Hollywood, Calif.; Francis P. Gaines, president, Washington and Lee University.

Hon. Frank S. Gaines, mayor, Berkeley, Calif.; Bennett E. Geer, Greenville, S. C.; Hon. James W. Gerard, New York, N. Y.; Mrs. Douglas Gibbons, New York, N. Y.; Harry David Gideonse, president, Brooklyn College; Virginia Gildersleeve, dean, Barnard College; Charles W. Gilkey, dean of the university chapel, University of Chicago; Arthur J. Goldsmith, New York, N. Y.; Robert K. Gooch, professor, University of Virginia; Mrs. Henry F. Grady, Washington, D. C.; Frank P. Graham, president, University of North Carolina; John Temple Graves, II, the Birmingham News; Clifton D. Gray, president, Bates College; Roger S. Greene, World Citizens Association, Chicago, Ill.; Samuel R. Guard, editor, Breeders' Gazette, Spencer, Ind.; John Gunther, New York, N. Y.; William B. Hale, Chicago, Ill.; Grover C. Hall, editor, Montgomery Advertiser; Helen Hall, Henry Street Settlement, New York, N. Y.; Sidney B. Hall, superintendent of public instruction, Richmond, Va.; Roswell G. Ham, president, Mount Holyoke College; Henry I. Harriman, chairman of the board, New England Power Association; Livingston Hartley, Washington, D. C.; Arthur A. Hauck, president, University of Maine; Arthur Garfield Hays, New York, N. Y.; Dr. Victor G. Heiser, New York, N. Y.; A. D. Henderson, president, Antioch College; Mrs. Elinore M. Herrick, New York, N. Y.; Mrs. William G. Hibbard, Winnetka, Ill.; Melvin D. Hildreth, Washington, D. C.; Mrs. John C. Holman, St. Paul, Minn.; Hamilton Holt, president, Rollins College; Ernest M. Hopkins, president, Dartmouth College; Miriam Hopkins, Hollywood, Calif.

Walter M. Howlett, secretary, department of religious education, Greater New York Federation of Churches; Palmer Hoyt, publisher, the Oregonian, Portland, Oreg.; L. H. Hubbard, president, Texas State College for Women; James Edwin Huchingson, president, Colorado Woman's College; Walter Hullihen, president, University of Delaware; Louise Hunnewell, Wellesley, Mass.; Wiley Lin Hurie, president, the College of the Ozarks; Fannie Hurst, New York, N. Y.; Rev. John W. Inzer, First Baptist Church, Asheville, N. C.; Franklin W. Johnson, president, Colby College; Dr. D. Shepard Jones, World Peace Foundation, Boston, Mass.; Paul Kellogg, editor, Survey Graphic; Rt. Rev. Paul B. Kern, bishop, Methodist Episcopal Church South, Nashville, Tenn.; Frank Kingdon, president, Newark University; Freda Kirchway, editor, the Nation; Col. Frank E. Knox, publisher, Chicago Daily News; S. Stanley Kreutzer, New York, N. Y.; Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw, Port Washington, N. Y.; Mrs. Florence H. Lamont, New York, N. Y.; James M. Landis, dean, law school of Harvard University; William Lassiter, Santa Barbara, Calif.; Mrs. Roberta Campbell Lawson, General Federation of Women's Clubs, Tulsa, Okla.; Dr. Morris S. Lazaron, rabbi, Baltimore Hebrew Congregation; Max Lerner, professor, Williams College; Miss Inez Johnson Lewis, State superintendent of public instruction, Denver, Colo.; William Draper Lewis, director, American Law Institute, Philadelphia, Pa.; Irene Lewisohn, New York, N. Y.; Charles A. Levin, Hartford, Conn.; Walter L. Lingle, president, Davidson College; Arthur O. Lovejoy, professor, Johns Hopkins University; Most Rev. Robert E. Lucey, bishop, Catholic Diocese of Amarillo, Tex.; Miss Cornelia B. Lusk, St. Paul, Minn.

Mrs. C. D. N. MacLennan, Tacoma, Wash.; F. A. Magruder, Oregon State College; Rt. Rev. William T. Manning, bishop, Diocese of New York; Hon. Theodore Marburg, Baltimore, Md.; Daniel L. Marsh, president, Boston University; Charles E. Martin, University of Washington; Mrs. Eleanor Wilson McAdoo, Pasadena, Calif.; Hon. Andrew F. McBride, Paterson, N. J.; Mrs. Arthur J. McGuire, St. Paul, Minn.; Frederick C. McKee, Pittsburgh, Pa.; Spencer Miller, Jr., director, Workers Educational Bureau, A. F. of L., New York, N. Y.; Robert A. Milliken, chairman, executive council, California Institute of Technology; Sedgwick Minot, New York, N. Y.; Mary A. Graham Mitchell, Pittsburgh, Pa.; Peter Molyneaux, publisher, Texas Weekly, Dallas, Tex.; Hugh Moore, president, Dixie Vortex Corporation, Easton, Pa.; Walden Moore, professor, University of Rochester; Edward A. Moree, New York, N. Y.; George W. Morgan, St. Paul, Minn.; Felix Morley, editor, Washington Post; Victor P. Morris, dean, University of Oregon; Mrs. Dwight W. Morrow, acting president, Smith College; Mrs. E. K. Morrow, Salina, Kans.; William B. Munro, professor, California Institute of Technology; Mrs. Burton W. Musser, Salt Lake City, Utah; J. L. Newcombe, president, University of Virginia; G. Bernard Noble, professor, Reed College; G. S. Nollen, president, Bankers Life Co., Des Moines, Iowa; John S. Nollen, president, Grinnell College; George Norlin, president emeritus, University of Colorado; Robert Lincoln O'Brien, Washington, D. C.; Rt. Rev. George Ashton Oldham, bishop, Episcopal Diocese, Albany, N. Y.; William Church Osborn, New York, N. Y.

Marion Edwards Park, president, Bryn Mawr College; B. L. Parkinson, president, Mississippi State College for Women; Mrs. Edgerton Parsons, New York City; James G. Patton, Farmers' Educational & Cooperative Union of America, Denver, Colo.; Lewis Perry, principal, Phillips Exeter Academy; Hon. Gifford Pinchot, Milford, Pa.; Mrs. T. J. Preston, Jr., Princeton, N. J.; Hon. Joseph M. Proskauer, New York, N. Y.; Mrs. Elinor Purvis, Princeton, N. J.; Mrs. Ogden Reid, New York Herald Tribune; Mrs. Aurelia Henry Reinhardt, president, Mills College; F. D. G. Ribble, dean, University of Virginia; Frank M. Richardson, editor, Baltimore Southern Methodist; Edward G. Robinson, Hollywood, Calif.; Henrietta Roelofs, New Canaan, Conn.; Chester Rowell, San Francisco Chronicle; George Rublee, Washington, D. C.; William F. Russell, dean, Teachers College, Columbia University; Monsignor John A. Ryan, professor, Catholic University; George St. John, head master, the Choate School, Wallingford, Conn.; Harry Schermann, president, Book-of-the-Month Club, New York; William Jay Schieffelin, New York, N. Y.; Miss Rose Schneiderman, secretary, New York State Department of Labor, New York, N. Y.; Walter Dill Scott, president emeritus, Northwestern University; Ellery Sedgwick, Boston, Mass.; Henry D. Sharpe, president, Brown & Sharpe Manufacturing Co., Providence, R. I.; Vincent Sheean, New York, N. Y.; Rev. Maurice Sheehy, professor, Catholic University; Robert E. Sherwood, New York, N. Y.; Rev. Guy Emery Schipler, editor, the Churchman, New York, N. Y.; James T. Shotwell, professor, Columbia University.

Enoch W. Sikes, president, the Clemson Agricultural College; Kenneth C. M. Sills, president, Bowdoin College; Dr. Minot Simons, All Souls Unitarian Church, New York, N. Y.; Robert G. Sproul, president, University of California; Eugene Staley, Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy; Hon. Ben C. Stapleton, mayor, Denver, Colo.; Robert L. Stearns, president, University of Colorado; Chauncey Stillman, New York, N. Y.; Rev. Dr. Anson Phelps Stokes, Washington, D. C.; Silas H. Strawn, Chicago, Ill.; Clarence K. Streit, New York, N. Y.; Herbert Bayard Swope, New York, N. Y.; Horace D. Taft, Watertown, Conn.; Ida M. Tarbell, New York, N. Y.; Dorothy Thompson, New York, N. Y.; E. S. Tucker, president, Austin College; Gene Tunney, New York, N. Y.; Clifton M. Utley, director, Council on Foreign Relations, Chicago, Ill.; Tertius Van Dyke, head master, Gunnery School, Washington, Conn.; George E. Vincent, Greenwich, Conn.; Miss Sarah Wambaugh, Cambridge, Mass.; J. Skottowe Wannamaker, president, American Cotton Growers Association, St. Matthews, S. C.; W. W. Waymack, editor, Des Moines Register; Charles A. Webb, Asheville, N. C.; Mrs. E. K. Wedelstaedt, St. Paul, Minn.; Herman B. Wells, president, University of Indiana; A. F. Whitney, president, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, Cleveland, Ohio.; C. C. Williams, president, Lehigh University; Dr. Stephen A. Wise, rabbi, Free Synagogue, New York, N. Y.; Rufus Woods, Wenatchee, Wash.; Mary E. Woolley, president emeritus, Mount Holyoke College; and Quincy Wright, professor, University of Chicago.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, there is only one real issue before this House. That issue is not neutrality in any academic sense. It is the big idea behind neutrality. It is keeping out of war—keeping America out of this strictly European war.

Neutrality is a big subject. It covers a wide field in international law. That may account for the debate on this so-called neutrality bill becoming somewhat confused with side issues. Some of that confusion, of course, comes from the lack of candor on the part of some advocates of repealing the arms embargo. Certainly there have been some clumsy efforts to camouflage and conceal the true purpose behind this proposal. But no matter whence it comes, no matter what may be the cause of this confusion, it has complicated a very simple matter. It has beclouded the real issue before the House.

So, let us get down to cases once more. Let us consider first things first. Let us try to clarify this issue. Let us see what dire consequences may lurk in this miscalled neutrality bill. Let us see what not only might happen, but probably will happen if Congress adopts this proposed change in the established American neutrality policy in the midst of this European war.

During this debate, we have heard some strained and strange meanings placed on the word "neutrality." Neutrality means only one thing. It means impartiality. It means taking no part, directly or indirectly, in a war between two powers. The big idea behind neutrality is to keep out of other people's wars. No change in the state of world affairs ever has or ever can change the meaning of the word "neutrality." Nothing can change the fundamental purpose of a neutrality policy. The meaning, intent, and purpose of neutrality always has and always will remain the same—to keep out of war—to keep out of other people's wars.

Whenever a government ceases to be impartial it ceases to be neutral. Whenever a government departs from impartiality, which is the cornerstone of neutrality, it forfeits the status of a neutral. It loses the immunities of a neutral. Whenever a nominal neutral in any way aids a belligerent or set of belligerents, it is subject to retaliation and reprisal from other belligerents. It usually winds up in war.

Now, let's get down to cases. Congress was called into special session because of the emergency arising from the war in Europe. Two months ago Germany invaded Poland. England and France, having guaranteed the territorial integrity of Poland, declared war on Germany. Before England and France could get their war machines out of low gear Germany's "lightning war" was an accomplished fact, with some slight assistance from Russia. Hitler and Stalin already have split poor Poland between themselves, with Stalin getting the bigger chunk of territory. Now, poor Poland exists only on old maps, in the hearts of patriotic Poles, and in an expatriate government in Paris.

Allied England and France now have settled down to a "slow war" with Germany. All the other nations of the world are supposedly neutral. Strange as it may seem, Germany's allies, Italy and Russia, now are standing on the sidelines. These neutrals in name only are in fact the active allies of Germany. Yet neither England nor France has declared war on either Red Russia or Fascist Italy.

Across the Pacific lies Japan, erstwhile ally of Germany. It shocked and grieved Japan when Hitler signed up with her foe, Russia, with which she had been conducting a lively but undeclared border warfare for the last year or more. In any event, Japan, even if she had not been double crossed by Hitler, is too busy with her conquest of China and too far away to take a very active part in the European war.

That leaves only one great neutral power in the world—the United States of America. That has raised the biggest question in the mind of the world today. What will the United States do? Will America remain neutral in fact, as well as in name? Will the United States eventually be drawn into this war as it was drawn into the World War?

On September 21, President Roosevelt called Congress into special session to deal with this war emergency. He had already invoked the present neutrality law, declaring the neutrality of the United States to the world. He appeared in person at a joint session of Congress to ask that Congress repeal our established neutrality policy, a policy adopted in peacetime, which places an embargo on arms to any and all warring nations. He asked in its stead that Congress adopt the so-called cash-and-carry policy of selling arms to any nation, at war or at peace, which has the cash to pay for arms, ammunition, and implements of war, and the ships to carry them home.

For nearly 6 weeks now, Congress has been formulating the answer to the question of whether the United States will remain neutral in fact or merely neutral in name. That question is the most momentous question that has been before Congress and the American people in this generation. For upon the decision of Congress on the question of neutrality in fact or neutrality in name, may depend peace or war for the American people.

Some impatient persons in Congress and out have been inclined to sneer at the "great debate" on the question of neutrality in fact or in name. Some confusion may have arisen from some arguments for neutrality in name, but not in fact. But no time has been wasted on this issue, which is vital to the American people. On the contrary, every moment of this 6 weeks' debate, which has been in progress throughout the country as well as in Congress, has been well spent.

Above all else, this debate has developed the one real issue before the House—keeping America out of this strictly European war. This debate has demonstrated the determination of the American people to remain neutral in fact, as well as in name. This debate has brought Congress a clear and unmistakable mandate from the American people. That mandate, written in boxcar letters, reads: "Keep America Out of War."

The American people are not interested in legalistic hairsplitting. They want to keep out of war. The American people are not concerned with strained and strange arguments endeavoring to justify an unneutral change in our established neutrality policy in the midst of war to aid either side. They want to keep out of war.

No amount of tricky word juggling can convince the American people that it would be a neutral act to change our policy now to aid one side in this war. Even those who propose this unneutral change in our policy profess to oppose any step that might lead America into war. Indeed, they deeply resent any such suggestion, but they have yet to find any formula for converting unneutrality into neutrality, to make neutrality in name neutrality in fact.

No matter how much the American people may hate Hitler and despise all dictatorships, they cannot be deceived, nor can they deceive themselves, into believing a fundamental change in our neutrality policy now would be anything but an unneutral act. No amount of assurance to the contrary can allay the fear of the American people that such an unneutral act may not lead us into war.

Every authority on international law in the world is in complete agreement on this one point: No nation, after the outbreak of war, may change its neutrality law or policy to aid one of the warring sides without being guilty of an unneutral act. Of course, any nation has the power to enact or repeal any law. However, in the case of a neutrality law, nations changing their laws will be held accountable under international law. A nation may exercise its power to change its laws, but if that change violates the rights of another nation under international law, the guilty nation may be held accountable on the battlefield.

This rule of international law does not apply to a neutral nation, during the course of a war, enacting, repealing, or changing old laws, if that action does not aid one belligerent against another. Some gentlemen have been very evasive about the purpose of this proposed change in our neutrality law at this time. Other gentlemen in responsible places, however, have made no bones about the purpose. They state frankly and openly that the purpose, of course, is to aid allied England and France against Germany. This is one of the measures short of war intended to be used against aggressor nations.

There is no question about a neutral nation, even after the outbreak of war, passing a law to better safeguard its neutral rights, such as barring belligerent battleships from engaging in hostilities in neutral waters. But this proposed change in our neutrality has no such safeguarding motive in view. On the face of the proposal, and according to the outspoken statements of its leading advocates, the avowed purpose of the so-called cash-and-carry bill is to aid England and France against Germany.

President Roosevelt; Secretary of State Hull; Senator Pittman, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee; the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Luther A. Johnson; the able gentleman from New York, Mr. Wadsworth, all advocates of this proposed change, all are on record on this point. All of them have held in the past that any change, such as the cash-and-carry proposal, after war has begun would be an unneutral act, and thus lay the United States open to reprisals. Reprisals against our shipping led the United States into the World War. Remember that!

Now, let us look at the record and see what these eminent advocates of changing our law from neutrality in fact to neutrality in name only had to say. Let us look at the arguments they used before the outbreak of this European war in an effort to force a change in our law.

The President once told a press conference that repeal of the arms embargo after the event of war would be an "unneutral" act. Such ardent advocates of repeal of the arms embargo as Arthur Krock, Washington correspondent of the New York Times, now seeks to apologize for the President's statement and explain it away by saying he said such an action "would produce assertions that the act was unneutral." Mr. Krock insists that the President refused to accept that charge as true, however. If Mr. Krock's version is correct, he places the President in a class all by himself as an authority on international law. All of the President's advisers on this measure, which they now are advocating, are on record as holding such an act to be unneutral.

Chairman PITTMAN, of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, is on record any number of times as boldly asserting that it would be unneutral for a neutral to change its law after the beginning of war. On March 3, 1937, in the Senate, Senator PITTMAN declared:

> Undoubtedly if anything on earth would arouse unfriendliness on the part of a belligerent against us it would be discrimination by our government in favor of its enemy. We are speaking of a time when war exists, not of peacetime, and if Canada were engaged in war with a foreign country, and we were at peace with both of them, we would certainly arouse the intense anger and probably the unfriendly disposition of any country against which we discriminated in favor of any other country.

The prophetic Senator visualized exactly the situation as it is today, with Canada at war with Germany and evidence of Germany's "intense anger" already is beginning to appear, even before any unneutral action is taken. We have not yet heard the last of the City of Flint incident.

Speaking of changing our Neutrality Act so as to aid one belligerent against another, Mr. WADSWORTH stated last June, in the midst of the neutrality debate, "When we change a rule that we ourselves have made, after the game starts, then we have done an unneutral act." He added that "when we change those [rules] after the conflict starts we are in grave danger of getting into trouble."

Lest my purpose in quoting these eminent authorities on international law be misunderstood as criticism, let me hasten to assure them that quite the reverse is true. I quote their words of wisdom in the most friendly spirit, with approval and even gratitude in my heart. However, I cannot refrain from advising them that if they have occasion to reverse their position in the future, they might find it less embarrassing if they did not suffer a change of heart so quickly and if they do to remember the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a public document.

It is noteworthy also that Great Britain took the same view of a proposed change in our neutrality act in 1914, during the World War, that Germany might be expected to take if we changed our law now. When the late Senator Hitchcock of Nebraska proposed an arms embargo the British Government protested vigorously that it would be an unneutral act because it would favor Germany against allied sea power. Our State Department and President Wilson took the same view of the proposal and assured the British Government they had not been consulted by the Senator and no action was taken by Congress. It also is noteworthy, because it indicates the universal acceptance of this rule in international law, that both Germany and Austria conceded it would be unneutral to impose an embargo. They urged this Government to take steps that would insure equal treatment for all belligerents in the American arms market, however.

In view of the expressions from that array of authorities, I cannot believe that anybody will challenge the assertion that any change in our neutrality law now that war rages in Europe would be an unneutral act, that it would invite reprisals, and, in fact, be the first step toward war.

President Roosevelt never has sought to conceal his deep aversion to nazi-ism. On the contrary, he has made this plain repeatedly and on October 26, in a radio speech, expressly condemned nazi-ism as an oligarchic form of government and a danger to democracy.

I would be the last person in the world to condemn the President for entertaining the same personal views on the question of nazi-ism as I do. In his radio address on September 3, referring to the invasion of Poland by Germany, the President said he could not ask Americans "to remain neutral in thought." I certainly would not ask the President to remain neutral in thought. Surely, the President is entitled to his personal views on any subject, the same as the humblest citizen.

I submit, however, that the President's personal views, his personal prejudices, are one thing and his official acts as the head of this Government are quite another matter. The President's official acts and statements are the official acts and statements of the Nation and a grave responsibility rests upon him as a consequence.

It is inconceivable to me that any President would jeopardize the peace of America to gratify his personal prejudices or to achieve any personal ambition, and I certainly make no such suggestion now. We may differ with any President on domestic affairs, but when it comes to the peace and security of America we must repose our confidence in him.

We all know the European war has imposed new and greater burdens on the President. Perhaps this added strain to steering the Nation in the paths of peace has made the President overwrought and supersensitive. Otherwise he might not have lashed out last week at orators in and out of Congress, commentators and others, "beating their breasts and proclaiming against sending the boys of American mothers to fight on the battlefields of Europe." The President declared that was "a deliberate setting up of an imaginary bogeyman," and denounced it as "a shameless and dishonest fake."

Perhaps the President has heard some orators and read some commentators I have not. Otherwise there should have been no cause for his outburst, for neither in this House nor outside of it have I heard any responsible person suggest that the President or any other responsible official in Federal, State, or city government ever suggested in any shape, manner, or form the remotest possibility of sending the boys of American mothers to fight on the battlefields of Europe.

Without beating my breast, I do now protest against any change in our present neutrality law, the arms embargo, or the adoption or pursuit of any policy which might involve the "remotest possibility of sending the boys of American mothers to fight on the battlefields of Europe." Certainly no American in Congress or out of it can be condemned for protesting against that awful possibility. Certainly the President should be the last man to condemn the arms embargo, which he approved so wholeheartedly. The President placed his stamp of approval on that neutrality law with these solemn words:

> I have approved this joint resolution because it was intended as an expression of the fixed desire of the Government and the people of the United States to avoid any action which might involve us in war.

Again and again during the last few years, the President has praised the arms embargo as—> a definite step * * * taken toward enabling this country to maintain its neutrality and avoid being drawn into wars involving other nations.

It is because the American people, having faith in the President as a man of peace, have accepted his wholehearted endorsement of the arms embargo as an instrument of peace, now are so reluctant to see it repealed. It is because the American people have been assured and reassured for more than 4 years that the arms embargo embodies true neutrality—that it is the safest and soundest insurance again war ever devised by the mind of man—that they now fear the consequences if that bulwark against war is removed in the midst of this European war.

In opening this special session of Congress, the President told the American people that "repeal of the embargo and a return to international law are the crux of this issue." The President then made his "pocketbook" appeal for lifting the embargo. He was frank about the purpose he had in mind when he asked:

> From a purely material point of view what is the advantage to us in sending all manner of articles across the ocean for final processing there when we could give employment to thousands by doing it here? Incidentally, and again from the material point of view, by such employment we automatically aid our own national defense.

The President himself prepared the best answer to the "blood money" argument. Speaking at Chautauqua, N. Y., on August 14, 1936, when he was a candidate for reelection, Mr. Roosevelt rose to magnificent heights of scorn as he denounced the suggestion. He declared:

> Industrial and agricultural production for a war market may give immense fortunes to a few men; for the Nation as a whole it produces disaster. It was the prospect of war profits that made our farmers of the West plow up prairie land that should never have been plowed, but should have been left for grazing cattle. Today we are reaping the harvest of those war profits in the dust storms which have devastated those war-plowed areas.
>
> It was the prospect of war profits that caused the extension of monopoly and unjustified expansion of industry and a price level so high that the normal relationship between debtor and creditor was destroyed.
>
> Nevertheless, if war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality.
>
> They would tell you—and, unfortunately, their views would get wide publicity—that if they could produce and ship this and that and the other article to belligerent nations, the unemployed of America would all find work. They would tell you that if they could extend credit to warring nations that credit would be used in the United States to build homes and factories and pay our debts. They would tell you that America once more would capture the trade of the world.

It would be hard to resist that clamor; it would be hard for many Americans, I fear, to look beyond—to realize the inevitable penalties, the inevitable day of reckoning, that comes from a false prosperity. To resist the clamor of that greed, if war should come, would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace.

If we face the choice of profits or peace, the Nation will answer—must answer—"We choose peace." It is the duty of all of us to encourage such a body of opinion in this country that the answer will be clear and for all practical purposes unanimous.

To that magnificent plea for neutrality, peace, and sound prosperity the American people responded "Amen!" And they reelected Mr. Roosevelt for a second term as President, a President who stood for peace against war profits.

Both Houses of Congress passed the arms embargo by all but unanimous votes. Since that time, Members of Congress, like the President, Democrats and Republicans alike, have been telling the American people the arms embargo would keep them out of war—would keep their boys from fighting on foreign battlefields.

The President was the leader, but he espoused the arms embargo and secured its enactment in response to the demand of the American people themselves. The American people, like the President, abhor the very thought of war profits at the expense of human lives and human misery.

There has been no change in the desire and the determination of the American people. They want now just what they wanted when the arms embargo was adopted—peace and security. However, a change has come over the President. War has broken out again "in another continent," and, just as the President predicted, "thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches, fool's gold," now are attempting to break down or evade our neutrality.

"Unfortunately," just as the President predicted, "their views * * * get wide publicity." But more unfortunately still for 130,000,000 Americans, the President now sees eye to eye with those now attempting to break down or evade our neutrality—our bulwark against war.

What brought about that change in the President's attitude, I shall not undertake to say. But that change was evident on September 3, when the President said:

We seek to keep war from our firesides by keeping war from coming to the Americas.

No statement could be clearer. Mr. Roosevelt would give us peace by helping to destroy Germany now, so that later she cannot carry war to the Americas. I would not declare the President was guilty of "a deliberate setting up of an imaginary bogeyman" and then denounce it as "a shameless and dishonest fake."

"Imaginary bogeyman" or not, such a statement coming from the President of the United States, coupled with the success of Germany's "lightning war" in Poland, aroused my fears, just as such a statement and such events did in millions of other Americans. I wanted to know how Germany, win or lose in the present war, could carry a war to our shores. I am fortunate in enjoying the confidence of an officer in our military service, a man who is recognized by all who know him as possessing one of the keenest, shrewdest, and soundest military minds in America. I consulted him, and this is what he told me:

If we really want peace, we can have it, for no power on earth can carry war to this hemisphere. If we get into a war, we shall have to go at least 3,000 miles to find one.

For obvious reasons, I cannot name my informant. But for the sake of others who may be haunted by this imaginary bogeyman, I will elaborate further on what he told me about Hitler's chances of conquering the United States or any part of the Western Hemisphere. He said Hitler's military machine was geared for a lightning war, and naturally he would have a year's jump on the Allies while they are getting to their peak.

In the meantime, he pointed out, Hitler's forces would be spending their strength. He offered no definite period for the duration of the war, but he, like other military experts, was positive that Hitler could not win. For the sake of argument, however, he assumed that if Hitler did win, what would America have to fear from him? In that event he asserted that Germany as well as every other nation engaged in this war would be exhausted. Moreover, if Russia remains nominally neutral in this war, husbanding its strength, what will happen when Hitler must settle his score with Stalin? You may draw your own conclusions.

Even assuming that Hitler wins and then settles or amicably adjusts any differences with his war partner Stalin, what then has America to fear from that quarter? Assuming that Hitler would be able to muster his war strength in another generation as he has in the last generation, what then?

"Hitler," said my friend, "would then be well past the allotted threescore and ten. Men of that advanced age do not make wars. It is more probable that Hitler will be dead long, long before he arrives at the retirement age. Suppose his successor is another warmonger? Suppose he has a dream of empire and wishes to take over all or part of the Western World? If the United States and the other nations of this hemisphere stay out of this war and wax fat while the Old World is bled white and we fail to prepare our defense to meet any foe coming across 3,000 miles of ocean on one side and 6,000 miles on the other, then we deserve no better fate than we get."

Some day, I predict that my informant will be in a position where he can speak openly and give the American people the benefit of his sound military knowledge. I believe it will help to render this country immune from war scares in the future, as well as actual wars.

Let us assume, however, that my friend is wrong. Let us assume he changes his mind about the security of America, just as the President has changed his mind about the safeguards of the arms embargo. Let us assume to keep war from our firesides we must keep war from coming to the Americas. Let us assume, after all, as do some gentlemen, that this is our war and one set of belligerents is fighting our battles.

If that assumption be true, why should we dally with measures "short of war"? If our "frontier is in France," why stand we here idle? Why hesitate; why deal with half measures while the French and British fight our battles, while brave British tommies and French poilus bleed and die for us? Why not declare war at once, today; draft another American Expeditionary Force of 2,000,000 men, with another 2,000,000 to stand guard at home to drive off Hitler's fabulous air squadrons? When the second American Expeditionary Force arrives in France, let the commanding general emulate General Pershing and visit the tomb of our Revolutionary War friend and say, "Lafayette, we are here."

Mr. Speaker, I assume nothing of the sort; but if any other Member of this House does assume that situation to be the fact, then let him act upon it. Let him offer a joint resolution—a declaration of war on Germany. And then, Mr. Speaker, let him defend his rash act in this House and before his constituents at home. I dare say we would meet when the next Congress convenes, but we would miss him. Yes, Mr. Speaker, we would miss him, because his people would retire him permanently to private life.

Even if the House is foolhardy enough to "rubber stamp" this Senate resolution, designed to place the United States in a position to intervene in this war by deliberately giving aid to one side while the British Navy withholds it from the other, I hope and pray my worst fears never will be realized. I hope and pray this unneutral action, which some gentlemen last June described as "an act of war," never will produce the fearful consequences that it might; and drag America into this war. It would be small satisfaction to be able to say "I told you so." I would rather be wrong about this than be President.

Before you gentlemen vote to put the American people to the risk of war that abides in this unneutral measure let me remind you of the ghastly lesson we learned in the World War. We learned the utter futility of America trying to make the world safe for democracy. We learned, or we should have learned, that our own democracy will be endangered, if not lost, if we are foolhardy enough to mix in this Old World war. Surely we ought to be wise enough never again to risk the loss of America's precious heritage, liberty.

We paid a high price for that lesson. But no price is too high to pay for wisdom. Now is the time to reap our profits. Not a harvest of "blood money" for weapons of war for the destruction of human life, the arms to snuff out the lives not only of soldiers in the field of battle but innocent women and children in their homes behind the lines. Now is the time to reap the harvest of peace that leads to prosperity and insures the blessings of liberty.

Every American knows in a general way what the World War cost him or her. Few realize the enormous cost to the Nation, tangible and intangible cost. A part of the tangible cost rests as a tax burden upon every American today, a burden that will be passed on to future generations. And every American is bearing a share of the intangible cost in the loss of health and happiness.

Lest we forget, let me cite a few figures. But, appalling as they are, cold figures cannot begin to tell the awful price we paid for that war. Losses in human values cannot be computed on an adding machine.

America's immediate human cost of the World War was 126,000 American boys killed in action or died of wounds, and 234,000 wounded, most of them incapacitated for civil life. Staggering as those totals are, they are insignificant in comparison with the entire toll of human life taken in the World War. Let us look at the casualty lists of the World War armies and navies once more. Here is that stark and stunning record: Soldier fatalities, 8,500,000; wounded, 21,000,000; civilian fatalities, 10,000,000.

Wars are supposed to be fought by soldiers on the battlefield, but 10,000,000 civilian fatalities again remind us that in modern war the innocent victims, the women and children, the aged and helpless, outnumber the soldier dead. With weapons of war more devastating than ever, God help the women and children of Europe in this war. We do not want their blood on our hands.

The money cost of the World War was only slightly less staggering than the human cost. Direct war costs—expenditures for the destruction of human life and property—were $200,000,000,000. Property and production losses added another $150,000,000,000 to bring the money cost to a total of $350,000,000,000. Three hundred and fifty thousand million dollars, earned by the sweat of the brows and the aching backs of the peoples of the world, spent for what? Spent for slaughtering human beings, utterly wasted.

It would be beyond belief that supposedly civilized peoples, including us Americans, could be so stupid, if we did not have this bill rendered by the god of war before us. Yet there it is—a bill still unpaid. High as that price was, it would not have been too high if we got what we fought for. That was supposed to be "the war to end war." But we were fooled. In the light of the almost continuous succession of wars that have followed, with another threat of a World War upon us, "the war to end war" was a hideous mockery.

After paying that awful price of death, destruction, and waste and achieving nothing, it is even less conceivable that the peoples of the Old World powers can be at war again. Yet the war is on. God only knows when or how it will end. We shudder to think of the war bill that eventually will be rendered. Only one generation and another bill to pay, a bill in death, destruction, and waste. No matter what that bill may be, it must be paid. No matter how long it takes, no matter how many generations yet unborn it may require to pay it, it must be paid in the end by somebody.

Now, let us look again at America's World War costs. It has been figured variously, but one of the most recent and most reliable estimates fixes America's money costs at nearly $51,000,000,000. Even that figure does not bring it down to date. It includes the costs in the war years of 1917–18 and since, down to 1937.

That figure, however, does not include more than $12,000,000,000 we, the American people, loaned the Allies. We might as well add that to the money cost now as later, for it never will be paid. In more than 20 years, none of the big debtor nations made more than a gesture to repay us. If ever we had a Chinaman's chance of collecting that money, that chance went a glimmering when war again enveloped Europe in flames.

America's World War money costs still are mounting. War costs never end with the firing of the last shot in battle. It will require several generations more to liquidate that debt and it never will be paid if we pile the cost of another war on top of it.

I hope to live to see the day when a grateful nation liquidates its debt in full to its defenders in the World War as it has done and still is doing for the veterans of our seven major wars, from the War for Independence to the World War. America has paid pensions and adjusted compensation to the veterans of all her major wars.

Already we have paid, and justly paid, more than $7,500,000,000 in compensation to the World War veterans. Sooner or later, we will follow the precedent established by a grateful Nation after the Revolution. We should grant pensions to all worthy World War veterans and to their widows and orphans, as we always have done in the past. We can do that without undue burden on the taxpayers, who, after all, are the beneficiaries of the sacrifices of these World War veterans. We can do it if we stay out of this European war and reap the harvest of prosperity that comes in the piping times of peace.

Estimates of the cost of the economic depressions that have come as an inevitable consequence of the World War run into billions and billions of dollars. It is impossible to calculate the dearest of all war costs—the price already paid and the continuing cost in human misery.

There are 84 veterans' hospitals and facilities in the United States. As the commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, it was my duty and privilege to visit them—some of them many times. In those hospitals, where a grateful Government makes the disabled veterans as comfortable as possible, is where you will find the cruelest cost of war.

Some of you gentlemen who are about to vote for this Senate bill as a "measure short of war," which may bring war to America again, some of you who never have seen this cruelest cost of war might do well to visit Walter Reed and Mount Alto Hospitals today.

More than 20 years after the last shot of the World War was fired in France and peace restored to a war-sick world, there you will find hundreds of American veterans still paying the price of war, the price of trying "to make the world safe for democracy." That noble slogan has a hollow ring in their ears today.

There you will find middle-aged men paying the price of patriotism in their valorous youth. They are paying with broken bodies, wounds that will not heal, tubercular lungs, and shadowed minds. To many of them, death would be a welcome release from constant agony.

There you will get a glimpse of the cost of war that will make you hesitate before you cast a vote that even has a remote chance of condemning boys of today to years of living hell. The World War will come back to you in all its horror. It will tear at your heart and grip you by the throat. You will turn aside to hide unmanly tears that come in spite of you. You will wish you had not seen it. Most of all, you will wish you could forget it. But you never will, gentlemen. I know.

Before you gentlemen cast your votes, I ask you to add up that cost sheet and see what you get. You will get the answer to America's opposition to war, any war, and especially a European war. Add up that cost sheet and you will discover why the American people are determined to stay out of this strictly European war. The American people know the best they can get out of war—any war—is the worst of it.

That is why the American people demand neutrality in fact not merely in name. That is why the American people, judging by the past, fear to gamble on the future filled with danger to themselves, their loved ones, and their beloved land. That is why the American people distrust this virtual war alliance with the Allies.

And that added up is why I am going to vote to keep the arms embargo, to keep America out of this European war. I will vote with a clear conscience, a conscience that will allow me to look any American mother in the eye and say, "I voted for the arms embargo because I believed it would reduce to the remotest possibility the danger of sending the boys of American mothers to fight on the battlefields of Europe."

The Farmer and Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 2, 1939

LETTER BY EDWARD E. KENNEDY

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, in the heart of Pennsylvania there is to be found many of the finest farms in the United States. The farmers in the great Keystone State are noted for their industry and their progressive methods that have caused their production to compare favorably with any State in the Union.

For years the farm industry has been afflicted with many ills, notably a lack of a fair market for the products of the farm where prices will not compel the farmer to take less than even the cost of production.

Agriculture is a great basic industry of this Nation and presents a problem that commands our undivided and immediate attention.

I would like permission at this time to publish herewith a letter received from Edward E. Kennedy, manager of the Farmers' Washington Service, this letter calling to our mind the plight of the American farmer and the urgent need that we give appropriate attention to the evils confronted by this large class of substantial American citizens:

NOVEMBER 1, 1939.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The first 9 months of 1939, compared with the first 9 months of 1938, indicates a great increase in agricultural imports into the United States and a great decrease of agricultural exports from the United States. In the 9 months of 1939 we imported farm products for consumption in the amount of $794,700,000, while in the same period in 1938 we purchased farm products in the amount of $711,600,000. For the same periods our agricultural exports declined from $602,700,000 in 1938 to $418,400,000 in 1939.

While all in the United States are being diverted from consideration of serious problems of agriculture and unemployment by the present dramatic attempt to lift the embargo and increase the exports of arms, munitions, and implements of war, little is being said and nothing is being done to protect our farmers from imports at below our cost of production prices or to sell our excess food and fiber to the world.

To lift the embargo now, would we not be choosing between the munitions makers and warmongers on the one hand and our Nation's 6,800,000 farmers on the other—choosing between "fools' gold" and fools' profits on the one hand and our own peace and security on the other—choosing between the national defense of a foreign state and the national defense of our own beloved country?

Is there even one valid, patriotic reason why we should lift the arms embargo now? Would it not be both patriotic and wise to retain the embargo on arms, munitions, and implements of war—settling this question decisively? Then, at once, turn our attention to assuring our farmers the cost of production, plus a profit; protect our home farm market from invasion by foreigners; build our prosperity upon our own basic industry—agriculture; give employment opportunities to our own labor at an adequate annual wage?

"Why quit our own to stand on foreign ground—why by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?"

Why quit our own?

Sincerely,

EDWARD E. KENNEDY.

Sufficiency of Chemicals Assured United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEWIS D. THILL
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 2, 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD OF NOVEMBER 2, 1939

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following news article which appeared in the Times-Herald, Washington, D. C., on November 2, 1939. This article is both timely and interesting, and presents the thesis that America could build a fence around itself and get along great. Many of us remember our dependence upon Germany and other European countries prior to the last war for dyes and various other chemicals:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of November 2, 1939]

SUFFICIENCY OF CHEMICALS ASSURED UNITED STATES—NATION CAPABLE OF SUPPLYING ALL MEDICAL AND INDUSTRIAL NEEDS IN WAR, EXPERT SAYS

NASHVILLE, TENN.—Every American industrial and medicinal need can be filed by American factories and laboratories, according to L. F. Livingston, manager of the agricultural extension service of E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.

"Self-sufficiency of American industry today," he said, "is in sharp contrast with the United States dependence upon imports during the World War. During the last war," Livingston said, "numerous industrial activities were dependent upon imports.

PEOPLE'S HEALTH PERILED

"Employment of millions of our workers was threatened," he said. "Even the health of our people was endangered because the importation of many important medical supplies had been cut off."

"Now," he said, "America could build a fence around itself and get along great."

"This is due in no small degree to the accomplishments of American chemistry during the last two decades. The products of the industrial chemical plant symbolize a measure of the economic security and the industrial independence of our country in contrast with conditions of a quarter of a century ago when the World War shut off so many supplies.

"This country did not have a single plant in 1914 to extract nitrogen from the air and transform it into the nitrates and other chemicals so vital to agriculture, industry, and national defense. We were almost completely dependent upon the importation of natural nitrates from Chile. Today America is self-sufficient in nitrates through chemistry.

NO LACK OF POTASH

"When the World War began, the United States was almost wholly dependent upon Germany for potash, which is so essential to agriculture and industry. In recent years, methods have been devised for the economic recovery of potash from America's mineral deposits. This country now produces a major part of the potash it consumes and, if necessary, it can produce all its needs.

"A highly essential material is rubber, imported from far-away lands under foreign control. It presented a grave problem during the World War as supplies dwindled and prices pyramided.

"That need not happen now. The chemical rubber made from coal, limestone, and salt, has every promise of functioning satisfactorily. Based on small production, its price is less than the cost of rubber during the World War days. Moreover, it is actually superior to natural rubber for many uses."

American Peace and Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

ARTICLE BY WILLIAM WILMOTH

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, this is a pamphlet written by and published at the expense of William Wilmoth, a Washington, D. C., businessman who has given much thought to the possibility of his country's involvement in the European conflict. This is not a partisan paper. Mr. Wilmoth voted for Mr. Roosevelt in 1932. He has since favored much of the New Deal legislation. I think his paper should be read by every American anxious for peace.

The article is as follows:

AMERICAN PEACE AND NEUTRALITY AND FOREIGN WARS—THE FACTS ABOUT THE PROPOSED BILL BEFORE CONGRESS TO REPEAL THE EMBARGO ON THE SUPPLY OF ARMS, MUNITIONS, AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS AND THE CONFUSED MUDDLE IN AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

I believe the President in his message read to the Congress on September 21, deliberately confuses the issue involved by bringing in subjects wholly foreign to that issue in order to make out a case for what he desired to accomplish. The President brought in the subject of aggressor nations and their danger to Christianity and civilization, neutrality and international law, while the question involved is embargoes; the right and desirability of the Nation to prohibit the export or import of certain commodities, which is purely a matter of domestic or municipal law.

As a matter of domestic policy, tariff laws prohibit the import of commodities subsidized by foreign governments; they likewise prohibit the export of helium gas and implements of war. No one will contend that these domestic regulations are the concern of international law or neutrality, yet the President brought them in to confuse the issue and to justify his demand for the repeal of the embargo on the export of arms and ammunitions. The President also said that such embargoes, which were departures from international law, had proved dangerous to the Nation in the past, and was the major cause of the War of 1812, and therefore likely to be the cause of other wars.

Now there is not a shred of history that I can find to justify that contention. Prior to 1812, England and France seized and confiscated hundreds of American ships and their cargoes bound to the opposite countries. The embargo was made to prevent these seizures and confiscations, and the war, therefore, was not caused by the embargoes but by the seizure of the ships and cargoes, and the barbarous course of the British Navy in going aboard American ships on the high seas and seizing native and naturalized American seamen and forcing them to serve on ships of war against their own country and against others with which it was at peace. Theodore Roosevelt, in his history of the Naval War of 1812, says: "The wrongs inflicted on our seafaring countrymen by their impressment into foreign ships formed the main cause of the war." He says further, "That the principles for which the United States contended in 1812 are now universally accepted, and those so tenaciously maintained by Great Britain find no advocates in the civilized world." So that the War of 1812 was not caused by embargoes, but was fought to establish and maintain the principles of international law.

The President would have been less disingenuous and far more accurate if he had said that the entry of the United States into the so-called World War in 1917 was the result of the Government's departure from international law. President Wilson's insistence on the right of Americans to travel unharmed on armed belligerent ships was wholly contrary to long-established international law. Chief Justice Marshall decided in 1815, in the Nereide case, that an armed merchantman was a ship of war. This has been the accepted basis of international law ever since, and in compliance with it Holland excluded armed merchantmen from her ports during the World War. But President Wilson permitted himself to be deceived by the British Government into taking the position that a merchant ship, armed for defensive purposes, was entitled under international law to enjoy the status of a peaceful trading ship in neutral ports.

"Thus," says Professor Borchard, "the President, and the House and Senate also, were misled into taking a position which had no foundation either in law or common sense." So the President found that it served his purpose to misstate the cause of the War of 1812, and to ignore the causes by which the country was dragged into the war of 1917. For he said in his message, "Our next deviation by statute from the sound principles of neutrality and peace through international law did not come for 130 years. It was the so-called Neutrality Act of 1935." The embargo resolution to which the President refers was not a so-called or actual act of neutrality, nor did it affect in any way the concepts of peace or the principles of international law, but was a municipal regulation concerning the export of certain commodities.

We are not now concerned with the wisdom of this act, but what we are justly concerned about is the demand for its repeal, because of the exigencies of a new war between certain European nations; that the domestic and foreign policy of the United States is thus to be determined by European governments as it was in 1914 to 1919—that its repeal now would be unneutral, like the action on armed belligerent ships, and like it a step toward war. If, under the influence or coercion of the Executive, Congress repeals the embargo, it will be but a repetition of the methods of President Wilson by which he led the country into war in 1917.

The President also made the astonishing assertion that the embargo "had the effect of putting land powers on the same footing as naval powers," and denied to sea powers "the ancient right to buy anything anywhere" and to treat the high seas as private property. The President in his zeal forgets that one of the cardinal principles for which America fought in the World War was the freedom of the seas. The second clause of President Wilson's 14 points declared that the seas should be free in both peace and war outside of territorial waters for the movement of peaceful commerce. Great Britain contemptuously scrapped that resolution at the peace conference. Now President Roosevelt justifies Great Britain in discarding the principles of President Wilson for which Americans were told they fought the war.

The President says again that the repeal of the embargo and the manufacture of arms and munitions in this country for Great Britain and France will relieve unemployment, but to what purpose? It would increase employment and enable a few to get rich, but how will it profit the American people as a whole to use up the Nation's essential mineral resources, its capital and labor, in the production of munitions of war and receive therefor useless gold to bury in the ground, gold that no foreign nation wants, and of as little utility in our national economy as the old defaulted bonds. Great Britain and her Allies bought in the United States during the World War a total of $11,500,000,000 worth of all commodities. They paid about $2,000,000,000 on account of these purchases, or about 17 percent. The balance of $9,500,000,000, or 83 percent, was advanced by the United States Treasury from Liberty loans, for which it took the I O U's of Britain and her Allies. The I O U's subsequently converted into bonds have never been paid, and the American taxpayer has been and is still paying off the Liberty bonds which indirectly paid for the nine and a half billion dollars' worth of purchases in this country by Great Britain and her Allies. Profits for a few, but disaster for the many.

The message, because of its inaccuracy, is not a good lawyer's brief for one of the belligerents; much less is it the work of a responsible statesman whose words and acts determine so vital an issue as peace or war.

THE NEUTRALITY BILL

The administration's so-called neutrality bill just reported to the Senate shows to what extremes of inconsistency and contradiction men will go once they have embarked on an unwise and hazardous course. When President Roosevelt departed from the wise and historic course of the founders of the Republic of strict noninterference in the controversies and wars between foreign nations and resorted to violent denunciation, threats of quarantine, and acts short of war against foreign governments he violated the fundamental duties and principles of neutrality and thereby forfeited the rights of a neutral and embarked the Nation on a sea of uncertainty. Further pursuing this dubious and unwise course Mr. Roosevelt was the first President of the United States to proclaim a conditional and partial neutrality in a foreign war. Even President Wilson in 1914 declared for a course of strict and impartial neutrality but under the influence and machinations of Colonel House at the dictates of the British Government, he was prevailed upon step by step to depart from that course and at last to plunge the Nation into war. Certainly this gross betrayal of national interest is no precedent nor justification for any administration thereafter to play shuttlecock with the interest, peace, and safety of the Nation, or to depart from its long-established course of honest neutrality and nonintervention in disputes and wars of foreign governments.

As evidence of the inconsistency and confusion in which the administration has involved itself and the Nation, it now proposes to remove the embargo against the supply of arms and munitions to nations at war and substitute therefor an embargo on American merchant ships to exclude them from 80 percent of the trade routes of the world. Thus, it is more important to make the country a base of supply of munitions of war for foreign governments than to maintain our peaceful ships of commerce on the sea. As our Nation grew strong and pursued a course of impartial neutrality, it was able to assert and maintain its neutral rights to carry on peaceful commerce throughout the world for a century, despite all the wars that ensued. It is only in the last and present wars when Great Britain, a naval power, is at war with a constitutional power and we become a quasi belligerent that our ships are endangered or as now proposed to scuttle them from the seas. If in disregard of the Nation's vital interest, peace, and security, the arms embargo is repealed at the behest of foreign government, even then there will be no necessity because of this to embargo the American merchant fleet from the seas, except in the immediate war zones in western Europe. Despite the fact that our Government took sides in the last war almost from the beginning, our loss in ships was trivial. For the 3 years 1914 to 1917, when diplomatic relations were severed with Germany, the loss in ships was but 20,000 tons and the loss in lives only three, and these were seamen on an American tanker in a British naval convoy. These losses were but a small fraction of the annual peacetime losses from storms and accidents at sea. The immediate issue that brought the declaration of war was the sinking of armed British ships with Americans aboard.

This alien-motivated, ill-considered, and unbaked proposal, obviously derived from no American interests, registers zero minus in American statecraft.

Yes, we will gain some temporary employment in the manufacture of munitions, but what is to become of the half million employed on our ships and in foreign commerce? Does the Government propose to stop its merchant shipbuilding and let those ships it has built at enormous cost rot at the docks? The proposal to withdraw American ships from the seas in consequence of the administration's dangerous, revolutionary, and un-American foreign policy is preposterous and is no solution of the imbroglio in which it has involved the Nation. As a sop to the unwary, the act provides that munitions and implements of war are to be sold on a cash-and-carry basis, and then provides for their sale on credit to nations whose repudiated credit obligations now clutter up the vaults of the United States Treasury. It is safe to predict that once they have this Government committed in this nefarious business, their resourceful brains will devise means to escape payment as they did before.

Then the act empowers the President to do this, that, and the other by decree. The Constitution makes no provision for government by decree. The American people do not wish Congress to abdicate its constitutional powers to make all laws. If Congress does not know what to do under given circumstances, it should do nothing rather than thrust doubtful powers into the hands of the Executive, for history shows that it was the abuse of power again and again by the executive that caused the downfall of the Roman Republic. It was the abuse of executive power by President Wilson that enabled him to involve the country in the European World War. President Washington and the cofounders of the American Republic formulated its foreign policy which was reaffirmed in the Monroe Doctrine in 1823 in the following words: "Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe nevertheless remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it and to preserve those relations by frank, firm, and manly policy."

Does anyone believe that if Mr. Roosevelt had followed his country's long honored foreign policy, and during the numerous European crises had taken a calm and judicious course befitting the responsible head of a great and always peaceful nation that ours has been, and when war came, he had proclaimed an honest and impartial neutrality, as every President before him had done, in like circumstances, there would now be such doubt and anxiety among the people for the future, and fear of the Government involving them in another European war? If there is fear and uncertainty about the course of the Government it is because of its preoccupation and emotional emphasis on war; that instead a fixed and steadfast policy, the pursuit of a personal and whimsical "day to day" policy in foreign affairs; the decreeing of a "temporary emergency" when no conceivable emergency exists; the movements of fleets and councils of war; what means all these?

It must be obvious to all that the proponents of this bill protest too much. Apart from lifting the arms embargo, its real purpose, the rest is but sugar coating to make the dose palatable. The other provision of the bill, if enacted, will create such muddled and chaotic conditions that they will have to be promptly repealed once the removal of the arms embargo is achieved.

The emergent call of Congress for the enactment of this bill and the dissimulating course of the administration raises grave suspicion in the public mind that these may be similar tactics to those pursued by the Wilson administration in regard to the last war, as Secretary Lansing reveals in his memoirs. Colonel House had written to Ambassador Page and Sir Edward Grey, British Foreign Minister, "that 90 percent of the American people did not want the President to involve them in the war," that the people must be "guided," that the President was doing that, and thinks as "we" do. Lansing, in his memoirs, page 101, records that it was necessary "to determine upon a general course of action which would not abruptly challenge that opinion, but would guide it in the right direction. We had to show that everything had been done to avoid war to arouse a public demand for war."

It was by such tactics that the American people were befoozled into quitting their homes and country to fight in a foreign war; a war about which they cared little and knew nothing. The American people now, as then, have no cause or desire to go to war with any other people on earth, nor have any other people cause or desire to go to war with them, but the American people and their vast resources constitute the greatest war prize in the world if by intrigue or betrayal it can be captured and made to serve a European belligerent as in 1917. Because of this, there is a white war raging against the people of this country with all the resources that money and brains can devise to capture and draft America and Americans into another and redder war on the battlefields of Europe.

The wise old sovereign, Queen Elizabeth, of England, when her ministers got bellicose and talked of war, would point her finger and cry "No war, me Lords, no war." The sovereign people of the American Republic cannot point their fingers at the Executive and Congress where peace is kept or war is made, but they can meet in assembly as of old, in every city, town, and hamlet and by resolution, letter, and telegram to the White House and the Capitol proclaim as in one voice, "No war, me Lords, no war." Americans must make another Declaration of Independence against foreign dominance of their country and all who would make it a vassal of European empires.

The foregoing is not prompted by partisanship, for I supported Mr. Roosevelt with all the means at my disposal, for one reason, I thought his experience in public affairs and during the war would be a safeguard against the very situation that now confronts us.

WILLIAM F. WILMOTH,
Washington, D. C.

Julien N. Friant

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ORVILLE ZIMMERMAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 2, 1939

RESOLUTION BY MISSOURI DELEGATION IN CONGRESS

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution, unanimously adopted by the Missouri delegation in Congress at a special meeting held in the city of Washington, D. C., on the 31st day of October 1939:

Whereas on the 27th day of October 1939 death removed from the office of Special Assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. Julien N. Friant, one of Missouri's most outstanding citizens and a recognized national leader: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Representatives in Congress from Missouri, in special meeting assembled

1. That in the sudden and untimely death of Hon. Julien N. Friant, the Missouri delegation in Congress, and each member thereof, has lost a loyal friend who was always willing to render every possible assistance to them in the performance of their official duties.

2. That in his death not only has the State of Missouri, which he loved so well, lost one of its most widely known and useful citizens, but the Nation has lost one of its most outstanding leaders.

3. That we deeply mourn his passing and join with a nation of friends, and especially Members of Congress, in extending to his devoted family our deepest sympathy at this sad time in their lives.

4. That a copy of these resolutions be mailed to his family.

M. A. ROMJUE,
Chairman of Missouri Delegation in Congress.
ORVILLE ZIMMERMAN,
Acting Secretary.

Repeal of Embargo at Present Time Constitutes an Unneutral Act Under International Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the question of what should be the neutrality policy of this Nation has created such widespread interest that it now seems that every possible argument for or against repeal of the arms embargo has been advanced. No question since the World War has been more widely and seriously considered by all classes of our people. And yet, notwithstanding this general, almost universal, discussion, it does not seem to me that any adequate answer has been given to the charge that if we change our national policy of embargo, now that the war is under way, that we are thereby committing an unneutral act. There is no doubt that it is the fundamental desire of our people to remain neutral. The fear of involvement, with the consequent use of our boys in another European struggle, is so great that there is a unanimous demand that we shall remain neutral and commit no act that, directly or indirectly, has even the appearance of being unneutral.

Recognizing as we all do the necessity and advisability of avoiding any act that would place our Nation on one side or the other of the conflict, it seems to me that we cannot change our existing embargo policy without creating the thought that we have done so in order to benefit one of the belligerent parties as against the other. The fact is that the present policy of embargo was adopted as our national policy in 1935. It was reestablished in 1937 and is the law today. In each instance it had the approval of nearly the entire membership of both Houses of Congress together with the approval of the President and Secretary of State. It represented, without a doubt, the thought and desire of our people. There were two basic reasons that led to its adoption: First, an abhorrence of war and our unwillingness to be a party either directly or indirectly to the cruelties incident to war; and, second, to keep this Nation free of involvement in any and all wars. No policy of this Nation, foreign or domestic, adopted at any time in the entire history of our Nation, ever had greater or as great a unanimity of support from our people as the embargo policy, the repeal of which is now being sought. The nations of the world have recognized and accepted it as our national policy. The nations now engaged in war entered into hostilities with full knowledge that it was the law of our land. No nation can or will claim that it was not within the right and power of this Nation to adopt such an embargo policy if it so desired. Thus, the only question that is raised by the effort to repeal it is whether it is right to do so during a war between contending nations. The charge is made that to do so indicates a desire to favor one of the belligerent parties and will thereby constitute an unneutral act. It does not seem to me that this all-important question has been satisfactorily answered by those who seek to repeal the embargo.

It has not been made plain to me during the debate in the Senate and House as to how this Nation can be considered neutral when it deliberately changes its neutrality policy in an important feature so as to give aid to one of the belligerent parties. To do so cannot be construed in any other way than that we have intervened and thereby destroyed our vaunted neutrality and become a party at least indirectly, if not directly. What effect it will have upon the offended belligerent remains for the future. To say the least it creates a situation that may result in a course of conduct by such belligerent that would carry us against our present intention and desire into the war. Thus, even though our present action to repeal the embargo now existing may seem to some at this time only an indirect violation of our duty as a neutral, yet, it can, and I hope it would not, have the effect of taking us eventually into war. If the offended belligerent should feel justified in its own protection to commit some act against our Nation, sufficiently great to create national resentment upon our part, it would not be beyond the realm of possibility that the emotions of our people could be raised to the point where it might seem necessary to them to enter the war to sustain our national honor and dignity. All this can, and in all probability would, be avoided by our not changing at this time, while the war is in progress, our national policy with respect to an embargo against the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerents. We must not be blind to the danger that can easily arise as a result of our changing our neutrality policy in this important matter at this time.

The very meaning of neutrality is violated as soon as a neutral government changes its course to show partiality to one of the contending belligerents. The fact that we may have sympathy for one side or the other is not sufficient justification for changing our neutrality policy to assist that party. When it is done we lose our status as a neutral, in the true sense of the word and its accepted meaning in international law, because we thereby cease to be impartial. No one can contend that when such action occurs that we can rightfully continue to claim to be a neutral. Neutrality is judged by actions and not mere words declaring neutrality.

If consideration is to be given to established principles of international law, then there can be no doubt that to change our embargo law at this time, to benefit one of the belligerent parties, is an unneutral act. Time and again this principle has been advanced and accepted by our own Government and others. I do not believe it is disputed by those who are now seeking to repeal our embargo. Many of them have in fact directly or indirectly acknowledged it. It is too well established to do otherwise.

As an illustration of the adherence of our own Nation to this principle, permit me to recall the conditions that prevailed during the World War and the position taken by our Government with respect to changing our law, after the war had started, with respect to the shipment of arms and ammunition to Great Britain. At the time war was declared there was no embargo against shipment of arms and ammunition to nations at war. Consequently Great Britain and her Allies, having control of the seas, took full advantage of it and shipment of arms and ammunition to them was carried on. In December 1914, after the outbreak of war, several bills were introduced in Congress to place an embargo upon the shipment of war material to belligerent nations. The British Government immediately, through Sir Edward Grey, protested to our Government that the enactment of such a law would be "special legislation passed while war is in progress and therefore would constitute an unneutral act toward the belligerents that can profit by it." Thus, it will be recognized that Great Britain based its claim upon the same principle of international law that is now involved. The only difference is that in that instance Great Britain claimed the benefit of a principle that it now seeks to have this Nation deny. In other words, to use a common expression, the shoe is on the other foot, and it pinches.

It is equally interesting to see what position our Government took in that case which, as a lawyer would say, is on all fours with the present case so far as the principle involved is concerned. President Wilson and Mr. Lansing, counselor of the Department of State, upheld the British view that to change our law in such an important feature after hostilities had commenced would be an unneutral act toward one of the belligerent parties, namely, Great Britain, which at the time was in a position to profit by the absence of any restriction or embargo.

The position of this Government with respect to the principle of international law raised by Great Britain and, which I repeat, is the same principle now raised by those who oppose repeal of the embargo, was declared in a note issued April 21, 1915, as follows:

> This Government holds, as I believe Your Excellency is aware, and as it is constrained to hold in view of the present indisputable doctrines of accepted international law, that any change in its own laws of neutrality during the progress of a war which would affect unequally the relations of the United States with the nations at war would be an unjustifiable departure from the principle of strict neutrality by which it has consistently sought to direct its actions.

Thus, in 1915 our Government adhered to the established principle of international law that a change in our neutrality policy, in an important matter vitally affecting one of the belligerent parties, would be a direct violation of the principles of neutrality. It is this same principle that opponents of embargo repeal now claim governs the present issue; and to disregard it by repeal of the Embargo Act is to place our Nation in the undesirable position of committing an unneutral act and thereby destroying our status as a neutral. Other and equally pertinent illustrations of the acceptance of this principle could be given, all of which would demonstrate that our Nation, as well as the other nations of the world, have accepted and acknowledged this principle as established by international law. To repeal the present embargo will, therefore, mean a reversal upon our part of our long-established practice of recognition of established principles of international law in our dealing with other governments. The result of such a change at this time would be to create an uncertain future fraught with danger.

Strange as it may seem, many of those now advocating repeal of the embargo, adopted by Congress and accepted by the people of our country as the best possible means of demonstrating our desire to avoid the horrors of war and remain at peace, are willing to concede that such a repeal at this time is an unneutral act, but, justify it upon the ground that this is in effect "our war," and that we are in duty bound to participate to the extent of shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war. This is a dangerous philosophy if carried to its logical conclusion. Condemnation of the methods used by aggressors, though sufficient to create natural sympathy for those who have been the subject of aggression, is not sufficient to justify the thought that it is "our war" when another nation, with rights it deems necessary to protect, declares war. Neither sympathy or prejudice should dictate our national course to the extent of taking sides in a European war. To do so is to set in motion circumstances that may lead us to grave consequences. We cannot afford at this time to adopt any course that would mean, either now or eventually, the abandonment of our status as a neutral. We can only preserve our right to the privileges and immunities of a neutral by observing our duties as a neutral. We cannot discard the duties of a neutral without losing the rights of a neutral. The safe and sane course for our Nation to pursue in these troublesome and treacherous times is to remain neutral in the fullest sense of the word, and, as such, be entitled to the rights and privileges accorded a neutral as well as accepting the duties incident thereto.

It would be well to ponder, in times such as these, the words of advice and counsel contained in that memorable Farewell Address of the greatest of all American statesmen, the immortal Washington, reading as follows:

> So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducement of justification: It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate, in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld. And it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favorite nation) facility to betray, or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding, with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

Reflect and consider the application of these words to the issue that now confronts us. To do so will show the judgment and wisdom of retaining without change at this time the embargo features of our neutrality policy.

Thankful for Fine Folks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM L. NELSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I have many times given expression to the thought that I am one of the most fortunate men in the world, privileged to represent almost 300,000 of the best people to be found. Truly they are fine folks—yes; they are Missouri "folks," not "folk."

During discussion of the neutrality question, I have felt myself especially favored. While I have heard frequent reference to bitter or threatening letters received by Members of Congress, few such have reached me, and almost without exception these have not been from the Second Congressional District of Missouri, which it is my privilege to represent. In fact, I could count on my fingers all the real mean letters I have ever received from constituents, and this covers more than a dozen years in Congress.

A flood of letters seldom reaches my office. The folks back home, while knowing that I am always glad to have their opinions on any subject, apparently are willing to trust me to take such action as seems best. In this connection I quote from a letter the like of which I am sure any Member of Congress would be glad to have:

NEW FRANKLIN, MO., October 25, 1939.

Hon. WILL L. NELSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. NELSON: I read in the papers that there are plenty of people telling other people to write to their Congressmen how to vote on the neutrality bill. Now, Mr. NELSON, my opinion is that about 98 out of every 100 do not know a gol darn thing about that bill. I will admit I do not, and I read all the time about the bill. You vote to your own satisfaction on the neutrality bill. We elected you to attend to the business for us. As far as I know, you have made good.

Wishing you all of the good things in life and success for you, also your good family, let me sign myself

Your friend and supporter,

———.

Because the people I represent have been so tolerant, kind, and considerate, I am glad publicly to express my deep appreciation.

It is true that at a time like this, when real problems perplex, when it is difficult to know what is best, and when many, and this applies to both sides of the question, are influenced by gross exaggeration or propaganda of large proportions, we may expect strong expressions of individual views. At such times we would do well to remember the words of Abraham Lincoln, who said, "If we could first know where we are, and whither we are tending, we could better judge what to do and how to do it."

All of us are equally earnest in our desire for peace. "If we could first know," all of us would be together. Personally, in supporting the neutrality bill, it is my view that it is better to let our goods go and keep our boys at home.

But getting back to the Thangsgiving thought I had in mind, I am truly thankful for such a constituency as is mine, and I would add, thankful for such a country as is ours. As we approach another Thanksgiving Day, with our country at peace with all the world, and God grant that it may continue so, it seems to me that there should be no debate as to the proper Thanksgiving date. Every day should be a Thanksgiving Day in America. Voicing this view, I recently received a post card from a constituent, who said, "It's great to live in a country where you carry a camera instead of a gun, and a picnic lunch instead of a gas mask."

So, Mr. Speaker, I challenge any colleague, even the Speaker of the House, sir, to show that he represents finer people than are to be found in the heart of Missouri.

America's Chance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WESLEY E. DISNEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

BOOK REVIEW FROM WASHINGTON EVENING STAR

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following review of a book entitled "America's Chance of Peace," by Duncan Aikman and Blair Bolles:

[From the Washington Evening Star of November 1, 1939]

AMERICA HELD ABLE TO STAY OUT OF WAR—NEW BOOK SURVEYS PEACE PROSPECTS AND FINDS THEM BRIGHT

America's Chance of Peace: By Duncan Aikman and Blair Bolles. Published by Doubleday, Doran & Co., Inc., New York

On the Labor Day week-end when war broke out in Europe, America was deeply apprehensive, fearful that history would repeat itself to the point of drawing us into a new holocaust not of our making. Nervously fatalistic, too many people uttered dire prophecies that "we'll be in before Christmas."

To many who preferred not to be dogmatic about the future but were seriously disturbed at the prospects, it seemed unbelievable that our Government could find any justification for leading us into Europe's war. But many of the words and the small actions of the Government were far from reassuring; intentionally or otherwise, they were spawning a definite war psychology within our own country.

Fortunately, at least from the viewpoint of those who want no part of another war, the first month of hostilities brought some revisions in the pattern which had first appeared to be taking shape. In the first place, no swift shambles of either civilian or military death occurred to outrage the neutral world. In the second place, the fundamental unwillingness of the American people to rush into Europe's war apparently became more fully impressed upon Washington officialdom. The time had fully arrived for a careful and realistic appraisal of America's chances for remaining at peace.

Against this background, Duncan Aikman and Blair Bolles set out to do a newspaperman's job, namely, to write an accurate and informative piece and to do it in a hurry. In the opinion of this reviewer, they succeeded well and when more exhaustive histories of these important years are being written it is probable that no more pertinent comparisons between 1939 and 1914 will be drawn than those hustled into print by these two.

Of America's chance of peace, they found, in brief, much that was most encouraging.

They found, for instance, that machinery not only was in existence to cushion the economic and financial effects of a major war upon our domestic economy but that almost without the pushing of an extra button that machinery operated effectively when the war began. It was not so in 1914.

They found that instead of being prepared for neither peace nor war on the industrial and military fronts as in 1914, today we have at hand and partly in operation programs of mobilization which by making us strong should help to keep us at peace.

They found, and perhaps this is most important of all, that we are smarter today than in 1914, both as a people and as a Government; in other words, that we are not accepting the glib propaganda with which Europe flooded this country 25 years ago, and that official Washington today is getting its "inside stuff" from a smart, hard-working bunch of reportorial diplomats instead of the ingenuous tea-tilters of those other days.

In one of the very best chapters of their book, the authors describe how Secretary of State "Scoop" Hull and his staff of foreign "correspondents" have consistently been on top of every European development (except the Russo-German pact) days or even months before it became public knowledge. The importance of this accurate alertness in permitting this Government to chart its own course for peace is obvious; the excellence of the job is magnified by comparison with the diplomatic fumbling of 1914–18.

Boiled down, their conclusion is that we are on a relatively even keel today because there has been intelligent foresight displayed; from now on the most important requirement is that we "think things through." Following such a formula, the authors believe, America need never go to war unless or until her true self interests dictate that such course should be followed.

In the minds of many, these true self-interests do not cross the lines of Europe's power politics.

J. C. H.

We Are All American or No Part American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, with the European war becoming more and more serious, it is high time that we attend to our own problems on this side of the Atlantic Ocean. For some time I have been concerned about the alien activities in this country; and I have repeatedly expressed myself publicly on this score. For a time, in fact, I had thought that Congress had really begun to curb these activities and that, at least for the time being, we as a Nation were safe from within. I now learn that the lull which we noticed in the program of un-American activities throughout the Nation has perhaps been due to the fact that these forces were being utilized in an underground and subversive manner, being kept from the light of day and from the glare of publicity.

The business of conducting a government in this great country is really serious business even in normal times, but with the great conflagration in Europe it is doubly serious. In my opinion, this is no time to mollycoddle the alien and no time to be very deferential to his views. It is true that we want to preserve the Bill of Rights which guarantees free people certain "inalienable rights" everywhere. On the other hand, we as a nation cannot hope to maintain the very guaranties of which we boast and at the same time to continue to permit the gnawing processes of the bund and the Communist to proceed without interruption and without molestation.

We are engaged at the present time in the effort to maintain this Nation in a state of peace and tranquility. We know what war is and I, for one, do not want to see a great peaceful people thrown into the jealousies, the hatreds, and the strife of the Old World. Our task is difficult, but the obstacles, while great, are not insurmountable. We must not relax our vigil, but we must continue our efforts to keep this Nation at peace.

While we are engaged in the tremendous work, the subversive interests ply their nefarious designs. The Dies committee established by the House of Representatives has recently uncovered much evidence of alien influence and propaganda. While I know nothing regarding the credibility of the witnesses who may have come before the committee, the number of them and the multiplicity of the charges made, without contradiction, indicates, in my opinion, only too well the lurking presence of these under-cover activities which have for their purposes the undermining of our institutions and our form of government. That groups of people in our own land can continue to praise foreign governments at the expense of our own Government and can continue to foment trouble at home when the world is literally on fire is unthinkable.

A number of days ago the Dies committee, which was established by the House of Representatives and is maintained by the Government funds, published a list of 558 Government employees who, it was said, were members of the American League for Peace and Democracy. It was further reported that this organization claims a membership of almost 4,000,000 people in the United States. The Dies committee has been engaged in investigating un-American activities and in making regular reports to the press throughout the country. Accumulated facts have proven that the American League for Peace and Democracy is a "Communist front" organization. Earl Browder, head of the Communist movement in America, has always been vice chairman of the league. The Communist organization in the United States is the heaviest single contributor in funds to the League for Peace and Democracy. Its program has been essentially communistic.

I do not pass judgment upon any single individual whose name appears on this list. It is possible that many employees of the United States Government, also members of the League for Peace and Democracy, may not have known the history and fundamental purposes of the league. It is entirely possible that some of those whose names appeared on the list may never have been members of the organization and their names may have been included in this list through error. Some, however, have already openly admitted membership, and a few Government employees have stated that they were proud of this membership.

A public servant is paid by funds raised from the entire public by taxation. Before taking over his office, he is required to swear that he "will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic"; that he "will bear true faith and allegiance to the same." A Government employee owes a higher duty to the Nation as a whole than does the average individual; and he should set an example of loyalty and patriotism to his Government. A real Communist cannot bear "true faith and allegiance" to his Government nor can he "support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic."

The public has watched the work of the Department of Justice in the Earl Browder case with great interest. I personally hope that this case marks the beginning of real efforts on the part of the Justice Department to bring to account a large number of the Communists who have assiduously worked, both by day and by night, to build up a great organization in America with fundamental principles at varience with those of democratic government and with objectives intended to break down our Constitution and our Bill of Rights.

I have read with much concern the news of sabotage in Government contract factories and espionage in some of the agencies in our Government—especially that of the Army and the Navy. I have been informed of the delivery of contracts for both Army and Navy being held up because of alien and un-American activity in the manufacture of merchandise very necessary for our own safety.

The debates in the House of Representatives during the past few years have shown conclusively the effect of a widespread passport fraud racket. This racket has its ramifications into foreign nations and should be broken up. Evidence has been presented to some of the committees in the House of Representatives to show that in certain instances that the German Bund has been engaged in military drills and in carrying arms in this country. As evidence proceeds in rapid pace in the present critical condition of world affairs, I will not be surprised to see increased alien activity, more widespread sabotage, and intensified activity on the part of those who in thought, principle, and allegiance daily strive to render our Government powerless.

As a Member of Congress, each week I receive literature and publications written by Communists for the benefit of the Communist movement in America. Only today I received a magazine entitled "The Communist," and with the inscription on its front cover stating "Twenty Years of the Communist Party of the United States of America, 1919–39." This magazine shows on its first pages the editors to be Earl Browder, Alex Bittlemen, and V. J. Jerome. Numerous persons are contributors to its writings, and it is interesting to note that titles of several articles are as follows: First, "Remarks on the Twentieth Anniversary of Communist Party of the United States of America"; second, "Twenty Years of Communist Trade-Union Policy"; and, third, "The Soviet and the American People." These magazines, booklets, and writings come from I know not where, but I do know that they use the United States mail as a means of circulation.

The fact that the Communist Party is actually entering candidates for election in local and congressional elections in a number of States throughout the Nation constitutes a matter of vital concern to our people. The fact that these candidates poll an insignificant vote should not justify us in overlooking a serious situation.

We have reached a time in the history of our Nation which is critical. We have met in this Congress for the purpose of preserving American neutrality. Influences from across the oceans seek to influence our actions and to affect our unbiased judgment. At this critical time the Communist and the German Bund intensify their subversive and slimy activities. We do not want, and will not countenance, any infringement of our rights of freedom of speech and of conscience. At the same time, if these rights are to remain inviolate, our Government must remain powerful enough to enforce them. The time for action has then come. No better reason can exist tomorrow than existed today. Vigorous, unrelenting, and determined action to ferret out all of these subversive activities, to break them up, and to bring them to the bar of justice is immediately necessary. Investigation should exonerate those upon whom the shadows of suspicion have unjustly fallen and should penalize severely those who have been guilty of subversive activities and by doing so violate our laws. At this critical time we are either all American or no part American. And speaking in behalf of the overwhelming majority of 130,000,000 of our people, in the language of the poet, I say we are—

Not for Moscow,
Not for Berlin,
Not for Rome!
But for country,
God, and home!

American Rights Upon the High Seas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

LETTER BY WOODROW WILSON

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I wish to insert in the RECORD the following letter from President Wilson to Senator William J. Stone. The letter makes pertinent observations relative to American rights upon the high seas:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., February 25, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I very warmly appreciate your kind and frank letter of today, and feel that it calls for an equally frank reply.

You are right in assuming that I shall do everything in my power to keep the United States out of war. I think the country will feel no uneasiness about my course in that respect. Through many anxious months I have striven for that object, amid difficulties more manifold than can have been apparent upon the surface, and so far I have succeeded. I do not doubt that I shall continue to succeed. The course which the Central European Powers have announced their intention of following in the future with regard to undersea warfare seems for the moment to threaten insuperable obstacles, but its apparent meaning is so manifestly inconsistent with explicit assurances recently given us by those powers with regard to their treatment of merchant vessels on the high seas that I must believe that explanations will presently ensue which will put a different aspect upon it. We have had no reason to question their good faith or their fidelity to their promises in the past, and I, for one, feel confident that we shall have none in the future.

But, in any event, our duty is clear. No nation—no group of nations—has the right, while war is in progress, to alter or disregard the principles which all nations have agreed upon in mitigation of the horrors and sufferings of war; and if the clear rights of American citizens should very unhappily be abridged or denied by any such action we should, it seems to me, have in honor no choice as to what our own course should be.

For my own part I cannot consent to any abridgment of the rights of American citizens in any respect. The honor and self-respect of the Nation is involved. We covet peace, and shall preserve it at any cost but the loss of honor. To forbid our people to exercise their rights for fear we might be called upon to vindicate them would be a deep humiliation, indeed. It would be an implicit, all but an explicit, acquiescence in the violation of the rights of mankind everywhere, and of whatever nation or allegiance. It would be a deliberate abdication of our hitherto proud position as spokesman, even amid the turmoil of war, for the law and the right. It would make everything this Government has attempted, and everything that it has accomplished during this terrible struggle of nations meaningless and futile.

It is important to reflect that if, in this instance, we allowed expediency to take the place of principle the door would inevitably be opened to still further concessions. Once accept a single abatement of right, and many other humiliations would follow, and the whole fine fabric of international law might crumble under our hands piece by piece. What we are contending for in this matter is of the very essence of the things that have made America a sovereign Nation. She cannot yield them without conceding her own impotency as a Nation, and making virtual surrender of her independent position among the nations of the world.

I am speaking, my dear Senator, in deep solemnity, without heat, with a clear consciousness of the high responsibilities of my office, and as your sincere and devoted friend. If we should unhappily differ, we shall differ as friends, but where issues so momentous as these are involved we must, just because we are friends, speak our minds without reservation.

Faithfully yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Senator WILLIAM J. STONE,
United States Senate.

Conditions in China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT LUCE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

STATEMENT BY ROGER W. BABSON, OF WELLESLEY, MASS., MADE IN HONOLULU OCTOBER 9, 1939

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made in Honolulu by my constituent, Roger W. Babson, well-known economist, upon returning from a 2-month stay in the Orient:

The Japanese people are an industrious and friendly group, but the Japanese military compares only with Stalin and Hitler at their worst. The attack upon China will go down into history as most brutal and unjustified. These uncontrolled Japanese military leaders attacked China only because China at last was trying to make something of itself. They feared what China might do to Japanese business when the Chinese secured machinery and got into production. They boldly admit that it was "now or never" for them.

ASTOUNDED BY DESTRUCTION

I was astounded at the destruction which I saw with my own eyes. In addition, I talked personally with trustworthy consuls, businessmen, and missionaries who had just come from the interior. They all agree that the Japanese soldiers—of which there are now over a million in China—are acting like a bunch of ruthless, disappointed wild men. Murder, rape, torture, and destruction are mild words for their crimes.

The Chinese who normally are a peace-loving race have become tremendously stirred. They have reacted as ruthless madmen. In self-defense they have resorted to the most brazen trickery and guerrilla warfare. There are almost no military battles but the war consists of the burning of cities and the shooting of one another in small groups everywhere and anywhere.

The most hopeful sign to the whole "incident" is the movement of 40,000,000 Chinese from the crowded cities of eastern China to the rich and undeveloped Provinces of western China with their machinery, tools, and livestock. Hundreds of factories—both large and small—have been moved bodily a thousand miles into the interior. Railroad tracks are being taken up today and carried on the backs of coolies hundreds of miles inland while thousands of new cooperative industries are being started in this new western territory.

SMUGGLING IS COMMON

Japan today holds China's ports, although a tremendous amount of smuggling is going on both in and out. The cities and highways are controlled by the Japanese miltary westward from the coast to a line running south from Peiping through Hankow to Canton. Yet there are millions of Chinese in this territory who have never yet seen a Japanese soldier.

West of this line there remain 300,000,000 Chinese who continue to go about their work as usual—raising crops and raising children.

In the meantime, Chiang Kai-shek and his central government are now impregnably situated at Chungking. About once in 2 weeks this capital is bombed, but these bombers do little harm. But how long can they continue without funds?

It is foolish for anyone to forecast how long this Japanese-Chinese war will last. It is generally believed that the Chinese birth rate alone will ultimately crowd the Japanese Army out of China. From what I saw in Japan the war is becoming a great strain, and the Japanese probably are sorry that they started it. On the other hand, unless Chiang Kai-shek is given more loans by the United States, or, at least, unless we shut off supplies to the Japanese Army, he is in a very precarious condition.

In reality, China is fighting our battles for us. This especially applies to the people of our industrial areas. The present attitude of the United States in helping the Japanese military put China out of business seems suicidal to me. Our people should make every effort to at least support Chiang Kai-shek until the present European war is over when England and France are free to take a hand. In doing so the United States will accomplish five things:

1. Check Japan in its determined fanatical religious belief that it is destined to rule all Asia, including the Hawaiian Islands.

2. Head off Russia from forcing communism upon China as payment for helping China defend itself against Japan.

3. Perform a humane service by saving from murder and torture 25,000,000 innocent men, women, and children.

4. Save valuable American trade and shipping which we greatly need to restore employment in the United States.

5. Protect $500,000,000 worth of missionary property which has taken us 100 years to establish and which is doing a tremendous amount of good.

In short, we are now tolerating wrong. If we continue to do this, we some day will be punished.

The Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

LETTER BY EDWARD E. KENNEDY

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, shortly we will have finished the neutrality legislation. During its consideration the leaders of the Congress determined that the Congress would not take up any other legislation until neutrality legislation was out of the way. As a result, the House has stood idly by for over a month, when it could have been giving consideration to many important matters. I hope that the Congress will not adjourn at this time but will continue in session during the remainder of the year, and take up the domestic problems which are knocking at our doors for solution. We have the unemployment problem, farm legislation, and many other very urgent matters of legislation before us, which should have consideration at an early date. Furthermore, during the progress of the European war it is very essential that the Congress remain in session, so that it may be available for consideration of any emergency legislation that may arise. Particularly is that true with reference to the neutrality legislation itself which we will have passed. It may require amendments which will present themselves as soon as the statute is put into operation. Bearing upon these problems, I include as a part of my remarks a letter I received today from Mr. Edward E. Kennedy, under date of November 1, 1939. Mr. Kennedy is a student of farm problems, and his observations are noteworthy. The letter follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 1, 1939.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The first 9 months of 1939 compared with the first 9 months of 1938 indicates a great increase in agricultural imports into the United States and a great decrease of agricultural exports from the United States. In the 9 months of 1939 we imported farm products for consumption in the amount of $794,700,000 while in the same period in 1938 we purchased farm products in the amount of $711,600,000. For the same periods our agricultural exports declined from $602,700,000 in 1938 to $418,400,000 in 1939.

While all in the United States are being diverted from consideration of serious problems of agriculture and unemployment by the present dramatic attempt to lift the embargo and increase the exports of arms, munitions, and implements of war, little is being said and nothing is being done to protect our farmers from imports at below our cost-of-production prices or to sell our excess food and fiber to the world.

To lift the embargo now, would we not be choosing between the munitions makers and warmongers on the one hand and our Nation's 6,800,000 farmers on the other—choosing between "fool's gold" and fools' profits on the one hand and our own peace and security on the other—choosing between the national defense of a foreign state and the national defense of our own beloved country?

Is there even one valid, patriotic reason why we should lift the arms embargo now? Would it not be both patriotic and wise to retain the embargo on arms, munitions, and implements of war—settling this question decisively. Then, at once, turn our attention to assuring our farmers the cost of production, plus a profit—protect our home farm market from invasion by foreigners, build our prosperity upon our own basic industry, agriculture, give employment opportunities to our own labor at an adequate annual wage.

"Why quit our own to stand on foreign ground; why by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?"

Why quit our own?

Sincerely,

EDW. E. KENNEDY.

Minneapolis—W. P. A. Persecution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEE E. GEYER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I believe the Members of the House of Representatives, meeting to pass an adequate neutrality law, should know how, in Minneapolis, Minn., another law recently passed by this body is being used in an attempt to destroy the civil rights of labor, to persecute American citizens, and to further the political advantage of certain individuals and groups.

The basis of this vicious attempt is the Minneapolis W. P. A. strike and the present mass trials of 163 defendants charged with criminal conspiracy as a result of participating in that strike.

It is not necessary to go into detail about the strike itself. It is sufficient to understand: (1) the strike began spontaneously when W. P. A. employees learned of the provisions of the Woodrum Act, undermining their already precarious existence; (2) that unions finally offered leadership in order to give the mass protest orderliness and direction; (3) that strike leaders requested Minnesota W. P. A. administrator, Linus Glotzbach, to close projects in order to relieve tension and establish a situation where calmness and reason could be applied to settle the difficulties—a request which was refused; (4) a false report was given Nation-wide circulation that a Minneapolis policeman was killed in the strike, arousing bitter public resentment against the strike and against the W. P. A. workers; (5) that the strike came to an end after the sewing project violence occurred in which scores were wounded and a bystander was killed.

In this atmosphere of bitterness and public tension, the Federal grand jury was called to investigate charges of violence in the strike. Out of that investigation came the 163 felony indictments, the excessive bails amounting to nearly a million dollars, and the present mass trials.

No one contends that those who participated in violence should be excused. I am not speaking in defense of lawlessness and disorder. I am, rather, deploring the inept manner in which public officials handled the situation; I am putting myself on record in protest against permitting under the name of "prosecution of lawlessness" the persecution of scores of decent, law-abiding fellow citizens. I am maintaining that under the cloak of bringing the guilty to justice we should not permit an attack upon labor's hard-won rights to organize and a further attack upon the basic rights of citizens generally, guaranteed in the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, namely, the right to free speech, the right to nonexcessive bail, and the right to a fair and impartial trial—referring to the mass characters of the trials.

In viewing the situation in Minneapolis these questions arise: If some strikers become hot-headed and get into fist fights, why were they not dealt with as police-court cases, which is customary? Why were they, instead, charged with conspiracy and faced with penitentiary terms? Is this awful consequence of strike participation a threat to intimidate labor? Why was there such a wholesale round-up of Minneapolis people whose crimes were no greater than mere presence where a fist fight occurred, or who were not even present but were simply officers of a group agreeing to leave their project when the picketing began, while in no other city in the country where W. P. A. employees participated in the Nation-wide strike were strikers prosecuted?

One of my main reasons for bringing this situation to your attention is that with a war abroad, partisan groups are seeking to take advantage of war emotions at home to destroy the rights of fellow Americans in order to advance their own political or partisan interests.

Mr. Speaker, I protest the use to which the Woodrum Act is being put in Minneapolis. I protest it to the Congress of the United States, I protest it to the Attorney General of the United States, I protest it to the President of the United States; and I invite every man present who believes in the fundamental rights of the people to join me in this protest so that the people in Minneapolis and elsewhere in the country may know that there are men on the floor of Congress who refuse to allow such flagrant attacks upon their and our civil liberties to go unchallenged.

The Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, I have just sent to the House Foreign Affairs Committee a resolution presented by a committee of three young women, Miss Hazel Smith, Miss Mildred Hotchkiss, and Miss Gladys Nystrup, signed by a group of representative citizens of my own home town, Wethersfield, Conn. Wethersfield is the oldest town in the State of Connecticut, having been settled in 1634. The history of Wethersfield proves that its sons have fought in every war in which the United States has participated. Many of her young men gave their lives in the Civil War, Spanish-American War, and, during the World War, she far exceeded her quota.

At the present time, however, the citizens of Wethersfield, as indicated by the petition I have filed, are unanimous in the desire that the United States keep out of the war now going on in Europe. They are opposed to repealing the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war. When 300 residents of a small community turn out on a rainy night to listen to an address on neutrality and repeal of the arms embargo, it indicates unusual interest. This audience was overwhelmingly in favor of retention of the arms embargo.

Repeal of the Arms Embargo—Road to War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAMILTON FISH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HAMILTON FISH, OF NEW YORK

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I include the following radio speech delivered by me over the National Broadcasting System, Saturday evening, October 28, 1939:

I hope there is a large unseen radio audience listening to my remarks this evening, and that they will be aroused to their responsibility to make known their wishes to their Representatives in Congress to stop the sale of arms, ammunition, poisonous gas, and deadly weapons to belligerent nations and our march toward war.

Never, in almost 20 years of service in the Congress, have I spoken on any issue that was so close to my heart, and upon the outcome of which I believed the safety and security of the American people and our Nation depended.

The Senate, by a vote of 60 to 33, repealed the arms embargo last night, and the scene of conflict has now shifted back to the House of Representatives. As ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the responsibility falls upon me to lead the fight in the House to restore the arms embargo and thereby serve notice on the nations of the world that we intend to keep out of all foreign entanglements and wars, unless we are attacked or the Monroe Doctrine is violated by the invasion of the American continent by the armed forces of European or Asiatic nations.

The magnitude of the task appalls me, but if the people back home will do their part by letters and telegrams to their Representatives, regardless of party affiliations, we will win through to victory this week and stop the selling of lethal weapons and poisonous gas by a close vote in the House of Representatives.

I appeal to you in behalf of a great American issue that transcends all party lines. The final vote may determine whether we will have peace or war within the next 6 months or a year.

On such an issue there can be no compromise, shadow boxing, or pussyfooting. Win or lose, the fight must be fought out to a final showdown. Every Member of Congress that votes for repeal will have to face his peace-loving constituents and explain his reasons for gambling with the lives of their sons in order to sell arms and ammunition for blood money and war profits.

I appeal particularly to the people of New Jersey, for if they will cooperate in asking that their representatives vote for the arms embargo, as they did last June, we will avoid the first step toward war and possibly hasten peace in Europe. I am fearful that the sale of deadly weapons and poison gas may prolong the disastrous European war.

As a veteran of the World War, who served 15 months in Europe in the last war, I shall never vote to sell deadly weapons for profit and thereby help dig the grave of a single American soldier in foreign lands.

The arms embargo in itself may not be the decisive or compelling factor, but it is the symbol as to whether we are to take sides and participate in the European war. I do not, from a careful study of the facts, believe that England and France want or need our arms and ammunition, as they have huge factories employing scores of thousands of women making cannon and shells at much less than the cost in America. They have built enormous airplane plants which in the next few months will be producing more than Germany. They do want the repeal of the arms embargo as a symbol that we are ready to intervene on their side as the first step. They think—and possibly rightly—that the two next steps will follow logically—that of financing the war after we are sufficiently involved and later on sending our soldiers to the shambles of Europe.

I honestly believe that the arms traffic will be followed by the traffic in the lives of our sons. The question is, Do the American people want to send their boys to blood baths in Europe for sake of the dollar sign? Do they want to hire them out like Hessians for 30 pieces of silver that some Americans may reap a harvest of war profits? The people alone can stop it, and stop it now, by swamping their Representatives with requests to vote against the repeal of the arms embargo.

I endorse wholeheartedly and without reservation the remarks made by President Roosevelt at Chautauqua, N. Y., in 1936, in favor of prohibiting the sale of deadly weapons to belligerent nations: "If war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fools' gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality. * * * To resist the clamor of that greed, if war should come, would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace. * * * If we face the choice of profits or peace, the Nation will answer—must answer—'We choose peace.'"

In order not to inject partisanship into this great American issue of trying to keep America out of war, I will refrain from making any comments on the President's changed attitude. The people can judge for themselves and make their own conclusions.

The sale of arms and ammunition to belligerent nations for sake of blood money and war profits is an utterly unmoral, un-Christian, and vicious system, turning the United States into a slaughterhouse to kill people with whom we are at peace, and dragging us into wars all over the world.

I have devoted 20 years of my life in trying to promote the welfare, peace, and security of the American people, and I am not willing to sacrifice their lives at the siren call of war profits and the almighty dollar, or to fight other people's battles.

All of Europe's blood-smeared dollars are not worth the life of a single American soldier.

We went to war once, as we were told, to make the world safe for democracy, and what a mockery and tragedy that turned out to be. Most of the European nations have gone to the left or to the right into dictatorships and autocracies, such as communism, fascism, nazi-ism, or pseudodemocracies. It is none of our business what form of government exists in Communist Russia, Fascist Italy, or Nazi Germany, any more than it is their business what form of government exists in the United States of America. We went to war once to throw out Kaiser Bill, who was then the villain of the piece, and we helped to do it. However, England and France succeeded through the harsh exactions of the Versailles Treaty, which we repudiated, in destroying the only democratic government Germany ever had under the Weimar Convention and paving the way for Hitler.

I do not like dictators of any kind, here or abroad, but I don't want to see any American lives sacrificed to oust Hitler and pave the way for communism in Germany, and possibly in the rest of Europe. I predict if Germany is beaten to her knees, bled white, and exhausted by a long war that communism will be the natural and inevitable result.

That is why I am for peace now, on a sane and honorable basis, before millions on both sides are slaughtered, Europe laid waste, and its civilization and Christianity destroyed. I am an isolationist from the horrors of foreign wars but not from the principles of arbitration, mediation, and peaceful settlements of international disputes.

I would uphold the hand of President Roosevelt tomorrow if he could bring about a 30-day armistice, for if he did, neither the people nor the soldiers would go back to mass murder to settle their disputes and quarrels.

Modern war is the greatest human folly, futility, and curse. Even the victor loses along with the vanquished, and all become bankrupt and the prey to communism, anarchy, and chaos. The people do the fighting and dying and, after the war, pay the bill through poverty, misery, and unemployment.

Let those in America who want to take sides and fight go to foreign lands, but not try to ease us into conflicts in Europe or elsewhere arising over power politics, ancient blood feuds, colonies, and imperialism. We did not start this war and have no responsibility for finishing it.

If the arms embargo is repealed, however, I predict that a full-fledged propaganda campaign will be launched to make the American people believe that it is our war, and even that we started it. We are the biggest saps and push-overs for foreign propaganda when the bands begin to play and our emotions run away with our reason.

Every one of the nations now at war is motivated by its own self-interests, yet we are expected to again hold the bag, do our share of fighting, and not even be thanked for our trouble.

I suggested the proposal for an arms embargo in the Foreign Affairs Committee 12 years ago, after a research into the reasons and factors that caused the World War. No one will deny that one of the causes or factors, and not necessarily the only one, was the sale of arms and ammunition for war profit. It cannot help but excite hatred and hostility among the soldiers and in the nations against which they are used. The made-in-America mark on shells and ammunition are not exactly ambassadors of good will, and never will be.

The only motive and purpose behind the arms embargo was to keep us out of war. War is man made. It is not made by some devil or demon from another world. We put the arms embargo into the neutrality bill to act as a barrier or obstacle to involvement in foreign wars. That was its genesis and purpose—to keep us out of wars when they began. The burden of proof rests squarely with those who would repeal it to show how it would help to keep us out of war, and they cannot do it.

That is the tragedy of the situation, when the mania for war profits or the desire to take sides and intervene in European wars are the only reasons that can be given to repeal a well-founded and carefully considered plan to keep America out of war.

If it were not for all the power, patronage, and propaganda of the administration in favor of repeal, it would be beaten by over a hundred votes in the House, if the Members voted their untrammeled convictions. As it is, the vote will be so close that no one will know until the final vote is counted.

I predict that if the plain people of America, the farmers, wage earners, business and professional men, veterans, and mothers will make their views known in no uncertain terms in the next few days they can influence the votes of at least 40 Members of Congress still undecided. If we can obtain a majority of these votes it will insure a substantial majority in the fight to maintain the arms embargo.

The outcome depends largely upon the will, interest, and determination of the people back home, in all walks of life, who take enough interest to write to their Representatives in Congress and make their views and wishes known.

This is the last call to retain the arms embargo and stop the insidious propaganda that war is inevitable and that we will have to get into it. A vote to repeal the arms embargo, in view of its origin and motives, is a half a vote for war. It is a vote to take sides and amounts to intervention on one side against another. Neutrality means not to take sides, or to lend any active aid to any belligerent nation.

The attempt to repeal the arms embargo, backed by all the internationalists and interventionists in America and foreign propaganda from abroad, is a stab into the vitals and very heart of the neutrality bill. No European nation sells any arms and ammunition to any belligerent nations. Why should we repeal the arms embargo, which has for its sole motive and purpose keeping us out of foreign wars? If we do, we automatically become a partner in the European war.

There has been a lot of misunderstanding and confusion regarding the cash-and-carry plan. Now that the 90-day credit clause has been stricken from the bill, it is entirely satisfactory. There is no conflict between that and the arms embargo. I am for both, to make our security doubly safe. Yet the people have been led to believe that they had to choose between them, and could not support both. Consequently some of the polls in the newspapers have been distorted.

If we are eased or forced into foreign wars against totalitarian nations we will become a dictatorship ourselves in 24 hours, and our liberties, free institutions, and even American democracy will be blacked out.

The fight to maintain the arms embargo is no easy one to win. We have the entire power of the Administration against us, backed by foreign propaganda and all those elements who desire to involve us in war.

The final answer rests with you, the American people. I am giving you for the last time on this great American issue, the Macedonian cry, of come over and help. The stake may be the security, happiness, and peace of America, and the lives of its sons.

The Neutrality Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

TELEGRAM BY ROSS McINTYRE

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, with reference to the neutrality bill now before the House, I include the following telegram I have this day received from Mr. Ross McIntyre, President of the Portland Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. McIntyre calls attention to the discriminatory features of the bill with respect to shipping from the port of Portland. There are no American lines serving the port of Portland, and by reason of the cash-and-carry provisions Oregon shippers will be subjected to the cash-and-carry provisions, as shipping must go out in foreign bottoms. I call this matter to the attention of the House conferees and urge that they give consideration to these objections, and modify the bill so as to relieve Oregon from this discrimination.

The telegram is as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., November 1, 1939.

Hon. HOMER ANGELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

As neutrality bill passed Senate American ships can carry cargo to belligerent countries in Pacific area, etc., without title on said cargo having passed. Foreign ships even though neutrals cannot load same cargo unless title on it has passed. We submit this as apparently contrary to terms of our treaties of commerce and navigation with neutral countries. Under it Swedish, Norwegian, Danish, Dutch, etc., ships cannot transport from here to ports of belligerents in Pacific area on same terms as can American vessels. Oregon is without benefit of subsidized American flag service to Orient, thus shipping from Oregon must be on cash-and-carry basis, while shipments from San Francisco can be on usual commercial terms. We cannot eliminate neutral foreign ships and carry on commerce of Pacific. These provisions also apply to the heavy ship charter business carrying the basic cargoes of Oregon and Washington abroad. Since American ships are not available to handle commerce of Oregon, Washington, California, this penalty on neutral foreign ships in effect penalizes producers and shippers here.

ROSS MCINTYRE,
President, Portland Chamber of Commerce.

Pope Pius XII's Encyclical

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM I. SIROVICH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

TEXT OF THE POPE'S ENCYCLICAL LETTER

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, Tuesday afternoon I delivered a speech on the floor of the House on the subject of the philosophy of neutrality. In the peroration of that address, as delivered on the floor of the House of Representatives, I said:

Mr. Speaker, greater than any material cash-and-carry concern that the United States may have in an ultimate Allied victory is a mighty spiritual stake. A little more than a century ago the final defeat of Napoleon inaugurated an era of black reaction in every land of Europe; the spirit of democracy and liberty was driven underground with the forces of autocracy and tyranny marching roughshod everywhere. A hundred years later the victory of the democratic World War Allies over the despotic Central Powers secured the post-war world to freedom and democracy for a dozen years. To the victor of the current European war will belong the spiritual destinies of the post-war world to be. An all-conquering, all-consuming Third Reich will provoke every Fascist tendency, every sworn enemy of democracy, every lover of atheism, despotism, racism, and authoritarianism against the democratic traditions and institutions prevailing in the lands of North and South America. The broad Atlantic may preserve us, for the present, from enemy bombing planes and overseas battle fleets, but against the passage of ideas there are no frontiers of land or sea. On the other hand, a triumphant Britain and France will spell the destruction of the Nazi venom everywhere, with the affirmation of the sprit of liberty, democracy, and Christianity. A Nazi victory will be a spiritual Big Bertha pointed at our American institutions; a Nazi defeat, a monument to humanity, decency, and the rights of man.

The Nazi's bible is Hitler's Mein Kampf; the Frenchman's bible, Rousseau's Social Contract; the Englishman's political bible, Locke's Treatise on Government. A Hitler victory in the European war must spell victory for Hitler's bible Mein Kampf in virtually every civilized land on earth and disaster to the pattern of life represented by the Social Contract and the Treatise on Government that confirm the supreme sovereignty of the people.

An outcome of that description will be a sinister menace to the American political bible—the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. These inspiring and spirit-refreshing documents, glorifying man's inalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, were framed in the spirit of Jean Jacques Rousseau's Social Contract and John Locke's Treatise on Government. Accordingly, the victory of Mein Kampf would cast a heavy shadow over that spirit and over the American ideals of liberty, democracy, and equality, for which Jefferson struggled, Jackson suffered, and Lincoln perished.

Mr. Speaker, His Holiness, the brilliant, gifted, and inspired shepherd of the great Catholic Church, Pope Pius XII, only yesterday in an encyclical from the Vatican pilloried and condemned modern dictators responsible for treaty breaking and racial bigotry and intolerance.

His Holiness decried the destruction of the spiritual dignity of mankind and cried aloud to Heaven to prevent the exploitation of man and pleaded that mankind must not be used as a means to an end, but must remain an end to himself, and that the modern state must be the means to preserve that end. To preserve modern democracy throughout the world we must follow the brilliant counsel of that learned and distinguished scholar His Holiness Pope Pius XII. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the United States must keep out of European war. The flower of our American young manhood shall not be sacrificed again to the bloodthirsty Moloch of war. But in compensation the arms embargo must be lifted to strengthen the democracies of Great Britain and France—our first line of defense. Such aid, by providing the European democracies with the means to attain a final victory in their unwanted conflict, will help to preserve man's spiritual dignity and protect his integrity upon this earth.

Mr. Speaker, from this catastrophic holocaust of war in Europe, there must come forth a better democracy for mankind to live in, and make true the shibboleth of our former great President Woodrow Wilson—that the world must be made safe for democracy to live in, and that the lives of our patriotic American youths, whose lifeblood hallows the sacred ground in which their mortal remains are buried, shall not have been sacrificed in vain. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, having thus paid tribute to His Holiness Pope Piux XII for his denunciation of the dictators of Europe, as well as excoriating those who utilized racial bigotry and intolerance to inflame religious passion and who were responsible for destroying the spiritual dignity of man, I desire to insert in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, Pope Pius XII's encyclical from the Vatican to the peoples of the world:

ENCYCLICAL LETTER TO OUR VENERABLE BRETHREN, THE PATRIARCHS, ARCHBISHOPS, BISHOPS, AND OTHER ORDINARIES IN PEACE AND COMMUNION WITH THE APOSTOLIC SEE

POPE PIUS XII

Venerable brethren: Health and apostolic benediction.

In the very year which marks the fortieth anniversary of the consecration of mankind to our Redeemer's most sacred heart the inscrutable counsel of the Lord, for no merit of ours, has laid upon us the exalted dignity and grave care of the supreme pontificate; for that consecration was proclaimed by our immortal predecessor Leo XIII at the beginning of the holy year which closed the last century.

And we, as a newly ordained priest, then just empowered to recite:

"I will go into the altar of God" (Psalm, xlii: 4) hailed the encyclical, Annum Sacrum, with genuine approval, enthusiasm, and delight as a message from heaven. We associated ourselves in fervent admiration of the motives and aims which inspired and directed the truly providential action of a pontiff so sure in his diagnosis of the open and hidden needs and sores of his day.

GRATITUDE TO PROVIDENCE

It is only natural then that we should today feel profoundly grateful to Providence for having designed that the first year of our pontificate should be associated with a memory so precious and so dear of our first year of priesthood, and that we should take the opportunity of paying homage to the "King of Kings and Lord of Lords" (I Timothy vi: 15; cf. Apocalypse xix: 6) as a kind of introit prayer to our pontificate, in the spirit of our renowned predecessor and in the faithful accomplishment of his designs and that, in fine, we should make of it the alpha and omega of our aims, of our hopes, of our teaching, of our activity, of our patience, and of our sufferings, by consecrating them all to the spread of the kingdom of Christ.

As we review from the standpoint of eternity the past 40 years in their exterior events and interior developments, balancing achievements against deficiencies, we see ever more clearly the sacred significance of that consecration of mankind to Christ the King; we see its inspiring symbolism, we see its power to refine and to elevate, to strengthen and to fortify souls. We see, besides, in that consecration a penetrating wisdom which sets itself to restore and to ennoble all human society and to promote its true welfare.

It unfolds itself to us ever more clearly as a message of comfort and a grace from God not only to His church but also to a world in all too dire need of help and guidance—to a world which, preoccupied with the worship of the ephemeral, has lost its way and spent its forces in a vain search after earthly ideals.

It is a message to men who in ever-increasing numbers have cut themselves off from faith in Christ and, even more, from the recognition and observance of His law; a message opposed to that philosophy of life for which the doctrine of love and renunciation preached in the Sermon on the Mount and the divine act of love on the cross seem to be a stumbling block and foolishness.

MIGHTY CRY OF ENTREATY

Even as the Precursor of the Lord proclaimed one day to those who sought and questioned Him, "Behold the Lamb of God" (St. John i: 29), in order to warn them that the Desired of the Nations (cf. Aggeus ii: 9) dwelt, though as yet unrecognized, in their midst, so, too, the representative of Christ addressed His mighty cry of entreaty, "Behold your King" (St. John xix: 14), to the renegades, to the doubters, to the wavering, to the hesitant, who either refused to follow the glorious Redeemer, living ever and working in His church, or followed Him with carelessness and sloth.

From the widening and deepening of devotion to the divine heart of the Redeemer, which had its splendid culmination in the consecration of humanity at the end of the last century, and, further, in the introduction, by our immediate predecessor of happy memory, of the Feast of Christ the King, there have sprung up benefits beyond description for numberless souls—as the stream of the river which "maketh the city of God joyful" (Psalm xlv: 5).

What age has had greater need than ours of these benefits? What age has been, for all its technical and purely civic progress, more tormented than ours by spiritual emptiness and deep-felt interior poverty? May we not, perhaps, apply to it the prophetic words of the Apocalypse: "Thou sayest: I am rich, and made wealthy, and have need of nothing: and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked" (Apocalypse iii: 17)?

Can there be, venerable brethren, a greater or more urgent duty than to preach the "unsearchable riches of Christ" (Ephesians iii: 8) to the men of our time? Can there be anything nobler than to unfurl the "ensign of the King" before those who have followed, and still follow, a false standard, and to win back to the victorious banner of the cross those who have abandoned it?

What heart is not inflamed, is not swept forward to help at the sight of so many brothers and sisters who, misled by error, passion, temptation, and prejudice have strayed away from faith in the true God and have lost contact with the joyful and life-giving message of Christ?

"SOLDIERS OF CHRIST" EXHORTED

Who among "the soldiers of Christ"—ecclesiastic or layman—does not feel himself incited and spurred on to a greater vigilance, to a more determined resistance, by the sight of the ever-increasing host of Christ's enemies; as he perceives the spokesmen of these tendencies deny or in practice neglect the vivifying truths and the values inherent in belief in God and in Christ; as he perceives them wantonly break the tables of God's commandments to substitute other tables and other standards stripped of the ethical content of the revelation on Sinai, standards in which the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount and of the cross has no place?

Who could observe without profound grief the tragic harvest of such desertions among those who in days of calm and security were numbered among the followers of Christ, but who—Christians unfortunately more in name than in fact—in the hour that called for endurance, for effort, for suffering, for a stout heart in face of hidden or open persecution, fell victims of cowardice, weakness, uncertainty; who, terror stricken before the sacrifices entailed by a profession of their Christian faith, could not steel themselves to drink the bitter chalice awaiting those faithful to Christ?

FEAST OF CHRIST THE KING

In such dispositions of time and temperament, venerable brethren, may the approaching Feast of Christ the King, on which this our first encyclical will reach you, be a day of grace and of thorough renewal and revival in the spirit of the Kingdom of Christ. May it be a day when the consecration of the human race to the divine heart, which should be celebrated in a particularly solemn manner, will gather the faithful of all peoples and all nations around the throne of the Eternal King, in adoration and in reparation, to renew now and forever their oath of allegiance to Him and to His law of truth and of love.

May it be for the faithful a day of grace, on which the fire, that our Lord came to cast upon the earth, will kindle with ever greater light and purity. May it be a day of grace for the lukewarm, for the weary, for the afflicted, that their hearts, which have become faint, may give proofs of interior renewal and regeneration of spirit.

May it be a day of grace also for those who have not known Christ or who have lost Him; a day when from millions of faithful hearts will raise to Heaven the prayer that "the light which enlighteneth every man that cometh into this world" (St. John i: 9) may make clear to them the way of salvation; that His grace may stir in the "troubled heart" of the wanderers a homesickness for things eternal, a homesickness that impels them to return to Him, Who from His sorrowful throne of the cross thirsts for their souls also and who is consumed by a desire to become for them, too, "the way, and the truth, and the life" (St. John xiv: 6).

As with a heart full of confidence and hope, we place this first encyclical of our pontificate under the seal of Christ the King, we feel entirely assured of the unanimous and enthusiastic approval of the whole flock of Christ. The difficulties, anxieties, and trials of the present hour arouse, intenstify, and refine, to a degree rarely attained, the sense of solidarity in the Catholic family. They make all believers in God and in Christ share the consciousness of a common threat from a common danger.

DISPLAY OF SOLIDARITY

We witnessed a consoling and memorable display of this Catholic solidarity, greatly intensified in such difficult circumstances, the serried ranks, the assurance, the resolution, the will to win, in those days when, with faltering step but with confidence in God, we took possession of the chair left vacant by the death of our great predecessor.

We cherish the memory of the many testimonies of filial attachment to the church and to the Vicar of Christ, and of the ovation so genuine, so enthusiastic, and so spontaneous accorded to us on the occasion of our election and coronation; and we gladly take this opportune occasion to address to you, venerable brethren, and to all who belong to the flock of the Lord, a word of sincere gratitude for that orderly manifestation of reverent love and of steadfast loyalty to the papacy, in which one could see recognition of the God-given mission of high priest and of the supreme pastor.

For, we well know it, all those manifestations were not and could not have have been addressed to our poor person, but to the singular and exalted office to which the Lord had raised us. And though from that first moment we felt all the great weight of responsible cares inseparable from the supreme power given to us by divine Providence, it was a consolation to see that magnificent and tangible demonstration of the indissoluble unity of the Catholic Church rallying all the closer to the impregnable Rock of Peter, to form around it a wall and a bulwark as the enemies of Christ become bolder.

This same manifestation of world-wide Catholic solidarity and of supernatural brotherhood of people around their common Father, seemed to us all the richer in fair hopes in view of the tragic circumstances, both material and spiritual, of the moment. That memory has continued to comfort us also in the first months of our pontificate, in which we have already witnessed the toil, the anxiety, and the trials with which the path of the Spouse of Christ across the world is strewn.

GOOD WISHES FROM OTHERS

Nor can we pass over in silence the profound impression of heartfelt gratitude made on us by the good wishes of those who, though not belonging to the visible body of the Catholic Church, have given noble and sincere expression to their appreciation of all that unites them to us in love for the person of Christ or in belief in God.

We wish to express our gratitude to them all. We entrust them one and all to the protection and to the guidance of the Lord, and we assure them solemnly that one thought only fills our mind: To imitate the example of the Good Shepherd in order to bring true happiness to all men: "That they may have life, and may have it more abundantly" (St. John x: 10).

But we must, in obedience to an inner prompting, make special mention of our gratitude for the tokens of reverent homage which we have had from the sovereigns, heads of states, and governments of those nations with which the Holy See is in friendly relations. Our heart is joyous especially at the thought that we can, in this first encyclical directed to the whole Christian people scattered over the world, rank among such friendly powers our dear Italy, fruitful garden of the faith which was planted by the Prince of the Apostles.

For, as a result of the Lateran pacts, her representative occupies a place of honor among those officially accredited to the Apostolic See. "The peace of Christ restored to Italy," like a new dawn of brotherly union in religious and in civil intercourse, had its beginning in these pacts. We pray God that, in the serene atmosphere of that peace, He may pervade, revivify, strengthen, and fortify the heart of the Italian people, so close to us, in the midst of which we live, with which we share the very air we breathe.

PLEA TO PEOPLE OF ITALY

We hope and trust that that people, so dear to our predecessors and to us, may be faithful to its glorious Catholic tradition, and experience through the divine protection evermore that truth of the Psalmist: "Happy is that people whose God is the Lord" (Psalms cxliii: 15).

This happy, new juridical and spiritual position, which that achievement destined to make an indelible mark in history, has secured and sealed for Italy and for the whole Catholic world, never appeared to us so impressive in its unifying effects as when from the lofty loggia of the Vatican basilica we opened and raised our arms and our hand for the first time in blessing over Rome, Rome the seat of the papacy and our own dear birthplace, over Italy reconciled with the church, and over the peoples of the entire world.

As vicar of Him who in a decisive hour pronounced before the highest earthly authority of that day the great words: "For this was I born, and for this came I into the world: that I should give testimony to the truth; everyone that is of the truth heareth My voice" (St. John xviii, 37), we feel we owe no greater debt to our office and to our time than to testify to the truth with apostolic firmness: "To give testimony to the truth."

This duty necessarily entails the exposition and confutation of errors and human faults; for these must be made known before it is possible to tend and to heal them. "You shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free" (St. John viii, 32). In the fulfillment of this our duty we shall not let ourselves be influenced by earthly considerations nor be held back by mistrust or opposition, by rebuffs or lack of appreciation of our words, nor yet by fear of misconceptions and misinterpretations.

We shall fulfill our duty, animated ever with that paternal charity which, while it suffers from the evils which afflict our children, at the same time points out to them the remedy; we shall strive to imitate the divine model of shepherds, Jesus the Good Shepherd who is light as well as love: "Doing the truth in charity" (Ephesians iv, 15).

EFFORTS TO DETHRONE CHRIST

At the head of the road which leads to the spiritual and moral bankruptcy of the present-day stand the nefarious efforts of not a few to dethrone Christ; the abandonment of the law of truth which He proclaimed and of the law of love which is the life breath of His kingdom.

In the recognition of the royal prerogatives of Christ and in the return of individuals and of society to the law of His truth and of His love lies the only way to salvation.

Venerable brethren, as we write these lines the terrible news comes to us that the dread tempest of war is already raging despite all our efforts to avert it.

When we think of the wave of suffering that has come on countless people who but yesterday enjoyed in the environment of their homes some little degree of well-being, we are tempted to lay down our pen. Our paternal heart is torn by anguish as we look ahead to all that will yet come forth from the baneful seed of violence and of hatred for which the sword today plows the blood-drenched furrow.

But precisely because of this apocalyptic foresight of disaster, imminent and remote, we feel we have a duty to raise with still greater insistence the eyes and hearts of those in whom there yet remains good will, to the One from whom alone comes the salvation of the world—to One whose almighty and merciful hand can alone calm this tempest—to the One whose truth and whose love can enlighten the intellects and inflame the hearts of so great a section of mankind plunged in error, selfishness, strife, and struggle, so as to give it a new orientation in the spirit of the kingship of Christ.

Perhaps—God grant it—one may hope that this hour of direst need may bring a change of outlook and sentiment to those many who till now have walked with blind faith along the path of popular modern errors, unconscious of the treacherous and insecure ground on which they trod. Perhaps the many who have not grasped the importance of the educational and pastoral mission of the church will now understand better her warnings, scouted in the false security of the past.

No defense of Christianity could be more effective than the present straits. From the immense vortex of error and anti-Christian movements there has come forth a crop of such poignant disasters as to constitute a condemnation surpassing in its conclusiveness any merely theoretical refutation.

HOURS OF DISILLUSIONMENT

Hours of painful disillusionment are often hours of grace—"a passage of the Lord" (cf. Exodus xii: 11), when doors which in other circumstances would have remained shut, open at our Saviour's words: "Behold, I stand at the gate and knock" (Apocalypse iii: 20).

God knows that our heart goes out in affectionate sympathy and spiritual joy to those who, as a result of such painful trials, feel within them an effective and salutary thirst for the truth, justice, and peace of Christ. But for those also for whom as yet the hour of light from on high has not come, our heart knows only love, our lips move only in prayer to the Father of Light that He may cause to shine in their hearts, indifferent as yet or hostile to Christ, a ray of that light which once transformed Saul into Paul; of that light which has shown its mysterious power strongest in the times of greatest difficulty for the church.

A full statement of the doctrinal stand to be taken in face of the errors of today, if necessary, can be put off to another time unless disturbed by calamitous external events; for the moment we limit ourselves to some fundamental observation.

The present age, venerable brethren, by adding new errors to the doctrinal aberrations of the past, has pushed these to extremes which lead inevitably to a drift toward chaos. Before all else, it is certain that the radical and ultimate cause of the evils which we deplore in modern society is the denial and rejection of a universal norm of morality as well for individual and social life as for international relations; we mean the disregard, so common nowadays, and the forgetfulness of the natural law itself, which has its foundation in God, Almighty Creator and Father of all, supreme and absolute lawgiver, all-wise and just judge of human actions.

When God is hated, every basis of morality is undermined; the voice of conscience is stilled or at any rate grows very faint, that voice which teaches even to the illiterate and to uncivilized tribes what is good and what is bad, what lawful, what forbidden, and makes men feel themselves responsible for their actions to a supreme judge.

REVOLT AGAINST MORALITY

The denial of the fundamentals of morality had its origin in Europe, in the abandonment of that Christian teaching of which the Chair of Peter is the depository and exponent. That teaching had once given spiritual cohesion to a Europe which, educated, ennobled, and civilized by the cross, had reached such a degree of civil progress as to become the teacher of other peoples, of other continents. But, cut off from the infallible teaching authority of the church, not a few separated brethren have gone so far as to overthrow the central dogma of Christianity, the divinity of the Saviour, and have hastened thereby the progress of spiritual decay.

The Holy Gospel narrates that when Jesus was crucified "there was darkness over the whole earth" (Matthew xxvii: 45); a terrifying symbol of what happened and what still happens spiritually wherever incredulity, blind and proud of itself, has succeeded in excluding Christ from modern life, especially from public life, and has undermined faith in God as well as faith in Christ.

The consequence is that the moral values by which in other times public and private conduct was gaged have fallen into disuse; and the much-vaunted civilization of society, which has made ever more rapid progress, withdrawing man, the family, and the state from the beneficent and regenerating effects of the idea of God and the teaching of the church, has caused to reappear, in regions in which for many centuries shone the splendors of Christian civilization, in a manner ever clearer, ever more distinct, ever more distressing, the signs of a corrupt and corrupting paganism: "There was darkness when they crucified Jesus" (Roman Breviary, Good Friday, response 5).

Many perhaps, while abandoning the teaching of Christ, were not fully conscious of being led astray by a mirage of glittering phrases which proclaimed such estrangement as an escape from the slavery in which they were before held; nor did they then foresee the bitter consequences of bartering the truth that sets free for error which enslaves.

WHAT WAS NOT REALIZED

They did not realize that, in renouncing the infinitely wise and paternal laws of God and the unifying and elevating doctrines of Christ's love, they were resigning themselves to the whim of a poor, fickle human wisdom; they spoke of progress, when they were going back; of being raised, when they groveled; of arriving at man's estate, when they stooped to servility. They did not perceive the inability of all human effort to replace the law of Christ by anything equal to it; "they became vain in their thoughts" (Romans i: 21).

With the weakening of faith in God and in Jesus Christ, and the darkening in men's minds of the light of moral principles, there disappeared the indispensable foundation of the stability and quiet of that internal and external, private and public order, which alone can support and safeguard the prosperity of states.

It is true that even when Europe had a cohesion of brotherhood through identical ideals gathered from Christian preaching she was not free from divisions, convulsions, and wars which laid her waste; but perhaps they never felt the intense pessimism of today as to the possibility of settling them, for they had then an effective moral sense of the just and of the unjust, of the lawful and of the unlawful, which, by restraining outbreaks of passion, left the way open to an honorable settlement.

In our days, on the contrary, dissensions come not only from the surge of rebellious passion, but also from a deep spiritual crisis which has overthrown the sound principles of private and public morality.

ERRORS OF AGNOSTICISM

Among the many errors which derive from the poisoned source of religious and moral agnosticism, we would draw your attention, venerable brethren, to two in particular as being those which more than others render almost impossible or at least precarious and uncertain the peaceful intercourse of peoples.

The first of these pernicious errors, widespread today, is the forgetfulness of that law of human solidarity and charity which is dictated and imposed by our common origin and by the equality of rational nature in all men, to whatever people they belong, and by the redeeming sacrifice offered by Jesus Christ on the altar of the cross to his Heavenly Father on behalf of sinful mankind.

In fact, the first page of the Scripture, with magnificent simplicity, tells us how God, as a culmination to His creative work, made man to His own image and likeness (cf. Genesis i: 26, 27); and the same Scripture tells us that he enriched man with supernatural gifts and privileges, and destined him to an eternal and ineffable happiness.

It shows us, besides, how other men took their origin from the first couple, and then goes on in unsurpassed vividness of language to recount their division into different groups and their dispersion to various parts of the world. Even when they abandoned their Creator, God did not cease to regard them as His children, who, according to His merciful plan, should one day be reunited once more in His friendship (cf. Genesis xii: 3).

The apostle of the gentiles later on makes himself the herald of this truth which associates men as brothers in one great family when he proclaims to the Greek world that God "hath made of one, all mankind, to dwell upon the whole face of the earth, determining appointed times, and the limits of their habitation. That they should seek God" (Acts xvii: 26, 27).

A MARVELOUS VISION

A marvelous vision, which makes us see the human race in the unity of one common origin in God, "one God and Father of all; who is above all, and through all, and in us all (Ephesians iv: 6); in the unity of nature which in every man is equally composed of material body and spiritual, immortal soul; in the unity of the immediate end and mission in the world; in the unity of the dwelling place—the earth—of whose resources all men can by natural right avail themselves to sustain and develop life; in the unity of the supernatural end, God Himself, to whom all should tend; in the unity of means to secure that end.

It is the same apostle who portrays for us mankind in the unity of its relations with the Son of God, image of the invisible God, in whom all things have been created: "In Him were all things created" (Colossians i: 16); in the unity of its ransom, effected for all by Christ, who through His holy and most bitter passion restored the original friendship with God which had been broken, making Himself the mediator between God and men: "For there is one God, and one mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus" (I Timothy ii: 5).

And to render such friendship between God and mankind more intimate, this same divine and universal Mediator of salvation and of peace, in the sacred silence of the supper room, before He consummated the supreme sacrifice, let fall from His divine lips the words which reverberate mightily down the centuries, inspiring heroic charity in a world devoid of love and torn by hate: "This is My commandment: that you love one another, as I have loved you" (St. John xv: 12).

These are supernatural truths which form a solid basis and the strongest possible bond of a union that is reinforced by the love of God and of our divine Redeemer, from whom all receive salvation "or the edifying of the body of Christ: until we all meet into the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ" (Ephesians iv: 12, 13).

In the light of this unity of all mankind which exists in law and in fact, individuals do not feel themselves isolated units, like grains of sand, but united by the very force of their nature and by their internal destiny into an organic, harmonious mutual relationship which varies with the changing of times.

MISSION OF THE NATIONS

And the nations, despite a difference of development due to diverse conditions of life and of culture, are not destined to break the unity of the human race, but rather to enrich and embellish it by the sharing of their own peculiar gifts and by that reciprocal interchange of goods which can be possible and efficacious only when a mutual love and a lively sense of charity unite all the sons of the same Father and all those redeemed by the same divine blood.

The church of Christ, the faithful depository of the teaching of divine wisdom cannot, and does not, think of deprecating or disdaining the particular characteristics which each people with jealous and intelligible pride cherishes and retains as a precious heritage. Her aim is a supernatural union in all-embracing love, deeply felt and practiced, and not the unity which is exclusively external and superficial and by that very fact weak.

The church hails with joy and follows with her maternal blessing every method of guidance and care which aims at a wise and orderly evolution of particular forces and tendencies having their origin in the individual character of each race, provided that they are not opposed to the duties incumbent on men from their unity of origin and common destiny.

CHURCH'S GUIDING STAR

She has repeatedly shown in her missionary enterprises that such a principle of action is the guiding star of her universal apostolate. Pioneer research and investigation, involving sacrifice, devotedness, and love on the part of her missionaries of every age, have been undertaken in order to facilitate the deeper appreciative insight into the most varied civilizations and to put their spiritual values to account for a living and vital preaching of the gospel of Christ.

All that in such usages and customs is not inseparably bound up with religious errors will always be subject to kindly consideration and when it is found possible will be sponsored and developed.

Our immediate predecessor of holy and venerated memory, applying such norms to a particularly delicate question, took some generous decisions which are a monument to his insight and to the intensity of his apostolic spirit. Nor need we tell you, venerable brethren, that we intend to proceed without hesitation along this way. Those who enter the church, whatever be their origin or their speech, must know that they have equal rights as children in the house of the Lord, where the law of Christ and the peace of Christ prevail.

In accordance with these principles of equality the church devotes her care to forming a cultured native clergy and gradually increasing the number of native bishops. And in order to give eternal expression to these our intentions, we have chosen the forthcoming feast of Christ the King the raise to the episcopal dignity at the tomb of the apostles 12 representatives of widely different peoples and races.

In the midst of the disruptive contrasts which divide the human family, may this solemn act proclaim to all our sons, scattered over the world, that the spirit, the teaching, and the work of the church can never be other than that which the Apostle of the gentiles preached: "Putting of the new (man), him who is renewed unto knowledge, according to the image of him that created him. Where there is neither gentile nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, barbarian nor Scythian, bond nor free. But Christ is all and in all."—Colossians III, x: 11.

LOVE OF COUNTRY

Nor is there any fear lest the consciousness of universal brotherhood aroused by the teaching of Christianity, and the spirit which it inspires, be in contrast with love of traditions or the glories of one's fatherland or impede the progress of prosperity or legitimate interests. For that same Christianity teaches that in the exercise of charity we must follow a God-given order, yielding the place of honor in our affections and good works to those who are bound to us by special ties; nay, the Divine Master Himself gave an example of this preference for His own country and fatherland, as He wept over the coming destruction of the holy city.

But legitimate and well-ordered love of our native country should not make us close our eyes to the all-embracing nature of Christian charity, which calls for consideration of others and of their interests in the pacifying light of love.

Such is the marvelous doctrine of love and peace which has been such an ennobling factor in the civil and religious progress of mankind and the heralds who proclaimed it, moved by supernatural charity, not only tilled the land and cared for the sick, but above all they reclaimed, molded, and raised life to divine heights, directing it toward the summit of sanctity in which everything is seen in the light of God.

They have raised mansions and temples which show to what lofty and kindly heights the Christian ideal urges man; but above all they have made of men wise or ignorant, strong or weak, living temples of God and branches of the very vine which is Christ. They have handed on to future generations the treasures of ancient art and wisdom and have secured for them that inestimable gift of eternal wisdom which links men as brothers by the common recognition of a supernatural ownership.

Venerable brethren, forgetfulness of the law of universal charity—of that charity which alone can consolidate peace by extinguishing hatred and softening envies and dissensions—is the source of very grave evils for peaceful relations between nations.

ANOTHER PERNICIOUS ERROR

But there is yet another error no less pernicious to the well-being of the nations and to the prosperity of that great human society which gathers together and embraces within its confines all races. It is the error contained in those ideas which do not hesitate to divorce civil authority from every kind of dependence upon the Supreme Being—first cause and absolute master of man and of society—and from every restraint of a higher law derived from God as from its first source.

Thus they accord the civil authority an unrestricted field of action that is at the mercy of the changeful tide of human will, or of the dictates of casual historical claims, and of the interests of a few.

Once the authority of God and the sway of His law are denied in this way, the civil authority as an inevitable result tends to attribute to itself that absolute autonomy which belongs exclusively to the Supreme Maker. It puts itself in the place of the Almighty and elevates the State or group into the last end of life, the supreme criterion of the moral and juridical order and therefore forbids every appeal to the principles of natural reason and of the Christian conscience.

We do not, of course, fail to recognize that, fortunately, false principles do not always exercise their full influence, especially when age-old Christian traditions on which the peoples have been nurtured remain still deeply, even if unconsciously, rooted in their hearts.

Nonetheless, one must not forget the essential insufficiency and weakness of every principle of social life which rests upon a purely human foundation, is inspired by merely earthly motives and relies for its force on the sanction of a purely external authority.

Where the dependence of human right upon the divine is denied, where appeal is made only to some insecure idea of a merely human authority and an autonomy is claimed which rests only upon a utilitarian morality, there human law itself justly forfeits in its more weighty application the moral force which is the essential condition for its acknowledgment and also for its demand of sacrifices.

It is quite true that power based on such weak and unsteady foundations can attain at times under chance circumstances material successes apt to arouse wonder in superficial observers. But the moment comes when the inevitable law triumphs, which strikes down all that has been constructed upon a hidden or open disproportion between the greatness of the material and outward success and the weakness of the inward value and of its moral foundation. Such disproportion exists whenever public authority disregards or denies the dominion of the Supreme Lawgiver, who as He has given rulers power, has also set and marked its bounds.

FUNCTION OF THE STATE

Indeed, as our great predecessor Leo XIII wisely taught in the encyclical, Immortale Dei, it was the Creator's will that civil sovereignty should regulate social life after the dictates of an order changeless in its universal principles; should facilitate the attainment in the temporal order by individuals of physical, intellectual, and moral perfection; and should aid them to reach their supernatural end.

Hence, it is the noble prerogative and function of the State to control, aid, and direct the private and individual activities of national life that they converge harmoniously toward the common good. That good can neither be defined according to arbitrary ideas nor can it accent for its standard primarily the material prosperity of society, but rather it should be defined according to the harmonious development and the natural perfection of man. It is for this perfection that society is designed by the Creator as a means.

To consider the state as something ultimate to which everything else should be subordinated and directed cannot fail to harm the true and lasting prosperity of nations. This can happen either when unrestricted dominion comes to be conferred on the state as having a mandate from the Nation, the people, or even a social class, or when the state arrogates such dominion to itself as absolute master despotically without any mandate whatsoever.

If in fact the state lays claim to and directs private enterprises, these, ruled as they are by delicate and complicated internal principles which guarantee and assure the realization of their special aims, may be damaged to the detriment of the public good, by being wrenched from their natural surroundings, that is, from responsible private action.

Further, there would be danger lest the primary and essential cell of society, the family, with its well-being and its growth, should come to be considered from the narrow standpoint of national power, and lest it be forgotten that man and the family are by nature anterior to the state, and that the Creator has given to both of them powers and rights and has assigned them a mission and a charge that correspond to undeniable natural requirements.

RIGHTS OF THE FAMILY

The education of the new generation in that case would not aim at the balanced and harmonious development of the physical powers and of all the intellectual and moral qualities, but at a one-sided formation of those civic virtues that are considered necessary for attaining political success, while the virtues which give society the fragrance of nobility, humanity, and reverence would be inculcated less, for fear they should detract from the price of the citizen.

Before us stand out with painful clarity the dangers we fear will accrue to this and coming generations from the neglect or nonrecognition, the minimizing and the gradual abolition of the rights peculiar to the family. Therefore we stand up as determined defenders of those rights in the full consciousness of the duty imposed on us by our apostolic office. The stress of our times as well external as internal, material and spiritual alike, and the manifold errors with their countless repercussions are tasted by none so bitterly as by that noble little cell, the family.

True courage and a heroism worthy in its degree of admiration and respect are often necessary to support the hardships of life, the daily weight of misery, growing want, and restrictions on a scale never before experienced, whose reason and necessity are not always apparent.

Whoever has the care of souls and can search hearts knows the hidden tears of mothers, the resigned sorrow of so many fathers, the countless bitternesses of which no statistics tell nor can tell. He sees with sad eyes the mass of sufferings ever on the increase; he knows how the powers of disorder and destruction stand on the alert ready to make use of all these things for their dark designs.

No one of good will and vision will think of refusing the state, in the exceptional conditions of the world of today, correspondingly wider and exceptional rights to meet the popular needs. But even in such emergencies the moral law, established by God, demands that the lawfulness of each such measure and its real necessity be scrutinized with the greatest rigor according to the standards of the common good.

SOUL CANNOT BE DEMANDED

In any case, the more burdensome the material sacrifices demanded of the individual and the family by the state, the more must the rights of conscience be to it sacred and inviolable. Goods, blood it can demand; but the soul redeemed by God, never.

The charge laid by God on parents to provide for the material and spiritual good of their offspring and to procure for them a suitable training saturated with the true spirit of religion cannot be wrested from them without grave violation of their rights.

Undoubtedly, that formation should aim as well at the preparation of youth to fulfill with intelligent understanding and pride those offices of a noble patriotism which give to one's earthly fatherland all due measure of love, self-devotion, and service. But on the other hand, a formation which forgot or, worse still, deliberately neglected to direct the eyes and hearts of youth to the heavenly country would be an injustice to youth, and injustice against the inalienable duties and rights of the Christian family and an excess to which a check must be opposed, in the interests even of the people and of the state itself.

Such an education might seem perhaps to the rulers responsible for it a source of increased strength and vigor; it would be, in fact, the opposite, as sad experience would prove. The crime of high treason against the "King of Kings and Lord of Lords" (Timothy vi: 15; cf. Apocalypse 1: 6) perpetrated by an education that is either indifferent or opposed to Christianity, the reversal of "Suffer the little children * * * to come unto Me" (St. Matthew xix: 14), would bear most bitter fruits.

On the contrary, the state which lifts anxiety from the bleeding and torn hearts of fathers and mothers and restores their rights, only promotes its own internal peace and lays foundations of a happy future for the country. The souls of children given to their parents by God and consecrated in baptism with the royal character of Christ are a sacred charge over which watches the jealous love of God. The same Christ who pronounced the words "Suffer little children to come unto Me" has threatened, for all His mercy and goodness, with fearful evils those who give scandal to those so dear to His heart.

MISDIRECTED FORMATION OF YOUTH

Now, what scandal is more permanently harmful to generation after generation than a formation of youth which is misdirected toward a goal that alienates from Christ "that way and the truth and the life" and leads to open or hidden apostasy from Christ?

That Christ from whom they want to alienate the youthful generations of the present day and of the future is the same Christ who has received from His eternal Father all power in heaven and on earth. He holds in His omnipotent hand the destiny of states, of peoples, and of nations. His it is to shorten or prolong life; His to grant increase, prosperity, and greatness.

Of all that exists on the face of the earth, the soul alone has deathless life. A system of education that should not respect the sacred precincts of the Christian family, protected by God's holy law, that should attack its foundations, bar to the young the way to Christ, to the Saviour's fountains of life and joy (cf. Isaiah xii: 3) that should consider apostasy from Christ and the church as a proof of fidelity to the people or a particular class' word: "They that depart from Thee shall be written in the earth" (Jeremiah xvii: 13).

The idea which credits the state with unlimited authority is not simply an error harmful to the internal life of nations, to their prosperity, and to the larger and well-ordered increase in their well-being, but likewise it injures the relations between peoples, for it breaks the unity of supranational society, robs the law of nations of its foundation and vigor, leads to violation of others' rights, and impedes agreement and peaceful intercourse.

A disposition in fact of the divinely sanctioned natural order divides the human race into social groups, nations, or states, which are mutually independent in organization and in the direction of their internal life. But for all that, the human race is bound together by reciprocal ties, moral and juridical, into a great commonwealth directed to the good of all nations and ruled by special laws which protect its unity and promote its prosperity.

Now, no one can fail to see how the claim to absolute autonomy for the state stands in open opposition to this natural way that is inherent in man—nay, denies it utterly—and therefore leaves the stability of international relations at the mercy of the will of rulers, while it destroys the possibility of true union and fruitful collaboration directed to the general good.

So, venerable brethren, it is indispensable for the existence of harmonious and lasting contacts and of fruitful relations that the peoples recognize and observe these principles of international natural law which regulate their normal development and activity. Such principles demand respect for corresponding rights to independence, to life, and to the possibility of continuous development in the paths of civilization; they demand further fidelity to compacts agreed upon and sanctioned in conformity with the principles of the law of nations.

The indispensable presupposition, without doubt, of all peaceful intercourse between nations, and the very soul of the juridical relations in force among them, is mutual trust; the expectation and conviction that each party will respect its plighted word; the certainty that both sides are convinced that: "Better is wisdom than weapons of war" (Ecclesiastes ix: 18), and are ready to enter into discussion and to avoid recourse to force or to threats of force in case of delays, hindrances, changes, or disputes, because all these things can be the result not of bad will, but of changed circumstances and of genuine interests in conflict.

But, on the other hand, to tear the law of nations from its anchor in divine law, to base it on the autonomous will of states is to dethrone that very law and deprive it of its noblest and strongest qualities. Thus it would stand abandoned to the fatal drive of private interest and collective selfishness exclusively intent on the assertion of its own rights and ignoring those of others.

TREATIES CAN BE MODIFIED

Now, it is true that with the passage of time and the substantial change of circumstances, which were not and perhaps could not have been foreseen in the making of a treaty, such a treaty or some of its clauses can in fact become, or at least seem to become, unjust, impracticable, or too burdensome for one of the parties.

It is obvious that should such be the case, recourse shou'd be had in good time to a frank discussion with a view to modifying the treaty or making another in its stead. But to consider treaties on principle as ephemeral and tacitly to assume the authority of rescinding them unilaterally when they are no longer to one's advantage, would be to abolish all mutual trust among states. In this way, natural order would be destroyed and there would be seen dug between different peoples and nations trenches of division impossible to refill.

Today, venerable brethren, all men are looking with terror into the abyss to which they have been brought by the errors and principles which we have mentioned, and by their practical consequences. Gone are the proud illusions of limitless progress. Should any still fail to grasp this fact, the tragic situation of today would rouse them with the prophet's cry: "Hear ye deaf and ye blind, behold" (Isaiah xlii: 18).

What used to appear on the outside as order was nothing but an invasion of disorder—confusion in the principles of moral life.

These principles once divorced from the majesty of the divine law have tainted every field of human activity.

But let us leave the past and turn our eyes toward that future which, according to the promises of the powerful ones of this world, is to consist, once the bloody conflicts of today have ceased, in a new order founded on justice and on prosperity.

Will that future be really different; above all, will it be better? Will treaties of peace, will the new international order at the end of this war be animated by justice and by equity toward all, by that spirit which frees and pacifies? Or will there be a lamentable repetition of ancient and of recent errors?

TEMPTATION IN VICTORY

To hope for a decisive change exclusively from the shock of war and its final issue is idle, as experience shows. The hour of victory is an hour of external triumph for the party to whom victory falls, but it is, in equal measure, the hour of temptation. In this hour the angel of justice strives with the demons of violence; the heart of the victor all too easily is hardened; moderation and far-seeing wisdom appear to him weakness; the excited passions of the people, often inflamed by the sacrifices and sufferings they have borne, obscure the vision even of responsible persons and make them inattentive to the warning voice of humanity and equity, which is overwhelmed or drowned in the inhuman cry, "vae victis—woe to the conquered."

There is danger lest sentiments and decisions born in such conditions be nothing else than injustice under the cloak of justice.

No, venerable brethren, safety does not come to peoples from external means, from the sword, which can impose conditions of peace but does not create peace. Forces that are to renew the face of the earth should proceed from within, from the spirit. Once the bitterness and the cruel strifes of the present have ceased, the new order of the world, of national and international life, must rest no longer on the quicksands of changeable and ephemeral standards that depend only on the selfish interests of groups and individuals.

No; they must rest on the unshakable foundation, on the solid rock of natural law and of divine revelation. There the human legislator must attain to that balance, that keen sense of moral responsibility without which it is easy to mistake the boundary between the legitimate use and the abuse of power.

Thus only will his decisions have internal consistency, noble dignity and religious sanction, and be immune from selfishness and passion. For true though it is that the evils from which mankind suffers today come in part from economic instability and from the struggle of interests regarding a more equal distribution of the goods which God has given man as a means of sustenance and progress, it is not less true that their root is deeper and more intrinsic, belonging to the sphere of religious belief and moral convictions which have been perverted by the progressive alienation of the peoples from that unity of doctrine, faith, customs, and morals which once was promoted by the tireless and beneficent work of the church.

REEDUCATION OF MANKIND

If it is to have any effect, the reeducation of mankind must be, above all things, spiritual and religious. Hence, it must proceed from Christ as from its indispensable foundation; must be actuated by justice and crowned by charity.

The accomplishment of this task of regeneration, by adapting her means to the altered conditions of the times and to the new needs of the human race, is an essential and maternal office of the church. Committed to her by her Divine Founder the preaching of the Gospel, by which is inculcated to men truth, justice, and charity and the endeavor to implant its precepts solidly in mind and conscience, is the most noble and most fruitful work for peace. That mission would seem as if it ought to discourage by its very grandeur the hearts of those who make up the church militant.

But that cooperation in the spread of the Kingdom of God which in every century is effected in different ways, with varying instruments, with manifold hard struggles, as a command incumbent on everyone who has been snatched by divine grace from the slavery of Satan and called in baptism to citizenship of Kingdom of God.

And if belonging to it, living according to its spirit, laboring for its increase and placing its benefits at the disposition of that portion of mankind also which as yet has no part in them, means in our days having to face obstacles and oppositions as vast and deep and minutely organized as never before, that does not dispense a man from the frank, bold profession of our faith. Rather, it spurs one to stand fast in the conflict even at the price of the greatest sacrifices.

Whoever lives by the spirit of Christ refuses to let himself be beaten down by the difficulties which oppose him, but on the contrary feels himself impelled to work with all his strength and with the fullest confidence in God. He does not draw back before the straits and the necessities of the moment but faces their severity ready to give aid with that love which flees no sacrifice, is stronger than death, and will not be quenched by the rushing waters of tribulation.

COMMENDS AID OF LAITY

It gives us, venerable brethren, an inward strength, a heavenly joy, for which we daily render to God our deep and humble thanks, to see in every region of the Catholic world evident signs of a spirit which boldly faces the gigantic tasks of our age, which with generous decision is intent on uniting in fruitful harmony the first and essential duty of individual sanctification, and apostolic activity for the spread of the kingdom of God. From the movement of the eucharistic congresses, furthered with loving care by our predecessors, and from the collaboration of the laity formed in Catholic action toward a deep realization of their noble mission, flow forth fountains of grace and reserve of strength, which could hardly be sufficiently prized in the present time, when threats are more numerous, needs multiply, and the conflict between Christianity and anti-Christianism grows intense. At a moment when one is forced to note with sorrow the disproportion between the number of priests and the calls upon them, when one sees that even today the words of our Saviour apply, "The harvest indeed is great, but the laborers are few" (St. Matthew ix: 37; St. Luke x: 2). The collaboration of the laity in the apostolate of the hierarchy, a collaboration indeed given by many and animated with ardent zeal and generous self devotion, stands out as a precious aid to the work of priests and shows possibilities of development which justify the brightest hopes.

The prayer of the church to the Lord of the harvest that He send workers into His vineyard (cf. St. Matthew ix: 37; St. Luke x: 2) has been granted to a degree proportionate to the present needs, and in a manner which supplements and completes the powers, often obstructed and inadequate, of the priestly apostolate. Numbers of fervent men and women, of youth, obedient to the voice of the supreme pastor and to the directions of their bishops, consecrate themselves with the full ardor of their soul to the works of the apostolate in order to bring back to Christ the masses of peoples who have been separated from Him.

PATERNAL GREETING GOES OUT

To them in this moment so critical for the church and for mankind go out our paternal greeting, our deep-felt gratitude, our confident hope. These have truly placed their life and their work beneath the standard of Christ, the King; and they can say with the Psalmist: "I speak my words to the King" (Psalm xliv: 1). "Thy kingdom come" is not simply the burning desire of their prayers; it is, besides, the guide of their activity. This collaboration of the laity with the priesthood in all classes, categories, and groups reveals precious industry and to the laity is entrusted a mission than which noble and loyal hearts could desire none higher nor more consoling.

This apostolic work, carried out according to the mind of the church, consecrates the layman as a kind of "minister to Christ" in the sense which St. Augustine explains as follows: "When, brethren, you hear our Lord saying: "Where I am there, too, will My servant be, do not think solely of good bishops and clerics." You, too, in your way, minister to Christ by a good life, by almsgiving, by preaching His name and teaching to whom you can. Thus, every father should recognize that it is under this title that he owes paternal affection to his family. Let it be for the sake of Christ and for life everlasting that he admonishes all his household, teaches, exhorts, reproves, shows kindness, corrects; and thus in his own home he will fulfill an ecclesiastical and, in a way, an episcopal office ministering to Christ, that he may be forever with Him. (On the Gospel according to St. John, tract 51, N. 13.)

In promoting this participation by the laity in the apostolate, which is so important in our times, the family has a special mission, for it is the spirit of the family that exercises the most powerful influence on that of the rising generation.

As long as the sacred flame of the faith burns on the domestic hearth, and the parents forge and fashion the lives of their children in accordance with this faith, youth will be ever ready to acknowledge the royal prerogatives of the Redeemer and to oppose those who wish to exclude Him from society or wrongly to usurp His rights.

FAMILY IS CHRISTIAN REFUGE

When churches are closed, when the image of the crucified is taken from the schools, the family remains the providential and, in a certain sense, impregnable refuge of Christian life. And we give thanks to God as we see that numberless families accomplish this, their mission, with a fidelity undismayed by combat or by sacrifice. A great host of young men and women, even in those regions where faith in Christ means suffering and persecution, remain firm around the throne of the Redeemer with a quiet, steady determination that recalls the most glorious days of the church's struggles.

What torrents of benefits would be showered on the world, what light, order, what peace would accrue to social life, what unique and precious energies would contribute toward the betterment of mankind, if men would everywhere concede to the church—teacher of justice and love—that liberty of action to which, in virtue of the divine mandate, she has a sacred and indisputable right. What calamities could be averted, what happiness and tranquillity assured, if the social and international forces working to establish peace would let themselves be permeated by the deep lessons of the gospel of love in their struggle against individual or collective egoism.

There is no opposition between the laws that govern the life of faithful Christians and the postulates of a genuine humane humanitarianism, but rather unity and mutual support. In the interests of suffering mankind, shaken to the depths, both materially and spiritually, we have no more ardent desire than this: That the present difficulties may open the eyes of many to see our Lord Jesus Christ and the mission of His church on this earth in their true light, and that all those who are in power may decide to allow the church a free course to work for the formation of the rising generation according to the principles of justice and peace.

URGES LIBERTY OF CHURCH

This work of pacification presupposes that obstacles are not put to the exercise of the mission which God has entrusted to His church; that the field of this activity is not restricted; and that the masses, and especially youth, are not withdrawn from her beneficent influence. Accordingly we, as representatives on earth of Him who was proclaimed by the prophet Prince of Peace (Isaiah ix: 6), appeal to the rulers of the peoples, and to those who can in any way influence public life, to let the church have full liberty to fulfill her role as educator by teaching men truth, by inculcating justice, and inflaming hearts with divine love of Christ.

While the church cannot renounce the exercise of this her mission, which has for its final end to realize here below the Divine plan and to "Reestablish all things in Christ that are in Heaven and on earth" (Ephesians i: 10), her aid, nonetheless, is shown to be indispensable as never before, now that sad experience teaches that external means and human provisions and political expedients of themselves bring no efficacious healing to the ills which affect mankind.

Taught precisely by the sad failure of human expedients to stave off the tempest that threatens to sweep civilization away, many turn their gaze with renewed hope to the church, the rock of truth and charity, to that chair of Peter from which, they feel, can be restored to mankind that unity of religious teaching and of the moral code which of old gave consistency to pacific international relations.

Unity, toward which so many answerable for the destiny of nations look with regretful yearnings as they experience from day to day the vanity of the very means in which once they had placed their trust! Unity, the desired of those many legions of our sons who daily call upon the God of peace and love! (II Corinthians xiii: 11.) Unity, the hope of so many noble minds separated from us, who yet in their hunger and thirst for justice and peace turn their eyes to the See of Peter and from it await guidance and counsel.

PRINCIPLES STAND TWO THOUSAND YEARS

These last are recognizing in the Catholic Church principles of belief and life that have stood the test of 2,000 years; the strong cohesion of the ecclesiastical hierarchy which, in union with the successor of Peter, spends itself in enlightening minds with the teachings of the Gospel, in guiding and sanctifying men, and which is generous in its material condescension toward all, but firm when, even at the costs of torments of martyrdom, it has to say, "Non licet! It is not allowed!"

And yet, venerable brethren, the teaching of Christ, which alone can furnish man with such solid basis of belief as will greatly enlarge his vision and divinely dilate his heart and supply an efficacious remedy to the very grave difficulties of today—this and the activity of the church in teaching and spreading that doctrine, and in forming and modeling men's minds by its precepts, are at times an object of suspicion, as if they shook the foundations of civil authority or usurped its rights.

Against such suspicions we solemnly declare with apostolic sincerity that—without prejudice to the declarations regarding the power of Christ and of His church made by our predecessor Pius XI, of venerable memory, in his encyclical Quas Primas, of December 11, 1925—any such aims are entirely alien to that same church which spreads its maternal arms toward this world, not to dominate but to serve. She does not claim to take the place of other legitimate authorities in their proper spheres but offers them help after the example and in the spirit of her divine founder, who "went about doing good" (Acts x: 38).

The church preaches and inculcates obedience and respect for earthly authority which derives from God its whole origin and holds to the teaching of her Divine Master, who said: "Render therefore to Caesar the things that are Caesar's" (St. Matthew xxii: 21); she has no desire to usurp, and sings in the liturgy: "He takes away no earthly realms who gives us the celestial" (hymn for feast of Epiphany). She does not suppress human energies, but lifts them up to all that is noble and generous and forms characters which do not compromise with conscience.

NO PEACE RESISTING GOD

Nor has she who civilizes the nations ever retarded the civil progress of mankind, at which, on the contrary, she is pleased and glad with a mother's pride. The end of her activity was admirably expressed by the angels over the cradle of the Word Incarnate when they sang of glory to God and announced peace to men of good will: "Glory to God in the highest; and on earth peace to men of good will" (St. Luke ii: 14). This peace, which the world cannot give, has been left as a heritage to His disciples by the Divine Redeemer Himself: "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you" (St. John xiv: 27); and thus following the sublime teaching of Christ, summed up by Himself in the twofold precept of love of God and of the neighbor, millions of souls have reached, are reaching, and shall reach peace.

History, wisely called by a great Roman "the teacher of life," has proved for close on 2,000 years how true is the word of Scripture that he will not have peace who resists God. (Cf. Job ix: 4.) For Christ alone is the "corner stone" (Ephesians ii: 20) on which man and society can find stability and salvation.

On this cornerstone the church is built, and hence against her the adversary can never prevail: "The gates of hell shall not prevail" (St. Matthew xvi: 18) nor can they ever weaken her; nay, rather, internal and external struggles tend to augment the force and multiply the laurels of her glorious victories.

On the other hand, any other building which has not been founded solidly on the teaching of Christ rests on shifting sands and is destined to perish miserably. (Cf. St. Matthew vii: 26, 27.)

APPEALS FOR POLAND

Venerable brethren, the hour when this, our first encyclical, reaches you is in many respects a real "hour of darkness" (cf. St. Luke xxii: 53) in which the spirit of violence and of discord brings indescribable suffering on mankind. Do we need to give assurance that our paternal heart is close to all our children in compassionate love, and especially to the afflicted, the oppressed, the persecuted? The nations swept into the tragic whirlpool of war are perhaps, as yet only at the "beginnings of sorrows" (St. Matthew xxiv: 8), but even now there reigns in thousands of families death and desolation, lamentation and misery. The blood of countless human beings, even noncombatants, raises a piteous dirge over a nation such as our dear Poland, which, for its fidelity to the church, for its services in the defense of Christian civilization, written in indelible characters in the annals of history, has a right to the generous and brotherly sympathy of the whole world, while it awaits, relying on powerful intercession of Mary, help of Christians, the hour of a resurrection in harmony with the principles of justice and true peace.

What has already happened and is still happening was presented, as it were, in a vision before our eyes when, while still some hope was left, we left nothing undone in the form suggested to us by our apostolic office and by the means at our disposal, to prevent recourse to arms and to keep open the way to an understanding honorable to both parties. Convinced that the use of force on one side would be answered by recourse to arms on the other, we considered it a duty inseparable from our apostolic office and of Christian charity to try every means to spare mankind and Christianity the horrors of a world conflagration, even at the risk of having our intentions and our aims misunderstood.

PEACE COUNSEL DISREGARDED

Our advice, if heard with respect, was not, however, followed; and while our pastoral heart looks on with sorrow and foreboding, the image of the Good Shepherd comes up before our gaze, and it seems as though we ought to repeat to the world in His name: "If Thou * * * hadst known * * * the things that are to thy peace; but now they are hidden from thy eyes" (St. Luke xix: 42).

In the midst of this world which today presents such a sharp contrast to "the peace of Christ in the reign of Christ," the church and her faithful are in times and in years of trial such as have rarely been known in her history of struggle and suffering. But in such times especially, he who remains firm in his faith and strong at heart knows that Christ, the King, is never so near as in the hour of trial, which is the hour for fidelity.

With a heart torn by the sufferings and afflictions of so many of her sons, but with the courage and the stability that comes from the promise of our Lord, the spouse of Christ goes to meet the gathering storms. This she knows: That the truth which she preaches, the charity which she teaches and practices, will be the indispensable counselors and aids to men of good will in the reconstruction of a new world, based on justice and love, when mankind, weary from its course along the way of error, has tasted the bitter fruits of hate and violence.

In the meantime, however, venerable brethren, the world and all those who are stricken by the calamity of the war must know that the obligation of Christian love, the very foundation of the kingdom of Christ, is not an empty word but a living reality. A vast field opens up for Christian charity in all its forms. We have full confidence that all our sons, especially those who are not being tried by the scourge of war, will be mindful, in imitation of the divine Samaritan, of all these who as victims of the war have a right to compassion and help.

CHURCH AWAITS HAND OF CHRIST

The "Catholic Church, the city of God, whose king is truth, whose law love, and whose measure eternity" (St. Augustine, Ep. cxxxxiii ad Marcellinum, c. 3, n. 17), preaching fearlessly the whole truth of Christ and toiling as the love of Christ demands with the zeal of a mother, stands as a blessed vision of peace above the storm of error and passion awaiting the moment when the all-powerful hand of Christ, the King, shall quiet the tempest and banish the spirits of discord which have provoked it. Whatever we can do to hasten the day when the dove of peace may find on this earth, submerged in a deluge of discord, somewhere to alight, we shall continue to do, trusting in those statesmen who before the outbreak of war nobly toiled to avert such a scourge from the peoples; trusting in the millions of souls of all countries and of every sphere who call not for justice alone but for love and mercy; above all, trusting in God Almighty, to whom we daily address the prayer: "In the shadow of Thy wings will I hope, until iniquity pass away" (Psalm lvi: 2).

God can do all things. As well as the happiness and the fortunes of nations, He holds in His hands human counsel and sweetly turns them in whatever direction He wills; even the obstacles are for His omnipotence means to mold affairs and events and to direct minds and free wills to His all-high purposes.

Pray then, venerable brethren, pray without ceasing; pray especially when you offer the divine sacrifice of love. Do you, too, pray, you whose courageous profession of the faith entails today hard, painful, and not rarely heroic sacrifices; pray you suffering and agonizing members of the church, when Jesus comes to console and to heal your pains, and do not forget with the aid of a true spirit of mortification and worthy practice of penance to make your prayers more acceptable in the eyes of Him who "lifteth up all that fall: and setteth up all that are cast down" (Psalm cxiv: 14) that He in His mercy may shorten the days of trial and that thus the words of the psalmist may be verified: "Then they cried to the Lord in their affliction: and He delivered them out of their distresses" (Psalms cvi: 13).

ASKS PRAYERS OF CHILDREN

And you, white legions of children who are so loved and dear to Jesus, when you receive in holy communion the bread of life, raise up your simple and innocent prayers and unite them with those of the universal church. The heart of Jesus, who loves you, does not resist your suppliant innocence. Pray everyone, pray uninterruptedly: "pray without ceasing" (Thessalonians v: 17).

In this way you will put into practice the sublime precept of the Divine Master, the most sacred testament of His heart, "that they all may be one" (St. John xvii: 21) that all may live in that unity of faith and of love, from which the world may know the power and efficacy of Christ's mission and of the work of His chuch.

The early church understood and practiced this divine precept, and expressed it in a magnificent prayer; do you associate yourselves with those sentiments which answer so well to the necessities of the present hour: "Remember, O Lord, Thy church, to free her from all evil and to perfect her in Thy love; and sanctify and collect her from the four winds into Thy kingdom, which Thou hast prepared for her, because Thine is the power, and the glory for ever" (doctrine of the 12 apostles, c: 10).

In the confidence that God, the author and lover of peace, will hear the supplications of the church, we impart to you all as a pledge of the abundance of divine grace, from the fullness of our paternal heart, the apostolic benediction.

Given at Castel Gandolfo, near Rome, on the 20th day of October A. D. 1939, the first of our pontificate.

PIUS PP. XII.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, OF NEW YORK

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me yesterday:

Ladies and gentlemen, the term "neutrality" has been misinterpreted by friend and foe alike. Some people are under the impression that neutrality means being entirely disinterested in the fortunes or misfortunes of the particular countries at war. Such, however, is not the case. Neutrality means taking no sides in the war itself, but it does not prevent a neutral from believing the one or the other side to be right.

Now what are the facts in this present European conflict? No one can, for a moment, hesitate in giving his sympathy to those nations whose conception of life and way of living correspond to our own. We all must necessarily wish success to the democracies. But because we wish success to them, it does not follow that we cannot remain neutral in the war.

But as neutrals we have certain rights. We have the right, under international law, to sell to all parties. There has never been a conception of international law which would prevent a neutral, just because he happens to be one, from trading with countries at war. In fact, neutrals usually have the bulk of belligerent trade, and Germany's good friend, Italy, has announced to the whole world that she is planning to develop her industries now that Germany is at war. It has always been the case, in the history of the world, that where great nations will be fighting each other, neutrals by not taking sides were able to help themselves by building up their own trade and commerce at the expense of warring nations.

A few years ago this country became very much alarmed by conditions in Europe, and as a result it determined that in any future conflict the United States would remain neutral and prevent incidents from coming into being which would involve us in a war. There can be no incident involving us in a war if we keep strictly neutral, mind our own business, and do not take sides. However, our neutrality legislation as enacted some years ago, and as reenacted from time to time down to the present day, went much further than international law requires. In our desire to be absolutely fair and to keep out of any European quarrels we passed a very stringent neutrality law which forbids us to sell ammunition and other implements of war, and seeks to keep our citizens away from belligerent ships in times of war. Much of this legislation goes a great deal further than the circumstances warrant. Much of this legislation, indirectly, plays into the hands of aggressors, because it puts all belligerents on the same basis, and does not differentiate between an aggressor and a country which is attacked. The same attitude has been rather disastrous to countries which, like Ethiopia, Albania, and to some extent China, lost their independence because of the act of the aggressors. Perhaps if we were not so scrupulously neutral we might have helped these countries to maintain their independence by selling them supplies. But this is all a matter of the past.

The overwhelming sentiment in this country today is opposed to a complete embargo of the type our existing neutrality legislation compels. This embargo is detrimental both to Europe and ourselves. There surely can be no harm in selling to Europeans supplies which they need for peacful activities, and there is no reason why our ships should be driven off the seas simply because Europe chooses to be at war. Until our neutrality laws were enacted no nation would dream of preventing this country from indulging in legitimate trade in articles of commerce used in ordinary peaceful pursuits simply because war has again been unleashed upon Europe. Peaceful trade is something which should never be enjoined, and with our supplies seeking markets all the time there is no reason why we should stifle our own trade simply because Europe is at war, particularly where there is no desire to prevent our own merchants from engaging in the same type of business which is not forbidden to other neutrals. Other neutrals are buying and selling in the European market. We are prevented from doing so by our neutrality laws.

Nor can there be any real objection to the sale of products to some nations if they are willing to take the risk in carrying their merchandise in their own ships and paying us in cash.

The debate conducted in the last few weeks in the public press, on the platform, on the radio, and in the other branch of Congress clearly demonstrated to the country the great benefits which we will derive from sales to belligerents on a cash-and-carry basis.

We have large surpluses of merchandise seeking an outlet. We have the facilities to trade, we have the desire to furnish the world with goods which they can use and which are only surplus to us, and I expect great profits to flow from the sale of our surplus stocks without detriment to anyone and without causing an untimely war inflation. We do not want to grow rich at the expense of our neighbors, but there is no reason why America should not participate in the business which Europe seeks and which other nations are furnishing.

I believe a sane attitude adopted by our people will make it perfectly clear that our selling goods to belligerents under the provisions of the neutrality bill as passed by the Senate is not going to involve us in any war. Sentiment for peace is very strong in the United States. We have no quarrels with any European country; we may dislike their dictatorial methods, but we do not seek to change them or impose our own philosophy on unwilling European states. If these states believe that totalitarianism is more beneficial to them than the type of government which we call our own, that is their concern and does not make any difference to us.

One hundred and fifty years ago George Washington proclaimed the doctrine that Europe has a set of interests peculiarly its own with which we have no concern and which should make no difference to our own manner of living or form of government.

The lapse of 150 years did not change the necessity of our keeping out all "entangling alliances." At the end of the last World War we refused to join the League of Nations because we did not want to be involved in any territorial disputes which Europe habitually suffers from, nor did we want to become the underwriters of the order of things created by the Treaty of Versailles. Let Europe go on its own way, and those who like the types of government they have there may glory in them and derive all the pleasure they can from them. As for ourselves, we want to continue to follow our American way of living, believing, as we do, that only in the individual dignity of man lies the solution of the age-old problem as to what is best for mankind.

No one can fail to be impressed with the solemn words of warning addressed by His Holiness Pope Pius XII to the totalitarian rulers of Europe. They seek to make the state supreme and destroy every vestige of love for God and family which the founders of our Republic believed to be the cornerstone of our American way of living. Ours is a God-fearing, home-loving, individualistic Nation, and it is my hope that we shall remain such in spite of any totalitarian whisperings from abroad.

A neutrality law permitting us to continue to trade with the world will not be the opening wedge for our being involved in a bloody war. If Europe cannot settle its problems any other way, America will not become a party to the quarrels with which we have no concern.

After all, the conduct of our foreign affairs is entrusted by our Constitution to the President. Our President has repeatedly stated his position and assured this country that he will do everything in his power to keep us out of war. With faith in our President and animated by our desire to remain neutral, there is no doubt of our remaining neutral in this world of strife, as our traditional policy of American aloofness from Europe will be aided by the great love of peace of the President of the United States.

National Youth Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

LETTER BY AUBREY WILLIAMS, ADMINISTRATOR OF NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, in the interest of fair play to one of our most devoted public servants, I should like to call to the attention of the House, and to include with my remarks, the following letter of Mr. Aubrey Williams, Administrator of the National Youth Administration:

OCTOBER 31, 1939.

The Honorable CHESTER H. GROSS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN GROSS: I have read your statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 27 which quoted me as saying that "the American system of government is wrong." I made no such statement.

What I said was that "any industrial system which leaves out one out of every five people cannot hope to continue to have the confidence and support of any nation." I was careful to draw a distinction between the form of government and the form of industrial pattern by which people make their living. I even went on to point out that people have tried to confuse these two matters and have tried to mislead the people into believing that a particular pattern of industry connotes a particular form of government.

I also resent very much the statement you made that I talked like a "red." I have not the slightest sympathy with the industrial and political arrangements they are trying to work out in Russia and I resent very much having anyone impute to me an approval of such objects and aims when I was attempting to express hope that we would work out the problems of our industrial life in order to make more sure the continuation of our present form of democratic government.

You have done me a very great wrong by this flagrant misstatement of what I said and inasmuch as you have made this in a public statement I expect you to have the fairness to make a similar public statement correcting the injustice you have done me.

Sincerely yours,

AUBREY WILLIAMS,
Administrator.

In Last War Boom Union Wages Went Up 14 Percent, but Food Prices Jumped 56 Percent, So Where Will the Wage Earner Profit in Business From Embargo Repeal?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the wage earners of America will again be the losers in the war boom that is expected to follow the repeal of the embargo provisions of the Neutrality Act. In the last war boom union wages went up 14 percent, but food prices jumped 56 percent.

Yesterday I pointed out in my remarks on the neutrality legislation that it is highly essential that we maintain the arms embargo to prevent the citizens of the United States from being again made victims of another post-war boom economic collapse.

I pointed out that repeal of the arms embargo would possibly bring a buying spurt from England and France that will have one result—higher prices for the things our citizens buy.

This morning every Member of this House received a document which should serve as conclusive proof that our citizens—your constituents and my constituents—were the victims of the last war boom. I hold in my hand a copy of the current issue of the Labor Information Bulletin, an official publication of the Department of Labor, and let me quote what it says happened to the citizens of our country in the last war boom. This statement, mind you, is in an official Government publication. It says:

Wages also advanced, but the increases did not keep pace with retail prices and cost of living.

Even more startling in revealing heavy losses of wage earners in the last war boom is the statement of the Labor Department expert that—

In May 1917 union hourly rates of wages were 14 percent higher than in May 1913, while food prices were 56 percent higher.

In other words the war boom hiked prices many times greater than it did wages.

This study shows the effects of a war boom in 1914–17 as anything but beneficial to the wage earners. The same will be true today. If the embargo is repealed and profit-hungry manipulators and the campaign contributing munitions industry get in the saddle again, the wage earners will find his rent going up, clothing will become more expensive, and prices of his food will increase.

Wage earners have nothing to gain by embargo repeal's war boom.

Inasmuch as this article is issued at this timely hour and is based on the effect the European war is bound to have, I desire to read it into the RECORD for your consideration.

It follows:

AMERICAN LABOR IN THE WORLD WAR, 1914–17

(By Witt Bowden, Bureau of Labor Statistics)

The present European war is bound to bring with it serious and complicated economic dislocations not only to the nations at war but also to the nations that remain neutral. The recent sudden and unjustified spurt in the retail price of some of our most important foodstuffs, such as sugar, was the first warning of how rapidly such changes can occur and how seriously they may affect the welfare and standard of living of workers in the United States.

During the last quarter of a century, and particularly since 1933, the social and economic pattern of the United States has undergone a profound change, largely beneficial to the masses of people who earn a living by working for wages and salaries. Workers now have the legal right to organize and bargain collectively with their employers through representatives of their own choice. The large majority of employers have accepted this change and have come more and more to regard collective bargaining as the most effective method of dealing with their employees. There exists also a large body of other Federal and State social and labor legislation designed to protect and enhance the welfare of workers. Organized labor, too, has grown in power and membership, and when united should offer a solid protection to workers against encroachment from war profiteering. Although business and economic conditions in the United States are now in many respects considerably different from what they were in 1913, it is deemed desirable, nevertheless, to look back and examine on the basis of such data as are available the effects of the World War on wholesale and retail prices in the United States, on employment conditions, and on wages and earnings of American workers.

WHOLESALE PRICES

The World War began on July 28, 1914, at a time when the trend of wholesale prices in the United States had been downward. The first effect of the war was, therefore, to halt this downward trend, although some prices continued to decline for several months. It was not until the last quarter of 1915, however, that the level of wholesale prices in the United States turned sharply upward. In March 1917, 1 month prior to the entrance of the United States into the World War, the level of wholesale prices was 60 percent higher than when the war started. Some commodities especially required for war purposes—such as grain, iron and steel, and chemicals—more than doubled in price.

COST OF LIVING

The Department of Labor is now equipped to study and report on changes in the cost of living at comparatively short intervals, but no such facilities were available when the war broke out in 1914. It was not until 1916 that the first attempts were made by the Bureau of Labor Statistics to determine the effects of the war on the cost of living of wage earners. This study was first limited to the District of Columbia, but was later extended to cover several important shipbuilding centers and a number of other industrial cities. These surveys revealed considerable increases in the cost of living of wage earners and low-salaried employees since the beginning of the war. Rents had increased slightly, fuel and light costs somewhat more, and the cost of miscellaneous goods, such as laundry, carfare, medical care, etc., still more. The largest increases occurred in the important items of food, clothing, and housefurnishings. By December 1916 the average cost of living for the cities covered by the survey was 16.6 percent higher than in 1913. In December 1917 it was 38.3 percent higher.

More detailed information is available on the trend of retail prices of foodstuffs for which the Bureau of Labor Statistics had been collecting monthly figures in a number of cities. These figures showed a substantial increase during the first 2 months immediately following the beginning of the World War. With 1913 as the base, or 100, the index of retail food prices rose from 102.2 in July 1914, to 106.5 in August, and 107.4 in September. Then food prices began to decline, and at no time during the whole year of 1915 did the index rise to the level of September 1914—the second month of the war.

This trend was sharply reversed in 1916 and, with the exception of 2 months, prices of foodstuffs advanced each month of the year. From a low of 106 in February, the index rose to 126.1 in December, an increase of 19 percent. It continued to advance in 1917 and reached 132.5 in March of that year.

EARNINGS AND HOURS OF WORK

Wages also advanced but the increases did not keep pace with the rise in retail prices and the cost of living. In May 1917 union hourly rates of wages were 14 percent higher than in May 1913, while food prices were 56 percent higher. Not all the cities and not all the industries recorded the same increases in union wage rates. For instance, in Baltimore, the increase averaged 22 percent, while in New Orleans it was only 7 percent. Again, the metal trades recorded an increase in wage rates of 27 percent, as against an average of about 14 percent for all trades.

Weekly earnings, however, advanced more rapidly than wage rates. War orders from abroad and the increased armaments program in the United States stimulated employment. The reduction in part-time work and a considerable amount of overtime work greatly added to the weekly earnings of workers independently of changes in wage rates. From June 1914 to March 1917, 55 industries in the State of New York reported an average increase of about 25 percent in the weekly earnings of the workers employed.

The increases in New York State ranged from 9 percent in the printing and paper goods group to 30 percent in stone, clay, and glass. Some industries reported declines in employment and comparatively slight increases in average earnings.

The influences that affected rates of pay, hours of work, and weekly earnings in the State of New York were not operative to the same extent in other parts of the country. The nature of the industries in New York and the geographical location of the State gave it a prominence in filling war orders, and the earnings of the workers employed in New York advanced more rapidly than in the country as a whole. Even the wage rates of hired farm workers advanced more in New York State. The increase for New York was approximately 15 percent, as against an average of about 10 percent for the country as a whole.

EMPLOYMENT

The beginning of the World War found the United States affected by serious and widespread unemployment which continued through the first year of the war. A survey in New York City indicated that in February 1915, 18.8 percent of male workers and 9.2 percent of female workers were unemployed. Widespread unemployment was found in a survey of 16 other cities in the East and Middle West. It ranged from 4.3 percent in Bridgeport, Conn., to 20 percent in Duluth, Minn. Part-time employment varied even more widely.

However, as the war continued in Europe, unemployment in the United States began to decline, first slowly, and then at a more rapid pace. While in March 1915 employment in 55 industries in the State of New York was 6 percent lower than in June 1914, it was 23 percent higher in March 1917, just prior to the entrance of the United States into the war.

The detailed figures on employment available for the State of New York also indicate the extreme manner in which employment fluctuated in the different industries. In the manufacture of firearms, tools, and cutlery, for example, the number employed in March 1917 was more than twice as large as in June 1914. This was in contrast with the brick, tile, and pottery industries, which during the same period registered a reduction in employment of 40 percent. The largest increases in employment were recorded for the most part in industries affected by wartime demands.

Although no such detailed data are available on conditions of employment in the country as a whole in the war period, it is fairly certain that the increases in employment in other parts of the country were not so large as in New York and that the contrast between conditions of employment in the different industries was not so violent.

Night Mail Pick-Up Successful in Test

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, on many occasions I have spoken in this House on the development and possibilities of the air-mail pick-up and delivery device system.

I feel certain an increasingly large number of the Members are becoming aware of the progress being made. It is in this connection that I insert the following newspaper article from the Wilmington (Del.) Morning News of October 30, 1939:

The first public demonstration of the use of an airplane to pick up mail at night was given before officials of the Post Office Department and of the Civil Aeronautics Authority last night at Bellanca Field.

Three times a plane piloted by Holger Hoiriis swooped down, dropped its mail bag, and picked up another suspended between the two 40-foot masts, the tops of which were neon-lighted.

Each time it was greeted by cheers as the demonstration of the system which now serves 58 communities during the daylight hours went off without a hitch.

TO START NOVEMBER 15

At the close, Richard C. du Pont, president of All-American Aviation, Inc., which operates the system, announced that the new equipment for night use will be placed in operation on November 15 on the company's Philadelphia-Pittsburgh route at the stations at Grove City, Butler, and Natrona, Pa., where it will be tested under actual operating conditions.

Ambrose O'Connell, Second Assistant Postmaster General, declared the experimental service of the air pick-up system "is making good" and that night flying will unquestionably benefit hundreds of the smaller post offices throughout the country.

"I am extremely hopeful that the night service will be adopted by the Department and the daylight service extended," he said. "It will bring the advantages of air-mail service to small communities which may be scores of miles from the large transcontinental air terminals.

ADVANTAGE POINTED OUT

"The great advantage of the night service is that a businessman in a small town may drop a letter in a post office in the afternoon and know it will be delivered before noon next day in a city hundreds of miles away. Then, too, the greatest volume of mail moves at night."

The work of developing the night-flying equipment was conducted under the supervision of Mr. du Pont and James G. Ray, vice president of the company. Mr. Ray was one of the Nation's first air-mail pilots and has an international reputation as an autogiro operator.

Mr. Hoiriis, who piloted the plane last night, is a regular pilot on the route between Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. The pick-up operator in the plane was William Burkhart, of Martinsburg, W. Va., who is regularly employed in that capacity.

EQUIPMENT SIMPLE

The night-flying equipment is, like the rest of the system, simple, economical, and easily installed and operated.

The air station is lighted by outlining with red neon the flag that rests on the top of each of the two 40-foot masts comprising the station. The flying range is marked by a 12-foot horizontal bar of red neon mounted on a frame 10 feet above the ground.

Regular installation calls for a range light on each side of the station at a distance about 175 feet in a straight line from the masts so that an approach may be made from both directions.

Ordinarily current will be wired into the station, but at stations where this can be done only at prohibitive expense storage batteries will be used. The storage-battery system was used at Bellanca Field last night.

FIFTEEN-MINUTE LEEWAY

In regular operation the station attendant will switch on the station lights 15 minutes in advance of the arrival of the plane and turn them off immediately after the delivery and pick-up have been made.

As to the safety of the new night-flying equipment from the pilot's standpoint, Maj. Hal Bazely, operations manager of the company, who has been the pilot on experimental flights, reported that the lighted station under normal conditions can be seen plainly from the air at a distance of 6 miles.

This is farther than it can be seen in daylight. The pick-up can be made as easily at night as it is by day, he added.

NO CHANGE IN SCHEDULES

The introduction of the night system at the three Pennsylvania towns will not mean a change in the present schedule of the system, officials said last night. Due to the shortening of the days with the advent of autumn, these towns at the end of the route will be in darkness when the plane arrives there.

Later, should night flying prove successful, schedules will probably be introduced providing for regular day and night service.

The two air-mail routes on which the air pick-up is now in regular daily use extend through four States—Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, and Delaware—and serve 58 communities, which, with the exception of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, range in population from 799 to 106,000. Many of these communities have no airfields. Schedules require 75 pick-ups a day.

OFFICIALS PRESENT

Among the officials who witnessed the demonstration last night were C. M. Knoble, assistant superintendent of air-mail service of the Post Office Department; Richard S. Boutelle, director of the Bureau of Safety Regulation of the Civil Aeronautics Authority; Edward Yuravich, chief of the air-carrier inspection section of the Civil Aeronautics Authority; J. E. Whitbeck and Edward K. Mills, Jr., both of the legal division of the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

Representative JENNINGS RANDOLPH, of West Virginia, who sponsored the legislation authorizing the Post Office Department to establish the present air-mail routes for the test of the air pick-up system, also attended.

Others from out of town included Dr. Lytle S. Adams, of Irwin, Pa., pioneer in the development of the air pick-up and member of the board of All-American Aviation, Inc., and Blaine Stubblefield, of Washington, D. C., news editor of Aviation magazine.

Mr. Speaker, I was privileged to see this demonstration, and it is my opinion, based on careful study, that the equipment which will be placed in operation this month on one of the experimental air-mail routes, will be highly successful. This further development will definitely enlarge the scope of service which can and will be given to the American people. I am certain that no one receives a greater degree of satisfaction in these accomplishments than does Dr. L. S. Adams, inventor of the automatic pick-up and delivery device. It shall be my continued purpose to cooperate in every possible way in the increased use and expansion which I feel certain will take place.

Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 2, 1939

TELEGRAM FROM NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following telegram from pastors of the New England Conference of the Lutheran Augustana Synod against lifting the embargo:

LOWELL, MASS., October 31, 1939.

To the Representatives of the New England States, care Hon. Edith Nourse Rogers, 1155 Sixteenth Street NW., Washington, D. C.:

Pastors of the New England Conference of the Lutheran Augustana Synod, representing 35,000 members, in conference assembled, respectfully ask you to use your great influence to keep America out of war and to work for good will among men. We greatly feel that lifting the embargo would be a step toward getting us involved in European warfare.

JULIUS HULTEEN, President.
HARRY CARLSON, Secretary.
P. E. NORDGREN HOST, Pastor.

Interpretation of Hatch Political Activities Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL A. HATCH
OF NEW MEXICO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, November 3, 1939

RULINGS BY ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, late in the last session of the Congress I placed in the RECORD my own interpretation of certain rules issued by the Civil Service Commission on the bill passed by the last Congress relating to political activities. Since that time the Attorney General has made various rulings and interpretations of that bill. I have them all with me, and I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the interpretations and summary of the so-called Hatch law as given by the Attorney General.

I wish to say, in connection with the work being done by the Attorney General of the United States, that I think the Attorney General has given the country a first-class and splendid effort in the interpretation and enforcement of this law.

There being no objection, the interpretations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., August 10, 1939.

CIRCULAR NO. 3285

Re: Hatch Act provisions most important to Federal Government employees.

To all Officials and Employees of the Department of Justice and United States Courts:

The provisions of the Hatch Act (Public, No. 252, approved August 2, 1939) that are of the most general interest to Federal Government employees, and most likely to cause inquiry and concern, are sections 2 and 9, as follows:

"SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person employed in any administrative position by the United States, or by any department, independent agency, or other agency of the United States (including any corporation controlled by the United States or any agency thereof, and any corporation all of the capital stock of which is owned by the United States or any agency thereof), to use his official authority for the purpose of interfering with or affecting the election or the nomination of any candidate for the office of President, Vice President, Presidential elector, Member of the Senate, or Member of the House of Representatives, Delegates, or Commissioners from the Territories and insular possessions."

"SEC. 9. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person employed in the executive branch of the Federal Government, or any agency or department thereof, to use his official authority or influence for the purpose of interfering with an election or affecting the result thereof. No officer or employee in the executive branch of the Federal Government, or any agency or department thereof, shall take any active part in political management or in political campaigns. All such persons shall retain the right to vote as they may choose and to express their opinions on all political subjects. For the purposes of this section the term "officer" or "employee" shall not be construed to include (1) the President and Vice President of the United States; (2) persons whose compensation is paid from the appropriation for the office of the President; (3) heads and assistant heads of executive departments; (4) officers who are appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who determine policies to be pursued by the United States in its relations with foreign powers or in the Nation-wide administration of Federal laws."

Provisions similar to the foregoing are found in Civil Service rule 1, section 1. Many of the questions and situations currently arising under the Hatch law have previously been considered and ruled upon by the Civil Service Commission in construing the provisions of the civil-service rules. These rulings have been published in Form 1236, issued by the Civil Service Commission in August 1936, entitled "Political Activities and Political Assessments," and are binding upon civil-service employees.

While the rulings contained in Form 1236 are not necessarily controlling as to non-civil-service employees, they will be found instructive and helpful in dealing with many of the problems that will arise under the Hatch law. Where a particular situation is not covered by these rulings or where, for substantial reasons, it appears to require a different interpretation, a determination of the question can be obtained from the Department.

Civil-service employees are required by the civil-service rules to confine their opinions on political subjects to private expression. From the corresponding provision of the Hatch law, on the other hand, the word "privately" was omitted. Accordingly, as stated by the President in his message to the Congress approving the Hatch bill, non-civil-service employees would not violate the act "if they should merely express their opinion or preference publicly—orally, by radio, or in writing—without doing so as part of an organized political campaign."

It should be noted that while the penalty for violation of section 9 is removal from office as in the case of the corresponding rule 1 of the civil-service rules, the penalty for violation of section 2 is a fine of not to exceed $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

The provisions of section 2 apply to all persons employed in administrative positions in the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the Federal Government, whereas section 9 applies only to employees of the executive branch. Other provisions of the Hatch law relating to the improper use of relief appropriations for political purposes, intimidation of voters, and the like, apply to all persons, including employees of State and local governments and private individuals.

FRANK MURPHY, Attorney General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, October 18, 1939.

CIRCULAR NO. 3298

To All United States Attorneys, United States Marshals, Assistant United States Attorneys, Deputy Marshals:

Your attention is again invited to the following provision of section 9 (a) of the act of August 2, 1939 (Public, No. 252, 76th Cong.), known as the Hatch Act:

"No officer or employee in the executive branch of the Federal Government, or any agency or department thereof, shall take any active part in political management or in political campaigns."

For an officer or employee of the executive branch of the Federal Government to hold any office in any political party organization or political club, or to be a member of any committee of any political party organization or political club, is deemed a violation of the foregoing provision. Accordingly, if you hold any such office or committee membership, you should forthwith resign therefrom, or from your present position under the Federal Government.

You are requested to acknowledge receipt of this circular immediately, and in the event that you have been holding office in any political party organization or political club, or membership in any committee of any political party organization or political club, to state whether or not you have resigned therefrom and the date of such resignation.

EDWARD G. KEMP,
Assistant to the Attorney General.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., October 26, 1939.

CIRCULAR NO. 3301

In the interpretation and application of the Hatch law a number of cases have arisen under section 9 (a) in which doubt has been expressed and the Department has been called upon to make a ruling. In issuing this circular it is the aim of the Department merely to summarize these rulings for the benefit and information of Government employees and the public generally. It is not the purpose to enumerate or describe all the activities and positions to which the law may or may not apply.

Accordingly, the circular should not be regarded as a complete or comprehensive statement of all the positions and activities to which section 9 (a) applies. The law is general in scope and (with a few prominent exceptions) forbids all officers and employees of the executive branch of the Federal Government to take any active part in political management or political campaigns.

The pertinent provisions of section 9 are as follows:

"No officer or employee in the executive branch of the Federal Government, or any agency or department thereof, shall take any active part in political management or in political campaigns. All such persons shall retain the right to vote as they may choose and to express their opinions on all political subjects."

I

It has been ruled that the following officers and employees in the executive branch of the Federal Government, among others, are affected by the provisions of section 9 of the Hatch Act:

1. United States attorneys and marshals, their assistants and deputies.
2. Special attorneys of the Department of Justice and special assistants to the Attorney General.
3. Temporary employees, substitute employees, and per diem employees, during the period of their active employment.
4. Reserve officers of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps during the period of their active duty.
5. Furloughed employees and employees on leave, whether with or without pay.
6. Officers and employees of governmental agencies such as the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the Public Works Administration.
7. Officers and employees occupying administrative and supervisory positions in the Work Projects Administration, the National Youth Administration, and the Civilian Conservation Corps.

NOTE.—Persons employed in any administrative or supervisory capacity by any agency of the Federal Government whose compensation or any part thereof is paid from funds authorized by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1939 should consult section 31 of that act, which limits their public expression of opinions on political subjects more strictly than does the Hatch Act.

II

Section 9 of the Hatch Act has been construed as not applying to the following:

1. Officers and employees of the legislative branch of the Federal Government, including secretaries and clerks to Members of Congress and congressional committees.
2. Officers and employees of the judicial branch of the Federal Government, including United States commissioners, clerks of United States courts, referees in bankruptcy, and their secretaries, deputies, and clerks.
3. Officers and employees of State and local governments, even though their employment involves the expenditure of Federal funds.
4. Persons who are retained from time to time to perform special services on a fee basis and who take no oath of office, such as fee attorneys, inspectors, appraisers, and management brokers for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and special fee attorneys for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.
5. Persons who receive benefit payments, such as old-age assistance and unemployment compensation under the Social Security Act, rural rehabilitation grants, and payments under the agricultural-conservation program.
6. Retired employees.

III

It has been ruled that the following acts constitute taking an "active part in political management or in political campaigns" within the meaning of section 9 of the Hatch Act:

1. Holding office in a political party or a political club.
2. Attending political conventions as a delegate or alternate.
3. Serving on committees of a political party or a political club.
4. Distributing buttons or printed matter in support of any candidate or party.
5. Serving at party headquarters or as watchers at the polls, or otherwise assisting a party or candidate in any primary or election campaign, whether or not Federal offices are involved.
6. Being a candidate for elective office—Federal, State, or local.
7. Soliciting funds for a political organization or campaign fund.

NOTE.—Severe penalties are provided under section 5 of the Hatch Act for those who solicit or receive any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose from a person known to be receiving compensation, employment, or other benefit provided for or made possible by any act of Congress appropriating funds for work-relief or relief purposes. Such persons include the administrative and supervisory personnel of relief agencies as well as the actual recipients of relief.

IV

The following activities are not considered to be prohibited by the Hatch Act:

1. Holding membership in a political organization and attending its meetings otherwise than as an officer or delegate.
2. Participating in the activities of civic associations and educational groups, provided the activities in question are divorced from the campaigns of particular candidates or parties.
3. Holding a State or local office (but see III (6) above).

NOTE.—An Executive order of January 17, 1873, forbids persons holding a Federal civil office by appointment from holding any State or municipal office, with the exception of positions such as justice of the peace, notary public, commissioner to take acknowledgment of deeds or bail or to administer oaths, and positions on boards of education, school committees, public libraries, and in religious or eleemosynary institutions. Special exceptions are made in subsequent Executive orders.

Circulars summarizing additional rulings will be issued as the necessity arises.

FRANK MURPHY, Attorney General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., October 26, 1939.

CIRCULAR NO. 3302

To All Officers and Employees of the Department of Justice:

Your attention is invited to the following provision of section 9 (a) of the act of August 2, 1939 (Public, No. 252, 76th Cong.), known as the Hatch Act:

"No officer or employee in the executive branch of the Federal Government, or any agency or department thereof, shall take any active part in political management or in political campaigns."

For an officer or employee of the executive branch of the Federal Government to hold any office in any political party organization or political club, or to be a member of any committee of any political party organization or political club, is deemed a violation of the foregoing provision. Accordingly, if you hold any such office or committee membership, you should forthwith resign therefrom, or from your present position under the Federal Government.

You are requested to acknowledge receipt of this circular immediately and to state whether you have been holding office in any political party organization or political club, and, if so, to state whether or not you have resigned therefrom, with the date of such resignation.

Your reply should be transmitted through the head of the division or bureau to which you are accredited.

EDWARD G. KEMP,
The Assistant to the Attorney General.

Emergency Powers of the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. TOWNSEND, JR.

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT A. TAFT, OF OHIO, BEFORE THE INDIANAPOLIS BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] before the Indianapolis Bar Association on October 30, 1939. The subject of the address is Emergency Powers of the President.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Congress and the country have been so much engaged on the question of neutrality that little attention has been paid to the increase in the Executive power resulting from war. But that increase in power is provided for in countless statutes dealing with nearly every phase of Government activity, and by the Constitution itself. Some extraordinary powers granted by the Constitution, and by so-called New Deal emergency statutes become more important and more likely to be used in time of war. Some special war powers arise merely from the existence of a war between other nations, and the emergency conditions incident to such a war. Other extensive statutory powers come into existence when the United States itself becomes involved in war.

I am convinced that whatever may happen to the present Neutrality Act, the United States will not become involved in the present European war, but nevertheless we should be interested in preparedness, and preparedness involves many fields besides the Army and Navy. Furthermore, we should realize what a tremendous change may be effected in our whole political and economic status if we become involved in war. The danger of a complete and perhaps permanent change in the American way of life, and American democracy itself, is a strong argument against war of any kind which is not forced upon us as a matter of defense.

I do not say that the President should be stripped of emergency wartime powers. Unfortunately, certain extraordinary powers are necessary in time of war. My purpose in discussing these powers is to show how extensive they are and may become, and to point out the dangers to democratic processes attendant upon modern warfare, rather than to criticize the present Executive. However, I do believe that the prospect of these powers being exercised should give more cause for concern in view of the philosophy of government regulation and a planned economy which dominates the present administration.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS

There can be no doubt that, regardless of statutes, the President's power is greatly increased in time of war. The Constitution specifically provides that the President shall be commander in chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and under this power, once war is declared, and even before war is declared, the President may give such orders to the Army and Navy as to cause them to engage in military operations. There are several statutes which expressly provide that the President may employ the land and naval forces of the United States to carry out the purposes of the statute, but the necessarily implied powers are much greater.

Under his powers as Commander in Chief, President Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation and effected a profound change in the whole economy of the United States. Under this same power President Wilson established a rigid censorship over telephone, telegraph, and cable systems by an Executive order issued on April 28, 1917. Upon the declaration of war with Germany, and on later occasions, President Wilson placed restrictions upon German insurance companies doing business in the United States and made regulations with regard to German patents. His proclamations stated that his action was based on "the authority vested in me as such President." (Proclamations of April 6, May 24, and July 13, 1917, published in U. S. Stat., 65th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 10, 23, and 40.) The President under the Constitution (art. I, sec. 9, par. 2) may suspend the writ of habeas corpus in cases of rebellion or invasion. The Constitution does not say expressly who has the power to suspend, but the courts have held that it lies with the President.

Undoubtedly there are many other powers which may be exercised by the President as Commander in Chief. They must have a direct relation to the conduct of a war, but there are few important activities in a country at war which may not be argued to have a fairly direct relation to military operations.

STATUTORY POWERS RELATING TO ARMED FORCES

The constitutional powers of the President, furthermore, have been supplemented by extensive statutory regulations. Many of these have been on the books for years. Others were adopted during the World War, but are applicable to any war. Others have been adopted deliberately as part of the preparation for another war.

It is natural that extensive statutory powers should be given to increase the Army and Navy in case of war or threatened war. President Lincoln ordered a large increase in the Regular Army at the outbreak of the Civil War without congressional authority of any kind, but it was considered, even by President Lincoln himself, that his act was clearly beyond his powers. By a proclamation issued on May 3, 1861, based solely "upon existing exigencies" and his own position "as President and Commander in Chief," he increased the Regular Army by 22,714 officers and men and the Navy by 18,000 seamen. He also issued a call for volunteers and ordered the addition of 19 vessels to the Navy.

Today the law implies a power on the part of the President to increase the Army indefinitely. It reads:

"Except in time of war or similar emergency when the public safety demands it, the number of enlisted men of the Regular Army shall not exceed 280,000, including the Philippine Scouts (10 U. S. C. 602)."

A somewhat similar provision but imposing an outside limit on the President's powers, relates to increasing the authorized strength of the Navy:

"The permanent authorized enlisted strength of the active list of the Regular Navy shall be 131,485: Provided, That the President is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment a sufficient emergency exists, to increase the authorized enlisted strength of the Navy to 191,000 men (34 U. S. C. 151)."

The President on September 8, 1939, issued a proclamation of national emergency, proclaiming "that a national emergency exists in connection with and to the extent necessary for the proper observance, safeguarding, and enforcing of the neutrality of the United States and the strengthening of our national defense." Just what the purpose or legal effect of this proclamation was I have not been able to discover, as specific orders under the various statutes must still be based on a definite finding of emergency in the order itself.

The President, however, on the same date, went on to issue some of these specific orders. By Order No. 8244, he provided for an increase of the Regular Army to 227,000 men, and by Order No. 8245 he ordered an increase in the Regular Navy to a figure not exceeding 145,000 men, and an increase in the Marine Corps to 25,000 men. The naval increase was made under the emergency statute, but the Army strength is still well below the statutory authorization. The real purpose of these proclamations was to remove the statutory limitation which requires appropriations to be expended more or less equally over the 12 months of a fiscal year. Both of these Executive orders authorized the Department concerned to waive or modify the monthly or other apportionments of its appropriation for contingent expenses or other general purposes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940.

The statutory limitation referred to was enacted to prevent departments from using all their appropriations early in the year and then presenting to Congress the choice between deficiency appropriations and the complete suspension of the department's activities. But the statute (31 U. S. C., sec. 665) contains an exception for emergencies:

"Such apportionments shall not be waived or modified except upon the happening of some extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance which could not be anticipated at the time of making such apportionment."

The President's order will not result in any exceeding of the appropriations for the Army and Navy until some time next spring, but in January Congress will undoubtedly be asked for a deficiency appropriation and will be forced to grant it to make possible the continuance of the armed forces until July 1, 1940.

All of these moves pertaining to increases in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and National Guard are clearly within the authority granted to the President in an emergency not foreseen by Congress.

On October 3, 1939, however, the President announced that he had ordered the War and Navy Departments to ignore statutory prohibitions against budgetary deficits in carrying out his orders to spend money on housing and hospitalization for the Army and Navy and on the reconditioning of many destroyers. Money for such expenses cannot be spent without direct authorization by Congress, and there has been no such authorization, and of course no appropriation. If the President proceeds he will act in clear violation of the existing laws. Whatever may be condoned in time of war, there is certainly no justification for any such usurpation of authority, particularly when Congress is in session and could act very quickly if the expenditures appear to be justified.

NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION

On September 5, 1939, shortly after war was declared the President issued several neutrality proclamations; the first was in general conformity with neutrality proclamations issued by the United States during previous international conflicts. It was described as having to do "with our activities as a neutral under the rules and procedure of international law and those of our domestic statutes in harmony therewith." It would have been issued if there had been no Neutrality Act of 1937 in the books. The others were issued to carry out the provisions of the Neutrality Act of 1937.

The first proclamation calls attention to, and makes effective, many statutes of the Penal Code of the United States and of the act of June 15, 1917 (18 U. S. C., 31–38), which make unlawful various unneutral acts; such as serving one of the belligerents in a military capacity or enlisting others to do so, fitting out armed vessels to be employed by any belligerent, supplying a belligerent vessel with arms, men, or supplies, and a number of other acts contrary also to international law. The proclamation then proceeds to prescribe rules for the conduct in our waters of the commercial vessels and armed vessels of belligerent states. This proclamation may be found in the Department of State Bulletin for September 9, 1939, volume 1, No. 11, publication 1376.

The second proclamation finds that a state of war exists between Germany, France, Poland, the United Kingdom, India, Australia, and New Zealand. It then lists the several categories of arms, ammunition, and implements of war, the export of which is expressly forbidden by the Neutrality Act of 1937, now in force, wherever such a proclamation has been issued. This proclamation may also be found in the Department of State Bulletin for September 9, 1939.

Under section 11 of the Neutrality Act of 1937, the President has the power during any war in which the United States is neutral to place restrictions on the use of the ports and territorial waters of the United States by the submarines or armed merchant vessels of a foreign state whenever he finds that such action will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign states. President Roosevelt has recently acted under this authorization insofar as submarines are concerned. Whether or not action on submarines and lack of action on armed merchant vessels is neutral in spirit it is clearly within the authority of the law.

Under the Neutrality Act of 1937, as under the amending resolution adopted Friday by the Senate, there are a number of provisions relating to the prohibition of credit to belligerent governments which are put into effect by the issue of the proclamation finding a state of war to exist:

"It shall thereafter be unlawful for any person within the United States to purchase, sell, or exchange bonds, securities, or other obligations of the government of any belligerent state, or to make any loan or extend any credit to any such government."

Under the Neutrality Act of 1937 the President may except from the operation of this section ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations in aid of legal transactions and of a character customarily used in ordinary peacetime commercial transactions, and he did so by proclamation on September 6, 1939. But this exception will be nullified by the provisions of the new neutrality resolution if and when it is passed.

He also put into effect on September 5 the provisions of the Neutrality Act prohibiting the travel of Americans on the ships of belligerent nations.

Under the neutrality resolution now before Congress the arms embargo will come to an end, but many other provisions will become effective on proclamation of the President. The President is not required to act even if war exists, but Congress then by concurrent resolution may force him to act. On the issue of a proclamation shipments of all goods on American vessels to belligerent countries in Europe become unlawful, and similar shipments on foreign vessels are unlawful unless title has been transferred to foreigners.

Restrictions similar to those provided in existing law for credits to belligerents, travel in belligerent ships, and regulation of the use of American ports are proposed to be reenacted in the pending bill. In general, the chief differences in the pending legislation and existing law are the repeal of the arms embargo and the enactment of strict cash-and-carry provisions for all merchandise, including arms.

EMERGENCY POWERS OVER BUSINESS

The emergency powers I have referred to deal directly with wars between other nations and with our own preparedness. There are many other statutes, however, giving the President extensive powers over business of all kinds in the United States. Some of these powers may be exercised without waiting for war. For instance, under section 606, paragraph (c) of title 47 of the United States Code:

"Upon proclamation by the President that there exists war or a threat of war or a state of public peril or disaster or other national emergency, or in order to preserve the neutrality of the United States, the President * * * may cause the closing of any station for radio communication and the removal therefrom of its apparatus and equipment; or he may authorize the use or control of any such station, and/or its apparatus and equipment by any department of the Government under such regulations as he prescribes upon just compensation to the owners."

As a practical matter, in other words, the Government could take over all the radio stations in the United States tomorrow.

He may not, apparently, take over the telegraph and telephone systems without further statutory authority, because paragraph (a) of the section quoted above merely states that:

"During the continuance of a war in which the United States is engaged the President is authorized, if he finds it necessary for the national defense and security, to direct that such communications as, in his judgment, may be essential to the national defense and security shall have preference or priority over any carrier subject to this chapter * * *."

It appears, therefore, that his powers with respect to telephone and telegraph systems are much more limited, and even then may only be exercised in time of war. But we saw that President Wilson imposed a strict censorship in the World War without statutory authority.

Certain emergency power with relation to the railroads is contained in section 1 (15) of the Interstate Commerce Act, giving the Interstate Commerce Commission powers in emergencies to direct priorities in shipments and require joint use of cars, tracks, and terminals, as may be necessary. The Interstate Commerce Commission, in time of war or threat of war, is required to act when the President certifies the necessity of any preferences and priorities. But the President himself may go further in time of war. Section 1361 of title 10 of the United States Code, which became law on August 29, 1916, reads as follows:

"The President, in time of war, is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation, or any part thereof, and to utilize the same, to the exclusion as far as may be necessary of all other traffic thereon, for the transfer or transportation of troops, war material, and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable."

Under this statute there is no doubt that the President could take over the railroads, just as President Wilson did in the World War, and settle the terms of compensation at a later time.

But the President's power over industrial plants is even wider. Under section 80 of title 50 of the United States Code, the President, "in time of war or when war is imminent," may:

"Place an order with any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry for such product or material as may be required, and which is of the nature and kind usually produced or capable of being produced by such individual, firm, * * *. Compliance with all such orders of product or material shall be obligatory on any individual, firm, etc., * * * and shall take precedence over all other orders and contracts theretofore placed with such individual, firm, etc."

Should any such individual or firm which is equipped to fill the orders given it refuse to do so at a reasonable price as determined by the Secretary of War, or refuse to give the United States preference:

"The President through the head of any department of the Government * * * is authorized to take immediate possession of any such plant or plants and through the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, to manufacture therein in time of war, or when war shall be imminent, such product or material as may be required * * *."

Under this authority the Secretary of War might find such low prices to be reasonable that the manufacturer would prefer to let the Government take his plant and rely on the courts to fix a fair compensation later. And the power may be exercised "when war is imminent," or the President says that it is imminent.

Section 82 of the same title gives the President even greater powers over industries but in time of war only. This section permits the President to modify or cancel any existing contracts for the building, production, or purchase of ships or war material, and to require the owner or occupier of any factory in which ships or war material are built or produced to place at the disposal of the United States the whole or any part of the output of such factory. Under this section the President may "requisition or take" over for use or operation by the Government any factory or any part thereof without taking possession of the entire factory, whether the United States has or has not any contract or agreement with the owner or occupier thereof.

It would be possible under these sections for the Government to take nearly every factory in the United States, leaving the question of compensation to be determined later by the courts. These statutes existed during the World War and were passed shortly before we entered the war. No plants were taken over as far as I know, but the threat to take them over formed the basis of the power through which the War Industries Board directed the manufacture of materials related in one way or another to the war.

WHEN WAR IS IMMINENT

When can war be said to be imminent, and who determines it? Presumably, this means a war in which the United States is engaged, but there is a statute which authorizes the President to designate an officer of the Army to assume exclusive authority over the operation of the Panama Canal in time of war or when, in his opinion, war is imminent (U. S. C., title 48, sec. 1306). On September 5, 1939, by Executive Order No. 8232, which may be found in the Federal Register of September 6, 1939, the President took action under that statute and designated such an officer to take charge of the Canal Zone. The order does not contain any specific finding that war is imminent, but it refers to the statute and can only be supported by such a finding. It seems that in this matter the President has exceeded his authority, although the statute in that case perhaps should have permitted the authority to be exercised in the case of war between other nations.

However, the President's action illustrates the fact that the person who construes these statutes in the first instance is the Executive himself, and he is likely to construe them as broadly as possible. It is very difficult for anyone to question the Executive power in the courts in most cases, so that many emergency powers in practice are actually much broader than attorneys are likely to realize on a first reading of the statutes.

BANKING AND MONETARY POWERS

The President has various emergency powers with relation to the banking system which are not necessarily connected with war.

The proclamations President Roosevelt issued on March 5, 1933, closing the banks, were made under the authority of the Trading with the Enemy Act of October 22, 1917, although there was no war at that time and the act was on its face only operative in time of war. Extensive powers do arise in time of war, however, relating to foreign dealings. Section 5 (6) reads as follows:

"(b) That the President may investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange, export, or earmarkings of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, transfers of credit in any form * * * and transfers of evidence of indebtedness or of the ownership of property between the United States and any foreign country, whether enemy, ally of enemy, or otherwise, or between residents of one or more foreign countries, by any person within the United States."

In the act of March 9, 1933 (12 U. S. C. 95), the President is given powers over the banking system which may be exercised in time of emergency whether or not a state of war existed, but perhaps more likely to be exercised when war occurs. Provisions of this section are as follows:

"In order to provide for the safer and more effective operation of the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System, to preserve for the people the full benefits of the currency provided for by the Congress through the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System, and to relieve interstate commerce of the burdens and obstructions resulting from the receipt on an unsound or unsafe basis of deposits subject to withdrawal by check, during such emergency period as the President of the United States by proclamation may prescribe, no member bank of the Federal Reserve System shall transact any banking business except to such extent and subject to such regulations, limitations, and restrictions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President."

The President can close the banks or tell them in detail how they may run their business.

In any consideration of emergency banking powers we should refer to certain powers granted to the President under the provisions of some of the New Deal legislation. The power to devalue the dollar was originally granted in the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, partially exercised at that time, and last July was renewed over strenuous opposition. The President may still devalue the dollar from its present value of slightly over 59 cents to 50 cents. While not a war power, administration spokesmen have compared it, as a weapon in economic warfare, to a powerful navy in actual warfare. The President, through the Secretary of the Treasury, has also almost unlimited power over the operation of the stabilization fund. Conceivably in time of war it could be used to stabilize the currency of a belligerent nation by buying such currency in large amounts, creating purchasing power for that nation in this country. Secretary Morgenthau has stated that he will never use the fund for such a purpose without consulting Congress, but the power exists, nevertheless. The President also has still the power to issue $3,000,000,000 in greenbacks, which he might use to finance a war, as many wars have been financed throughout the world in the past.

POWER OVER ELECTRIC PLANTS

When the safety of the United States demands it (a unique method of referring to an emergency) the President has certain powers through the Federal Power Commission over transmission and sale of electric energy and water-power projects.

Section 16, United States Code 809, provides:

"When in the opinion of the President of the United States the safety of the United States demands it, the United States shall have the authority to enter upon and take possession of any project (meaning a water-power project) or part thereof, constructed, maintained, or operated under said license, for the purpose of manufacturing explosives, or munitions of war, or for any other purpose involving the safety of the United States, to retain possession, management, and control thereof for such length of time as may appear to the President to be necessary to accomplish certain purposes * * *."

With respect to other producers of electric energy, the Federal Power Commission has certain powers either in war or other emergency under paragraph (c) of section 824 (a) of title 16 of the United States Code:

"During the continuance of any war in which the United States is engaged, or whenever the Commission determines that any emergency exists by reason of a sudden increase in the demand for electric energy or shortage of electric energy, or facilities for the transmission or generation of electric energy or of fuel or water for generating facilities, or other causes, the Commission shall have authority * * * to require by order such temporary connections or facilities and such generation, delivery, interchange, or transmission of electric energy as, in its judgment, will best meet the emergency and serve the public interest."

This section, while it does not specifically give the Power Commission the right to take over electric utilities, provides that it may virtually dictate how they shall operate, and it is possible that under the statutes, which I have previously mentioned, pertaining to industrial plants, the President might have sufficient power to requisition power plants and other facilities for the generation or transmission of power.

PROPOSED WAR LEGISLATION

The conclusion from an examination of the statutes is that the war legislation and the other statutes giving emergency powers to the President are haphazard and casual, but broad and capable of infinite application. It is important that the statutes be more definite on the question of the time when the various powers may be exercised. Some fields are not covered at all, so that it may even be necessary to supplement these laws. In general, however, they seem to give the President such extensive power that an administration desiring to substitute for the present economic organization of the United States a completely socialized system could go a long way in that direction.

Furthermore, these powers are proposed to be supplemented by various bills now pending before Congress. Senate bill 1650, introduced by Mr. LEE, of Oklahoma, in the present Congress, and actually recommended by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, requests the President in time of war to take a census of the net wealth of the Nation, and makes the net wealth of each individual subject to the borrowing power of the United States, roughly, as follows: $1,000 to $100,000, 5 to 10 percent; $100,000 to $1,000,000, 15 to 25 percent; $1,000,000 to $100,000,000, 75 percent. Sums borrowed are to be represented by bonds payable in 50 years and bearing 1-percent interest. Neither principal nor interest are tax-exempt. This in effect is a capital levy, with all the difficulties incident to forcing everyone to sell his property at the same time to provide the Government with the money he is forced to lend it. Trying to meet this difficulty, the bill authorizes the President to accept notes or other obligations bearing 6-percent interest and secured by liens upon specified property, and to issue currency against these notes, an ingenious form of inflation resembling that used in the French Revolution.

Another milder bill, introduced by Senator BONE, proposes that in time of war the income tax shall be increased until it takes practically all income of individuals. The surtax is increased so that it amounts to 50 percent of all surtax net incomes in excess of $6,500; 70 percent of all such incomes in excess of $8,000, and 93 percent of all incomes in excess of $20,000. It has been pointed out that when State income taxes are taken into consideration, the combined taxes in many cases will amount to more than 100 percent of income.

Both of these bills are based on the theory that if men are to be conscripted in time of war wealth should also be conscripted. There can be no doubt that taxes should be greatly increased in time of war, and that war expenses should be financed as largely as possible through taxation rather than by borrowing. But, after all, the purpose of war legislation should be to assist the country to win this war, and these bills in their present form, together with other powers already existing and those which will be demanded, are likely so to disrupt the entire economic system of the United States as to hurt rather than help in organizing the country for war. If a man is kept busy selling everything he has, and filing petitions in bankruptcy, he is not going to enter wholeheartedly into the job where he can be of most value in prosecuting the war.

In 1936 an industrial mobilization plan was adopted by a commission appointed for that purpose, approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. It advocates a scientific approach to this question of preparation of war and lays down the general principles which must guide such mobilization. This plan is well worth reading as a whole, but I quote from some of the general principles stated:

"The measures adopted must be such as to minimize damaging effects of such changes in industrial activity and to maintain an approximate economic equilibrium throughout the Nation. No radical changes in normal economic relationships between individuals and between an individual and the Government should be instituted. The methods and customs of peace must be employed as far as practicable, otherwise confusion and chaos will result. The attempt should be to guide and to influence the operation of natural forces rather than to oppose them by arbitrary and unnecessary regulations."

Unfortunately, the bills prepared to carry out this plan hardly seem to be in accord with these principles. A bill was introduced in the Seventy-fourth Congress, known as H. R. 5529, which was designed to provide much of the machinery outlined in the industrial mobilization plan. This bill was passed by the House of Representatives and was considered by three Senate committees, but was not enacted into law. It provided for a draft of industrial management by which registered persons in any industrial plant might be brought into Government service under the control of the War Department. It provided that the President could fix prices, regulate commodity exchanges, establish a system of priorities or rationing. It granted other powers which would have given the President almost exclusive control over the entire industrial and economic activity of the country.

A bill very similar to this one was introduced in the present Congress (S. 2160), entitled "A bill to provide revenue and facilitate the regulation and control of the economic and industrial structure of the Nation, for the successful prosecution of war, and for other purposes."

The provisions of the bill are to become effective upon the declaration by Congress that a state of war exists between the United States and any foreign government and that the existence of such state of war creates a grave national emergency.

Title I provides for reasonably increased income-tax rates and the dropping of the exemptions to $800.

Most corporations will be taxed on their incomes at rates from less than 1 to 77 percent, depending on the ratio between undistributed net income and adjusted net income. A flat rate of 25 percent is imposed on banks, China trade corporations, insurance companies, domestic corporations in receivership, and nonresident foreign corporations, and 40 percent on resident foreign corporations.

Under title II, to be called the Industrial Management Act, the President may require registration of persons engaged in managing or controlling industry. They may be subjected to War Department control and may be drafted, if necessary, for service in the War Department. Such persons shall receive no compensation except as shall be fixed and paid by the President.

Title III, called war-resources control, gives the President the power to fix and establish just and reasonable maximum, minimum, or absolute prices or rates or rentals for any product, foodstuff, material, real property, or right declared by him essential for the national security and defense in the prosecution of war; to close any commodity exchange or to publish rules and regulations with the force and effect of law for the government of such commodity exchanges as are not closed. The publication of prices in any form may be prohibited.

Paragraph (1) of section 502 of this section, however, is worthy of full quotation. It reads as follows, speaking of the powers of the President after a finding by him that such action is necessary:

"To requisition and take possession of any product, foodstuff, materials, commodity, real property, or right, and on such terms as he may deem advisable to sell or otherwise dispose of such product, foodstuff, material, commodity, real property or right."

The bill provides for compensation for any such requisition to be determined by the President. Any person who is not satisfied with the compensation shall be paid 75 percent of the price at once and at the close of the war may sue to recover such sum which, added to the 75 percent, shall be deemed sufficient.

Title IV of the bill gives the President power to close any or all security exchanges and prevent any public or private sale of any securities which might be handled by such exchange.

Title V of this bill is called the War Finance Control Act. It creates a five-man War Finance Control Commission. No member appointed may refuse to serve nor shall he receive any compensation from any source directly or indirectly regulated or affected by the provisions of this title. No security shall be registered with the S. E. C. until it has been previously approved by the Commission. The Commission is also empowered to loan or advance funds to any industry, establishment, or agency which requires it owing to inadequate capital plant or other inadequate financial resources which impair the efficiency or usefulness of any such industry, establishment, or agency for the successful prosecution of war.

SUMMARY

It is impossible to predict what kind of a bill may be adopted if we become involved in war, but it seems probable that the Government would require absolute power to regulate every business in the United States and do exactly what a government would do under a Socialist plan of life. It is likely that some such bill would be passed. Personally, I do not believe that such arbitrary powers are necessary. There should be a complete plan for mobilization of those resources which have a direct relation to war, but I believe practically every object could be accomplished by permitting the continued operation of private enterprise and dealing with the question of excessive profits through a greatly increased taxation. With the powers which exist, and the general patriotic spirit of cooperation existing in wartime, I believe the Government could secure all the production, transportation, and other services which it could obtain under strict compulsion. If they can be obtained through a spirit of voluntary cooperation, more work will be done and more support given the war than if every normal personal status and all individual initiative are destroyed. Even in an army we see the development of a deadening bureaucracy. If the same thing is extended to industrial production, we are likely to find it a serious handicap to the successful prosecution of the war.

Some of the bills are drafted and introduced on the theory that wealthy individuals in some way involve us in war and should be discouraged. I do not believe in the basic premise. Any wealthy person who does not see in war the destruction of his own material welfare ought to be placed in an asylum. At best we face a tremendous increase in the socialization of the United States. During the last war emergency powers were exercised by men with at least sympathy toward the existing economic order, but inspired, as I saw them, solely with the desire to make effective the Nation's resources for the winning of the war. In my opinion, the same policy should prevail during the next war. But it will depend on the spirit in which the laws are administered, because existing or future laws will certainly make the President a potential dictator in times of war. The present administration has shown its intense interest in a planned economy in time of peace, and its belief that the Government can produce prosperity by the regulation of agriculture, commerce, and industry. I thoroughly disagree with that philosophy, and I would fear that an administration dominated by it would not restrain its wishes when war power is granted. I sincerely hope that no emergency, with or without war, may ever be regarded by any official as an excuse for bringing about a permanent change in the whole economic system of the United States. Possibly the people may desire such a change; and if they do, they can bring it about. But it should only be brought about on its own merits, after a thorough public discussion and debate, and not by the use of emergency powers granted for war purposes alone.

Proposed Repeal of Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN A. DANAHER, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] over the National Broadcasting Co.'s network on October 14, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A few short years ago we often heard a current popular tune entitled "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes." I believe that song has been dusted off and brought out as the theme song of the interventionists—of those who would plunge the United States into European politics. They would have us intervene in a war which is not of our making. The issue has been so thoroughly and consistently misrepresented that I wish to undertake to clear the atmosphere and to get the smoke out of your eyes.

The interventionists have told you that we must repeal the embargo provisions of our law which today prohibit Americans from selling arms, ammunition, and implements of war to those nations engaged in war. They tell you that our Nation should put the shipment of arms and other supplies on a so-called cash-and-carry basis. This plan very plausibly makes an appeal to a great many of our people.

I have opposed the plan of repealing a reasonable and just protection for the American people which has been our law for several years. I believe that American arms and American munitions should not be sent overseas to be used in killing people and in bombing their countries. There is no reason why we cannot retain the arms embargo and forbid entirely the exportation of munitions, and at the same time, if you wish, write legislation which will put all other supplies on a cash-and-carry basis.

If we do not ship arms and munitions to one side in the war, we certainly cannot be drawn into that war because of our failure to send such arms to Europe. If we repeal our protecting statute, and if we ship arms to one side in the war, we can be drawn into the European turmoil on that account. Should we take that chance?

If we undertake to furnish munitions and implements of war to one group of belligerents, we are no longer neutral. We will have intervened in that war.

As Col. Charles A. Lindbergh said in his broadcast only last night:

"If we repeal the arms embargo with the idea of assisting one of the warring sides to overcome the other, then why mislead ourselves by talk of neutrality? Those who advance this argument should admit openly that repeal is a step toward war. The next step would be the extension of credit, and the next would be the sending of American troops."

People are beginning to get the smoke out of their eyes and are beginning to see through the pending bill. They have discovered that if this bill shall pass, the first and immediate effect of it is to repeal all the neutrality legislation now upon our books. They are discovering that the first eight sections of the bill which purport to deal with our neutrality status will not come into effect in any way whatever until and unless the President shall issue a proclamation as provided for by section 1 of the bill. But when he shall issue it and whether he shall issue it at all or not will depend entirely upon the exercise by him of his discretion. Thus he will have it in his power to say whether or not a state of war exists, and, of course, we all realize that there is one, but he need not say that it is "necessary" to promote the security of the United States that he shall issue his proclamation. This is a new condition. This is not in our present law.

The President thus has it within his power to postpone the issuance of the proclamation until any date in the future which may serve his purposes or the policy he chooses to carry on. He may even decide that he will never issue it.

You have been told that the bill provides for a so-called cash-and-carry plan. As a matter of fact, there is no requirement in this bill that even 5 cents of cash be paid. The bill simply provides that title or ownership in the goods to be exported shall pass from American citizens before the goods leave our shores. But the President again in this bill is authorized, in his discretion, to except ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations for a period of 90 days, which exception will apply to any number of transactions and apply to every possible kind of merchandise. The real fallacy in this section of the bill, which deals with credits, has never been explained to you by the interventionists. They didn't tell you that they wrote into this bill section 7 (b), which reads that "the provisions of this section shall not apply to a renewal or adjustment of such indebtedness as may exist on the date of such proclamation." Thus, if a foreign agency representing the nations which our country wishes to favor should tomorrow place orders in this country for 1,000,000 bushels of wheat, an indebtedness is created. If such an agency, representing such foreign nations, shall next week place orders for airplanes, the contract for such manufacture and sale of airplanes will create indebtedness. There is no limitation whatever on the amount of such indebtedness; there is no limitation whatever on the terms, whether it be for 90 days, 2 years, or any other given period. There is no limitation whatever on the kind of supplies which may be ordered to create such indebtedness; and hence this indebtedness may run to rifles, bombers, machine guns, wheat, cotton, or any other supplies. So, no matter how much the indebtedness may be or on what account, just so long as it may exist at some future date when the President shall issue his proclamation, all that indebtedness is taken out of this bill and credit provisions will not apply, and there is no restriction whatever upon it. What becomes of this cash-and-carry idea you have been hearing about?

It is perfectly apparent, isn't it, the way the law works now, no arms or implements of war may be exported to any warring nation? Then why do they want our law repealed? Some of them have said on the floor of the Senate that the way the law works now we may sell munitions to a neutral country and these munitions may then be transshipped to a warring nation. The law forbids this course, but if that's all they are worried about, all we have to do is to keep our present law and simply pass an amendment which will forbid the exportation of munitions and implements of war even to neutral countries. Then we won't be furnishing such arms either to warring nations or to neutral nations. Then American people will not be furnishing bombs to blow up and destroy cities and the subjects of nations with which we are at peace.

Well, the truth is beginning to come out. You can hear one Senator say that he wants to "crush Hitlerism." Who is going to do the crushing? Should we? If the real purpose of that particular gentleman's vote is to repeal the arms embargo so that American weapons and American bombs can be used to destroy Hitlerism, I assume that he has decided that Hitlerism must be crushed. Suppose that Great Britain and France try to do so but fail, must we then go in and crush Hitlerism to satisfy his aims? Is that neutrality?

I heard another Senator on the floor of the Senate say that he wants to render assistance to Great Britain and France. Assistance to do what? To win a war, of course. To satisfy this Senator's aims we must repeal the arms embargo and begin to send bombs and munitions and airplanes to Great Britain and France. But suppose that furnishing these munitions will not be enough, just suppose, if you will, that Great Britain and France ought to win but cannot even with such assistance. If they should not win, are we then going to be asked to follow our munitions overseas and to join these countries in helping them to win?

What do we know of the political aims of the 13 political parties in France? What do we know of how far Great Britain and France actually wish to permit Hitler to go? France had an alliance with Czechoslovakia and you know what happened then. Great Britain had an alliance with Poland and you know what happened then.

The interventionists will tell you that Great Britain is our first line of defense in the Atlantic Ocean. But what do you suppose our Navy is doing in the Pacific? If we were really in any danger of attack by Hitler, why is our Navy in the Far East? Isn't it perfectly apparent that Great Britain and France, with their hundreds of millions of subjects, with their vast armies and navies, are more than a match for Germany, and if that were not so, do you suppose for one minute that our Navy would be in the Pacific? Well, if Great Britain is defending us in the Atlantic, she must at least be interested to know and be happy at the thought that our Navy is in the Orient, for Great Britain had no commercial or financial interests whatever in Poland, but she has billions in the Orient.

The plain fact of the matter is that our Nation, for reasons of policy not known to you and never disclosed to you, wants to repeal the arms embargo so that this Nation of ours may intervene by giving active assistance to belligerents in an overseas war.

Let me ask you people, Did you clamor for this special session? Was it your idea? Did the lawyers, and the clergymen, and the public-spirited citizens of your town demand that the Congress should take this step or repeal our neutrality laws?

The way this bill is drawn, a manufacturer of soap in Cleveland, Ohio, can't send his own soap to his own branch warehouse in Toronto.

This isn't a neutrality bill; this is a "Help Great Britain and France bill."

In 1914, when the World War broke out, we commenced to sell munitions and other supplies to the Allies. When the available cash they had ran out the Allies received credits in this country.

When the credits became extended they floated bond issues and obtained loans in this country. In a thousand ways propaganda gradually whipped up American sympathy to a frenzy of interest. How rapidly it can be done again will become evident from realizing how rapidly it happened before. In November of 1916 President Wilson was reelected on the platform that "he kept us out of war." Less than 40 days after his inauguration as President in 1917 the United States was in the war. I saw it happen then, and I don't want to see it happen now.

I want no part of a European war. I have no disposition to see our Nation undertake to become the policeman of the world.

So I am opposed to the repeal of the embargo on the exportation of arms. If anything need be done, we can forbid the shipment of arms even to neutral countries. We can place the exportation of supplies on a real cash basis—not this spurious, unlimited-credit plan contained in the pending bill. But this much is certain: The way to keep out of Europe's wars is to stay out of them, and the way for us to be neutral is to help neither side. Let us build up our own Nation.

And then let a peace come—not a dictated peace, not an enforced peace. Let us, after a negotiated peace, be in position to restore an economic balance in the world. The issue is clear, and repeal of the embargo on arms is the first step toward war, which inevitably and inexorably, just as in 1914, will entwine us in foreign entanglements and lead us into the war.

I am opposed to repeal of the arms embargo; what do you say?

Negotiated Peace in European Conflict

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

EDITORIAL BY DAVID LAWRENCE

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a brilliant, timely, and constructive editorial by David Lawrence which appeared in the United States News of October 23, 1939. In this editorial Mr. Lawrence sets forth a plan consisting of 10 well-considered points as a basis for an honorable negotiated peace. I hope that this splendid editorial may be brought to the studious attention of every citizen of our country.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the United States News of October 23, 1939]

PEACE NOW!—INEVITABLY THERE MUST BE A JUST PEACE—THE TERMS AND CONDITIONS ARE KNOWN NOW SO WHY NOT SKIP THE WAR AND GO DIRECTLY TO THE MAIN ISSUES WHICH ARE ECONOMIC?—A FORMULA IS OFFERED AS A BASIS FOR AN ARMISTICE

(By David Lawrence)

The war can go on until the Allies win—or the war can go on until Germany wins. But in the end there must be a peace conference.

And if a peace treaty with unjust terms is signed there will subsequently be another war. Peoples do not continue indefinitely in subjugation. Absolute victory based on a dictated peace of injustice is never permanent.

The civilized world knows today—or should know—the elements of a just peace. The concessions and adjustments that must be made are known in the inner hearts and minds of statesmen on every side.

So why continue the war? Why not skip the months of bloodshed and murder and destruction and get to the peace conference now?

Immediately it will be demanded: "Make peace with Hitler? And what about restoring independence to Poland and Czechoslovakia?"

The answers are simple if we care to be realistic. Neither the continuance nor abdication of Herr Hitler is the real issue any more than the political boundaries of large or small states constitute insuperable obstacles to peace.

SETTLEMENT MUST BE BASED ON ECONOMICS

The main questions are economic. The existence or nonexistence of a Polish corridor or a port for Poland on the Baltic is not the fundamental point. What difference does a Polish corridor or a criss-cross road or a port on the seacoast make if hereafter an economic and not a military concept is to prevail in the life of Europe?

If, of course, we are to dedicate this world to permanent war, then the strategic line-up alone is of importance. If Europe is to commit itself once more to the balance-of-power doctrine, then peace cannot come till war has exhausted humanity's fighting powers and the world has learned the futility of suicide as the only answer to national and international problems.

But it must be assumed that the world desires political questions with their devastating influence to cease breeding unrest internally and externally among nations. If so, then there must be economic understandings first.

If countries have an economic set-up which makes it possible for them to live and give economic opportunity to their citizens, then dictators have less chance to exploit peoples. Unemployment always sows the seeds of political unrest and enables one-man governments to come into power. Herr Hitler is no exception to the age-old rule that when peoples are starved they rally behind the leader who affords them hope of sustenance.

REVIVAL OF WORLD TRADE IS NEEDED

What difference would it make who held the title of Chancelor of Germany if never again one man could have in his hands the casting of the die for war or peace or the suppression of human liberty? What possible reason would peoples have for giving up their liberties to fascism or communism hereafter if they were assured an economic living space in the world?

Germany needs outlets for her exports and for her large population which is congested in a relatively small area. Britain and France need the economic advantages of peace because they must maintain trade routes to their colonies and also give their peoples employment.

All the world, including America, wants employment resumed and trade revived. Credits must flow across boundaries again, and capital must be restored to peacetime uses. No economic settlement in Europe can be made without America's whole-hearted cooperation. The best way for America to avoid war, therefore, is to start now to assure peace in the world.

The necessities of the hour are economic. Once the economic problems of Europe are solved, the economic problems of all the world are solved, and so are the political issues.

When there is reciprocal trade and economic freedom, and when small nations as well as large are deprived of the power to put their neighbors into economic subjection, the occasion for resort to force is removed and peace reigns once more.

What must be rearranged are the economic sovereignties of mankind—the nations that have wealth must realize that they cannot forever hold selfishly all their possessions while the "have-not" nations struggle desperately for a livelihood.

The Thirteen Original Colonies in America would have sown the seeds of perpetual strife on this continent had they not perceived the need for surrendering economic sovereignties. European states must do likewise. Then there will be no need for "buffer states" and "corridors" and "mutual assistance" treaties.

America as a powerful neutral can initiate peace negotiations now. To the outcry that this would be "premature," it need only be said that it has always been "premature" heretofore to offer peace until one side or the other is exhausted. That formula has not abolished but stimulated wars. It is never premature to offer peace before a war resolves itself into a war of exhaustion.

There must be, as Woodrow Wilson said early in the last war, a "peace without victory." It does not mean surrender by one side or the other, but concessions from both sides toward a common objective. This is the humane course and the sensible course, for in no belligerent country today is there the slightest enthusiasm for the organized murder that is being carried on at the front.

To enable the discussion to get started it is desirable that neutral opinion be mobilized first. Governments have to await the crystallization of opinion, but citizens, and particularly the members of the press, have a duty to urge that formulas for peace be debated now.

A FORMULA TO SOLVE CHIEF PROBLEMS

We are presenting, therefore, on this page such a proposal. It is not designed to settle all questions at once, but to insist that the economic problems be tackled first and the political afterward.

Does anybody have any doubt if the economic points mentioned in the formula were acceptable that there would be any difficulty in resolving the question of boundaries or of political sovereignties?

The plan here presented is intended as a start toward the discussion. Other editors better qualified will have points to add or subtract or modify. But that we should skip the war and go direct to the peace conference seems a saving of human life as well as treasure.

This plan is submitted wholly on the initiative of The United States News and does not represent the view of any government, being published only in the hope that all belligerent governments will give this, or a similar plan, their earnest consideration. The plan follows:

1. The appointment of a peace committee of nine, to consist of one representative of each of the Governments of Germany, Great Britain, France, Italy, Russia, Japan, one representative of the northern neutral governments of Europe to be chosen by their mutual consultation, and one representative of the southern neutral governments of Europe to be chosen by mutual consultation (and in the event of disagreement final selection to be made by the Pope), and one representative to be selected by mutual consultation among the members of the Pan American Union—this delegate to represent the Pan American Union rather than any one government.

AN ECONOMIC FEDERATION OF ALL EUROPE

2. Agreement in advance by the peace committee to consider all ethnological and all economic questions which have been the cause of international friction in Europe in the last 25 years.

3. Agreement that an economic federation of European states shall be formed and governed by a council of nine representatives to be chosen from European governments, belligerent and neutral, on the basis of individual capacity rather than nationality (and in the event of disagreement the selection to be made from a panel to be submitted by the participating governments to the Pope at Rome) or by a committee of three neutral governments mutually agreed upon by the members of the peace committee, with the understanding that the decision of the three neutral governments shall be final as to personnel.

4. It should be understood in advance that all agreements are subject to ratification by the respective governments when the peace committee shall have concluded its sessions, and that this joint agreement of the European governments represented on the peace committee shall remain in force for a period of 12 years.

5. The economic federation shall be entrusted with the power to arrange a formula for trade agreements and customs duties as between members of the federation, on the one hand, and as between members of the federation and nonfederation states in other parts of the world.

6. The agenda of the conference should include consideration of a plan for the flotation, under the auspices of the economic federation, of a $10,000,000,000 loan to finance the transition from armament building to productive peacetime pursuits. Arrangements for the flotation of the loan could be handled on the basis of $2,000,000,000 subscriptions each year for the next 5 years, the details to be arranged by the Bank of International Settlements in collaboration with the central banks of Europe. The plan could include subscriptions to the loan by members of the Pan American Union as well as by European and Asiatic states, the amounts to be subscribed to be in proportion to the percentages of world trade possessed by each nation, taking an average for the period from 1932 to 1939.

PROTECTION FOR RIGHTS OF MINORITIES

7. The economic federation is to be entrusted with the power to arrange for financial consortiums embracing former German colonial possessions and permitting a new economic participation by all Europe.

8. Agreement that the economic federation should arrange for the repatriation of populations wherever practicable but that minorities in all countries shall be protected by uniform regulations insuring their status on an equality with the majorities in each country but in no case are minorities to enjoy any privileges or immunities greater than those permitted to majorities under the domestic laws of each country.

9. Agreement that an armistice shall be proclaimed immediately upon acceptance of the whole plan by the belligerent governments and that a military and naval status quo shall be maintained during the armistice with the right on the part of all countries now belligerents to resume trade with each other and with neutral countries free from interference, the quantities or quotas of imports and exports not to exceed, however, the amounts normally imported or exported in the same corresponding months, using the average for the preceding 3 years as a basis of arriving at the fixed quotas. An international committee would be appointed to issue trade licenses.

THE OBSTACLES TO MAKING OF ARMISTICE

10. Agreement in advance that sessions of the Peace Committee shall last not longer than 3 months from date of the beginning of the armistice, unless extended by majority vote of the conference and then only for a period not longer than 3 months thereafter.

What are the real obstacles to the acceptance of the foregoing 10 points? Pride of governments may be set down as foremost with the desire to retain for all times what is already possessed.

But pride is not justified if we know at heart that we are in the wrong or that we are using our properties for selfish purposes.

The British and French do not pretend that their post-war policies have been wise or that the Versailles Treaty was a just settlement. Their spokesmen have lately made healthful acknowledgment of error.

What, then, prevents peace now? We are told that "Hitler must go" or "Hitlerism must be extinguished first" and that the "word of the German Government" cannot be accepted. But it may be that if we will approach the matter properly we can obtain the written word of the German Nation. Once economic questions are settled, the peace committee can insist that all European nations agree hereafter that a national referendum, free from coercion of any kind, must be taken before there is resort to war.

The so-called Ludlow constitutional amendment referendum pledging the American people not to go to war except when their territory is actually invaded contains the germ of the new means of preventing political questions from provoking war. But this principle of human freedom must be internationally adopted to become effective. Only when territories are invaded should governments be permitted to order immediate resistance.

What we really are discussing are guaranties of peace by peoples and not by ephemeral governments. To ask for these is not novel. No victorious belligerent ever wants to stay constantly under arms. Recurrent mobilization is not conducive to mutual faith or trust.

If the belligerents will agree on the first steps, the development of guaranties will be forthcoming. The very act of negotiation now would mean the transfer from the hands of one-man governments to the hands of peoples the power to continue war or establish peace. It is not a mere change of personnel, but a new political and economic system which Europe needs, and which the whole world must help to maintain.

Role of the United States in Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

LETTER FROM HERBERT HOOVER TO WOODROW WILSON

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter published in Collier's Weekly of the issue of November 4, 1939, written by Hon. Herbert Hoover to President Woodrow Wilson under date of April 11, 1919, together with the brief editorial statement appearing with the letter.

There being no objection, the statement and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Collier's of November 4, 1939]

OUR ROLE IN EUROPE

More than 20 years ago Herbert Hoover saw the continuing conflict of European ambitions that broke out this year in Adolf Hitler's frenzied attack on Poland. In a hitherto-unpublished letter to President Wilson, Mr. Hoover prophesied forcefully the struggles that have eventuated in the second great European war of the twentieth century. His penetrating analysis was written before the Versailles Treaty was written and long before the severity of that treaty had aroused opposition in the democratic nations. The question Mr. Hoover raised is once again in the minds and hearts of Americans.

APRIL 11, 1919.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: If our experience in the last 4 months counts for anything, the practical result always is that the Allied Governments, knowing our disposition, necessarily ask for more than they expect to get, and that we find ourselves psychologically and, in fact, politically on the side of the enemy in these negotiations, and, in a constant desire to find practical working formulas, we are frequently forced to abandon some measure of what we consider sound statesmanship. The continuation of this relationship will bind us for a long period of years to a succession of compromises fundamentally at variance with our national convictions. I am not attempting to dispute the righteousness of any Allied demands, but merely to set up the fact that our viewpoint is so essentially different.

Our other practical result of our experience already is that the Americans who sit on such commissions, if they don't acquiesce and assist in enforcing any propositions from various government officials, become immediately and personally subject to attack as being inimical to their interests, and, with the powerful engines of propaganda which they employ in Europe and our own country, no such man can endure for long. These governments, if they were faced with the sole responsibility for their actions, would not attempt the measures which they seek under our protection. Therefore, for all reasons, I do not see that we can effect any real justice in these matters.

If we continue to sit in the enforcement of this peace, we will be, in effect, participating in an armed alliance in Europe, where every change in the political wind will affect the action of these commissions. We will be obliged to participate in all European questions, and we will be firmly tied definitely to one side, unless we precipitate a break and lend ourselves to the charges that we have been traitors to the "common cause."

I am convinced that there has grown up since the Armistice the policy, perhaps unconscious but nevertheless effective, of dragging the United States into every political and economic question in Europe and constantly endeavoring to secure pledges of economic and political support from us in return for our agreeing to matters which we consider for their common good, where we have no interest, and constantly using us as a stalking horse economically and politically, solely in the interests of internal political groups within the Allied governments.

These objectives and interests may be perfectly justified from their point of view, but it forces us into violations of our every instinct and into situations that our own people will never stand. For instance, I don't see how we can remain in these enforcement commissions unless we participate in the military enforcement with its enormous cost and risk, and the tendency will always be to exact the political objectives with the military strength of the United States as a background.

I have the feeling that revolution in Europe is by no means over. The social wrongs in these countries are far from solution, and the tempest must blow itself out, probably with enormous violence. Our people are not prepared for us to undertake the military policing of Europe while it boils out its social wrongs.

I have no doubt that if we could undertake to police the world and had the wisdom of statesmanship to see its gradual social evolution, that we would be making a great contribution to civilization, but I am certain that the American people are not prepared for any such measure and I am also sure that if we remain in Europe with military force, tied in an alliance which we have never undertaken, we should be forced into this storm of repression of revolution, and forced in under terms of coordination with other peoples that would make our independence of action wholly impossible.

It grows upon me daily that the United States is one great moral reserve in the world today and that we cannot maintain that independence of action through which this reserve is to be maintained if we allow ourselves to be dragged into detailed European entanglements over a period of years. In my view, if the Allies cannot be brought to adopt peace on the basis of the 14 points, we should retire from Europe lock, stock and barrel, and we should lend to the whole world our economic and moral strength, or the world will swim in a sea of misery and disaster worse than the dark ages. If they cannot be brought to accept peace on this basis, our national honor is at stake and we should have to make peace independently and retire.

I know of nothing in letter or spirit of any statement of your own, or in the 14 points, that directly or indirectly ties the United States to carry on this war through the phase of enforcement, or the multitudinous demands and intrigues of a great number of other governments and their officials. It does appear to me that your conception of the League of Nations was with view to the provision of a dominant court, where these difficulties could be thrashed out, and if we sit as one of the prosecutors, the court will have no judge.

Faithfully yours,

H. H.

George Bernard Shaw's Inquiry as to British War Aims

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE MINNEAPOLIS MORNING TRIBUNE OF NOVEMBER 1, 1939

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Mr. Shaw Asks a Question," published in the Minneapolis Morning Tribune of November 1, 1939.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Minneapolis Morning Tribune of November 1, 1939]

MR. SHAW ASKS A QUESTION

Conceding that George Bernard Shaw is a tiresome and cantankerous old man, he can still propound wicked questions to harass those with whom he disagrees. Of Prime Minister Chamberlain, for example, he has just asked, "What in the devil's name is it all about, now that we have let Poland go?" Mr. Shaw is referring to the war with Germany. He thinks that Great Britain doesn't "care two hoots about Poland," and that the war is simply being fought "on our old balance-of-power lines to disable Germany, which we now call abolishing Hitler." If there are nobler reasons for continuing the conflict, he would be pleased to have Mr. Chamberlain present them.

The Prime Minister might reply, of course, that Great Britain is still fighting for Poland; but that can be only an incidental issue. The truth is that a considerable portion of Poland is now in possession of Russia and cannot be wrested away from the Soviet by methods short of war. If Britain is fighting against German aggression, why not fight against Russian aggression? Why not save Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, which are now virtually puppet states of Moscow? Or why ignore Albania, the little Adriatic state that was steam-rollered by Mussolini's army?

Mr. Shaw might devise such questions endlessly, but the Prime Minister would not thank him for his labor, for all of them invite the admission that Great Britain is not fighting against aggression per se so much as it is fighting the particular power which most seriously threatens Britain's dominance of Europe. That is precisely what Mr. Shaw seeks to prove—that the war is preeminently a war for control, and that there are no elegant moral issues involved. And that is precisely what no responsible British official will admit.

The matter of war objectives has more than a little pertinence for this country because Lord Lothian, the British Ambassador to the United States, is already asking what contribution we intend to make to the consummation of a peace secured by the establishment of "overwhelming power behind law." Until the purposes for which the present war is being waged are better clarified, an answer to that question is quite impossible. But it can be rather safely said that the United States will take no part in a peace which merely seeks to create a new pattern of power politics in Europe or to underwrite the old status quo. The cynicism generated by Versailles and its aftermath still survives. We should like to know, with Mr. Shaw, what "it is all about" before we pledge our services as peacemaker. "Overwhelming power behind law" is a neat phrase, but what purposes will be so reinforced, and who will make the law? From London, Paris, and Berlin come professions of virtuous intentions, but the real test of those intentions will be presented at the peace tables. If the United States is to be invited to another Versailles it will not be difficult to frame an answer. It should be in the immortal words of Sam Goldwyn, "Include me out."

American Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS BY FORMER GOV. ALFRED M. LANDON

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by former Gov. Alfred M. Landon, of Kansas, before the Men's Brotherhood, First Methodist Church, Shenandoah, Iowa, on November 1, 1939. The address deals with some fundamentals of a responsible foreign policy for the United States. I consider it well worth careful reading and consideration by my colleagues.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Concern for peace is uppermost in the mind of every American today. That concern is rightly awakening a new interest in events and questions of our foreign policy.

A few months ago no one could risk the attention of his audience even to mention foreign affairs. Now he can hardly risk talking about anything else.

It is my earnest hope that such concern and interest will not diminish, because the crucial fight over our foreign policy lies in the months to come. Every citizen needs contribute his part in thought and discussion in order to formulate a truly American foreign policy. Such a policy is of more vital importance to every one of us than we are in the habit of recognizing. Not only is it vital to keep us out of war now, but to lay the foundations for tomorrow's peace in the policy we adopt today.

There is mighty little isolated life left anywhere in the world. It seems like yesterday when the world was nothing more than a collection of loosely knit, isolated, self-sufficient communities. Now the hitherto most self-sustaining village in Europe wants gasoline and radios. Our own once isolated village sees the Nation pass in review before its gasoline filling stations.

So every day's world events are of real significance to our national life. We realize now that we cannot ignore what is going on in Europe, any more than Europe can ignore what is happening here. But we must be able to weigh properly the events and happenings abroad. Then, too, we must be just as able to evaluate our actions at home and appreciate the importance of such actions to our relationships abroad. We must not overemphasize or overdramatize such acts. When the sum total of the opinions of the average American on any question is reached the question is decided that way.

Frankly, I am afraid we have always overemphasized the importance of neutrality legislation. It is important; yes. But it is not more important than our entire foreign policy. And by overstressing neutrality legislation we have been detracting from the larger questions abroad and at home. We cannot just pass a law and have peace. It is not so simple as that. Our real fight to keep out of war will only begin once Congress has taken definite action. Many will feel secure and let up in their vigilance, once "we've got a law," just as the earnest and conscientious drys let down in their campaign of education for the cause of temperance after national prohibition came.

"We can keep out of war if those who watch and decide have a sufficient detailed understanding of international affairs, to make certain that the small decisions of each day do not lead toward war and if, at the same time, they possess the courage to say 'no' to those who selfishly or unwisely would let us go to war."

These words are not mine. They were uttered by the President himself just a little over 3 years ago. They are of great significance today. I agree with them. The first President of the United States practiced in principle what these words express. He went far in upholding the declaration of neutrality at a time when American public opinion was treading the heights of emotion in favor of the new French Republic. He was so careful not to excite the feelings of Americans by either word or deed that he "refrained as far as possible" from seeing refugees from France. He refrained thus even though "in many cases the maintenance of this attitude has tried his feelings severely, for the exiles were not infrequently men who had fought or sympathized with us in our day of conflict." Washington realized that a melodramatic overemphasis of emotional incidents was dangerous to the peace of America.

All of us must realize the great burden which rests upon those responsible for the acts of our Government at this time. For that reason I profoundly regret that the administration at Washington insisted that the present session of Congress consider no other legislation than the neutrality bill and asked adjournment immediately after neutrality has been acted upon.

The Congress in session is our greatest safeguard for peace. It is far more important than any automatic legislation. It brings a broader wisdom for the "small decisions." In session it keeps its hands upon the reins of government. Furthermore, it is in line with our constitutional conception that the Chief Executive is not alone in his responsibility for foreign affairs. If the Nation is in peril, as the President's proclamation of "limited emergency" indicated, our Congress is needed on the job in Washington.

Before attempting to consider the general principle of a clear and consistent foreign policy based on our strength, interest, and dignity of position in foreign affairs, let us glance in retrospect and see if we occupy a different position today than we have in the past.

There is a curiously interesting similarity between our situation now and our international affairs in Washington's time. About the only difference is our size and new methods of warfare. As usual, our visibility is very low. As usual, we are attempting to settle everything in black and white.

Then, as now, we were in hearty sympathy with France, our former ally. Then public sentiment was overwhelmingly against England, as it is now overwhelmingly against Hitlerism. Then, as now, we were stirred by the principles involved. The rights of man were stirring our blood and ringing in our ears with all the enticement of Woodrow Wilson's "making the world safe for democracy." Then, as now, the question of who should dominate Europe was mixed up with the ideologies we enthusiastically believed in. Then, as now, our emotions were tangled with our national interests.

As we look back on how many times the European countries have been lined up on one side and then another since Washington's time, we note that international politics, like domestic politics, makes strange bedfellows.

The thing that added to our difficulty at the time of Washington was the smallness and weakness of our new Nation. Now, we are too big a nation to be disregarded. By the same score, we are too large to ignore what is going on elsewhere in the world.

Now, we have more gold than all the rest of the world. We are the most industrialized nation of all, and we are capable of the greatest industrial output. We have the greatest storehouse of raw materials, with the widest diversification of any country in the world. Now, we have all of these great assets with their accompanying responsibilities. And now we are even more fortunate in our geographical location than we were in the early days of our independence. At that time, Spain and France, as well as England, were on our frontiers. The maintenance of our geographical advantage must be the cardinal principle of our foreign policy. We cannot, for instance, tolerate the penetration of any foreign power into Mexico by subversive methods.

From the standpoint of men, resources, and potential military might we are in a better position to defend ourselves against a foreign foe than we have ever been in the past. In recent years we have weakened ourselves in only one respect. That weakness is in our national fiscal policy. No one can deny that the National Budget too long has been unbalanced. And the relationship of a sound fiscal policy to military defense is obvious to all. It takes money to build armaments, train men, or carry on a long war. A sound fiscal policy is important to our morale in either peace or war. No matter on what grounds it is considered, sound financing is fundamental to our national interest as well as to our broad international policy. It is unquestionably important in war. The better shape we are in financially the more intelligent contribution we can make to peace after the war in Europe is over.

Every nation in the world today knows our potential military power. The world learned of that in 1917 and 1918. But military strength isn't the answer alone. A major determining factor in shaping our foreign policy must be the principle that the tail is not going to wag the dog.

After the amazing achievement of putting 2,000,000 soldiers on European soil, after we had won the war for our Allies, they sprung their secret treaties on us. They ignored, in these treaties, the 14 points which Woodrow Wilson had held up to the Central Powers as the basis on which the German people could surrender. Our Allies, too, had given their tacit approval to these points, since they had helped to publicize them among the German people. Therefore, in comparison with our part in winning the war, the secret treaties were like letting the tail wag the dog.

And after the armistice, a national administration that believed as the present one does, that Uncle Sam could not go broke, dished out the money and helped to rehabilitate Europe. And when it came to repayment—well, the tail wagged the dog again.

We are looking upon a situation in Europe now that might easily be similar to that of 1917 and 1919. Therefore, we cannot blindly follow our emotions and our sympathies. We still do not believe in the imperialistic policies of the British Empire. At the same time, we cannot ignore the fact that Hitler challenges everything we hold dear as the rights of a people.

Furthermore, within recent years England as well as Germany, has worked to block our policies and best interests in South America.

The intensity of our feelings will be stirred time and time again. Events both touching us and shocking our hearts and conscience will strike emotional sparks within us. It is important we talk these things out frankly, always keeping in mind American interest. Suppressed emotions are more dangerous than frank, calm, and balanced discussion. If we discuss these events and their implications with normal intelligence, we have less to fear than if we try to sit on the lid by imposing a voluntary censorship upon ourselves.

The foreign policy of the United States must not be built upon either sympathy or hate for foreign governments. Neither can it be built upon meddling in their domestic affairs which are no concern of ours.

The first definite object of our foreign policy should be to maintain our own interests with dignity and honor. Always these should be maintained in a manner that makes for peace. As a primary means of achieving this, we must, of course, maintain an adequate defense. Our self-interest must be based on just and fair claims. Then we must be prepared to enforce them. In other words, "speak softly but carry a big stick."

These policies should be made permanent and traditional with us. They should be carefully thought out, and never must we "get out on a limb," so to speak. We must be in a position that we can defend.

We ought to hold tight to the principle that we will adopt and announce no policy we are not prepared to enforce. We must do that for the sake not only of our dignity and prestige but for the sake of our future influence. We cannot expect to have other people take us at our word if we continue to show, as we have repeatedly, that we ourselves only wish they would. The history of American foreign policy is regrettably full of such instances. The open door for China, for example, captured our imagination. But what have we done about enforcing it? It was violated many times before the Manchurian incident of 1931, and many times since. We have simply written notes "for the record"—notes which no one took seriously because it was apparent that we would not enforce them. All we have done has been to make diplomatic faces, to indicate that we did not like what was going on but that we really did not intend to say or do more than that.

For the sake of our dignity and prestige we ought not to adopt any policy that we are not prepared to enforce.

The declaration of Panama is an illustration of this type of policy; so soul-satisfying, but so difficult to administer. This declaration is a proposed agreement between ourselves and the nations to the south of us. It sets up a hazy new zone on the high seas within which we would be supposed to enforce a streamlined and dramatic kind of neutrality. Its status is still uncertain, to say the least. Without more accurate information than has been given the country, it is difficult to discuss this new doctrine intelligently. But we know enough that it raises many questions full of peril to our neutral position.

The country and the Senate must demand full particulars, and through debate come to an understanding of the risky possibilities it presents.

This declaration of Panama so well illustrates the President's enthusiasm for new and dramatic things. I say to you that in our international affairs we have no law and are considering no bill which is as full of dangerous possibilities as this one. To undertake the enforcement of this declaration would be taking on the greatest job ever assumed by any nation in history. Of course, this assumes we have the ability to enforce it, which ability we do not come near to having now. It is certain that the duty of enforcement falls solely upon us and our Navy, although it does represent the desire of all the South American republics.

You ask, naturally, how large a navy this would require. No one knows. I have yet to find anyone, expert or no expert, who can answer that question with any degree of certainty.

All the pertinent questions put by reporters to the administration have been left unanswered. But the questions are such as to give warning of the complexity and the hazardous nature of what we undertook to do at Panama. These questions must be answered fully and completely before we ratify such a declaration.

However, we must, as Washington did, constantly make it clear that we value the friendship of the democracies. Actually, judging from the post-war attitude of our 1917 Allies, we probably valued their friendship more than they valued ours. Now we can still be honest and sincere in our friendship for them. But that does not mean we must fight European wars.

We departed from the traditional American policy of Washington in 1917 to fight for our friends. Let us now make the wisdom of the Father of his Country a primary part of our foreign policy. That wisdom is as fitting in the 1940's as it was in the 1780's. It will fit the vital needs of the Nation today and tomorrow.

A policy founded upon this wisdom means that we will not be extreme isolationists, nor internationalists. We will take our rightful place in the world, minding our own business, and with dignity and honor keep our own best interest foremost.

We cannot have peace automatically merely by passing a law. The road away from war depends upon the grim determination of the American people not to fight anyone else's war.

No matter how much we sympathize with England and France, we must keep an intelligent control over our own prejudices. We need an alert, watchful, public opinion. We do not wish to shirk our responsibilities in this modern world, but we do not propose to be pawns in anybody else's game.

Peace may be had if we work for it intelligently. But having it depends upon the wisdom and determination of whoever at the moment may occupy the White House, head the State Department, and interpret our foreign policy. It depends also on the vigilance of our representatives in Washington in the Congress.

As we meditate around our fires while men fight again on European fields, let us remember and let the administration remember the adage, "In for a penny, in for a pound."

We have deep and wide interests beyond our own land. The roots of our economic difficulties extend into a disorderly world. We know we cannot separate ourselves from the solution of these problems. But we can and will solve them as far as we are concerned in our own way. That way is not Europe's way, with a war every generation. Once and for all, we are through spending our blood and our money on European soil. If our cooperation is wanted in Europe it will have to be on terms other than that. We cannot too often repeat and diffuse these sentiments. These are the watchwords on which our very existence as a nation depends. Our thoughts are of peace, not of war. We know that as long as America stands civilization cannot perish.

Progress of American Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

NEWS ARTICLE

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article in the form of an Associated Press dispatch showing the progress being made by American industry. The article is headed "American Industry Is Setting Fastest Pace Since 1929."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN INDUSTRY IS SETTING FASTEST PACE SINCE 1929—WHOLESALE TRADE IS UP BILLION OVER LAST YEAR

The Federal Reserve Board announced today that American industry was rolling out products at the fastest pace since 1929 and probably would continue at as rapid a gait until the end of the year at least.

At the same time, Secretary of Commerce Hopkins said wholesale trade during the first 9 months of the year aggregated $15,000,000,000, an increase of $1,000,000,000 over the corresponding period of 1938.

Figures from the Bureau of Domestic and Foreign Commerce showed that half the wholesale gain was accounted for in July, August, and September. September sales of wholesalers were 16½ percent higher than in September 1938.

OPTIMISM TEMPERED

The Reserve Board tempered its optimism with the comment that "unless there is considerable increase in the consumption of goods, the accumulation of inventories which is now under way is likely to reach substantial proportions."

This meant that, unless people and businesses buy and use up newly produced goods faster than they now are doing, factories soon might reach the point of shutting down temporarily to get rid of all their present stocks.

However, moderate increases in retail sales and plant expansion, together with continued active residential construction, also were reported.

The Board estimated the October rate of production at 120 percent of the 1923–25 average, compared with a revised figure of 111—formerly given as 110—for September; 92 for the low 1939 months of April and May, and 96 in October 1938.

"Industrial output, employment, and pay rolls," the Board said in its monthly bulletin, "have shown further rapid advances following the buying wave and rise in prices that began with the outbreak of war.

"In many industries the volume of orders on hand appears to be large enough to sustain activity at a high level at least to the end of the year.

"In most primary markets, buying was especially active in the first half of September and has since subsided. Demand for semifinished and finished products, however, has been maintained in large volume, although recently new orders for some products have decreased from earlier high levels.

"Consumption by individuals, utilization of materials through outlays for capital goods, and commodity exports have increased much less rapidly than production.

"Buying of equipment and expenditures for improvement of plant have expanded, particularly in the metalworking and railroad industries.

"Residential building activity has been for some months at the highest level of recent years, and contracts for this type of building have continued large in recent weeks.

"Retail distribution of general merchandise has shown a rise, beginning before the outbreak of war, and sales of electrical equipment, furniture, and other durable consumers' goods are reported to have increased considerably. Department-store sales are at the level reached in 1937, and sales by mail-order houses and chain stores have risen above 1937 levels."

Steel Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON POST OF NOVEMBER 1, 1939

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article taken from the Washington Post of November 1 on the subject of steel production and employment in the steel industry.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of November 1, 1939]

STEEL'S HIGHEST OUTPUT OPENS 79,000 JOBS—530,000 AT WORK—PRODUCTION 6,000,000 TONS MORE THAN IN 1937

PITTSBURGH, October 31.—An almost unparalleled spurt in the Nation's steel production—which has boosted output to the highest tonnage rate in history—has opened up jobs for approximately 79,000 workers in the last 3 months, a survey of principal operators disclosed today.

The American Iron and Steel Institute reported 451,000 at work in the industry in July, a figure that had increased to 502,000 by the end of September. Additions in October, operators estimate, has boosted employment to approximately 530,000.

Pay rolls have advanced $12,000,000 beyond the July mark to $69,735,000.

The Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland said the 91 percent of capacity rate reached on October 21 was the best since the middle of May 1937, "but because of increased producing capacity, output at the present is at the highest rate in history, or close to 64,000,000 tons on an annual basis."

In 1929, the best year on record, the industry turned out 56,000,000 tons and employed an average of 458,000 workers, who drew $841,253,000 in wages. Production in 1937 totaled 50,568,000 tons, and the pay roll for 572,244 employees amounted to $976,000,000.

Crime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS BY DR. WILMER SOUDER

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, now that the problem of directing the path of our international policies is about determined, there may be time to turn our attention to some of our domestic problems.

It has been my privilege, on a previous occasion or two, to invite attention to the valuable and efficient operations of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in punishing offenders of the law. It might be equally well to invite attention to an address delivered on October 21, 1939, before the International Convention of the Disciples of Christ at Richmond, Va., in which are set forth some means by which the extent of crime may be reduced.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Dr. Wilmer Souder, a member of the scientific staff of the Bureau of Standards, and a member of the board of elders of the National City Christian Church of this city, on the subject Crime—the Church Must and Can Meet It. The address was delivered at the laymen's session of that convention.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CRIME—THE CHURCH MUST AND CAN MEET IT

INTRODUCTION

Mention of the church and crime in the same breath may bring to some a feeling of resentment. If, however, it can be shown that crime touches the church and that the church can make a definite contribution toward the eradication of crime, no apologies are necessary. The following text is broad enough for our remarks: "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." Fifteen years of experience in crime detection, as an official of the United States Government, furnishes no occasion to protest this text.

TYPES OF CRIME

It will aid us if we catalog a few of the crimes now afflicting our Nation. Gambling is undoubtedly our most nearly universal crime. Churches have been known to wink at the practice, in the bingo party, and other games of chance employed to raise money. The stupidity of the individual who permits his superiority complex to cause him to feel that he can consistently win in games of chance over others similarly complexed is difficult to explain. The man who pushes his money into a machine designed, constructed, adjusted, and tested to keep more than it returns is dumb in one corner of his brain, regardless of all intelligence ratings.

A shrewder type of crime is embodied in the keen investing organizations and holding companies. With the assistance of a good attorney and careful manipulations it is possible to take large amounts of cash from simple folks who can be persuaded to believe that the promoters wish to make a fortune for the investors.

A third type of crime finds expression in what we popularly designate as rackets. The set-up consists of an organization prepared to give "protection." Perhaps you will not admit ever having contributed cash to any form of racket. Consider one type of protection before being too positive. The fish merchant may find it more economical to pay one cent a pound for every pound of fish sold to him wholesale, than to find a load soaked with gasoline when delivered. The soaking is easily done when the truck is delayed in traffic. The driver will not put up much resistance after taking a look at the husky stranger who climbs on the truck with a small can of gasoline. The head of the racket organization must deliver effective "service" in his territory. This must be done speedily and quietly. Murders may be necessary but they must not be traceable to the organization. The St. Valentine Day's murder in Chicago, in which seven members of a rival gang were lined up against a garage wall and mowed down by machine guns is typical of such expressions of force.

The confidence man pays an individual no compliment when he approaches with schemes to secure the valuable property of another at a price much below its worth, with a plan to secure money or property from an elderly or sick person through feigned friendships, with a magic box to turn out "genuine" money in $10 and $20 bills at the will of the operator, or with a sure plan to win from a "yokel" in a card game. Inspector MacDonald, of Berkeley, an expert in breaking up such rackets, advises that the confidence man must locate a man with larceny in his heart before he can trap him and trim him. When the confidence man approaches and starts explaining his plan for making easy money, just remember he feels sure your ideals in dealing with your fellow man are no higher than his own and, furthermore, that he expects to trim you.

The political leader who promises to guard the welfare of his constituents and then betrays them by accepting graft money in awarding contracts or in misappropriating moneys is a traitor and criminal of no less degree than the racketeer or the thief who manages the soulless holding company or finance corporation.

The annual cost of our crime is variously estimated from ten to twenty billion dollars. If you are an average American citizen and have a family of two children, you are paying approximately $400 annually to crime.

Foremost among the themes which lead to crime should be placed cash, power, and privilege. At all periods of American history there have been exploitations and alluring promises of exceptional bargains. We started with a mysterious fountain of youth. Then came the deposits of (fool's) gold in Virginia, opportunities to dig fortunes in California gold fields, opportunities to retire after investing all savings in watered stock or foreign bonds.

THEORIES OF CRIME

Time does not permit a discussion of all of the theories of crime. To say that the devil is responsible for crime is to refuse to meet the situation. Corresponding reasoning would give God credit for our virtues. This would leave us as mere tools in the hands of superiors. While we might be willing to charge all of our weaknesses to the devil, we usually want to be given full credit for our few good deeds and sacrifices. My version of the creation of man translates as follows: "God breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life and gave man the opportunity of developing a living soul." The soul is the supreme component of the individual. Jesus confirms this translation when he asks: "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

To the man who refuses to give serious thought to facts and attempts to escape responsibilities by saying he was born into the world without his consent or that the world owes him a living and he will decide as to what efforts he will put forth we have a ready answer. If left alone, he is sure to drift into crime, for he will demand food and shelter. These are not always available in our country for the asking. The man is, indeed, in a strange country. He is, however, less than 6,000 miles from his home. The Tropics supply food without effort. The climate is uniform. Clothing is not necessary. Transportation to this land, ideally suited to the needs of the specimen, can be supplied by those of a more purposeful and more generous school of thought. Soon the unfortunate can be placed where he may let nature support him. We need not discuss educational, social, mutual, hygienic, medical, or governmental protections, for these blessings have come of people with different ideals. Our specimen is not interested in such ideals.

A more subtle theory of crime has developed from the followers of Lombroso, an Italian of the last half of the nineteenth century. His followers teach that our criminals are the results of biologically inherited tendencies. They inherit typical features, such as thick hair, large protruding ears, receding foreheads, massive jaws, unsymmetrical heads, etc., which are accepted as the outward manifestations of criminal tendencies. The acceptance of this theory denies the existence of the free will of the individual, denies our right to punish, and leaves us victims of a God who sends condemned children into a severe world. The whole idea puts these unfortunates in much the same position as that of our animals. Those of you who live in rural communities know that, free will or no free will, remarkable cooperative traits can be developed in the meanest animals. The wildest horses have been made safe for the owner and safe for themselves through the applications of definite restraints and positive orientations.

There is much to be said for the theme that we invite, encourage, and perhaps enjoy our crime. We as a nation apparently insist upon the fullest personal liberty for every individual. Restraints are said to destroy initiative and prevent development. It is claimed that society will develop more safely and sanely if there are fewer restraints.

One of our popular southern cities discharged its chief of police a few years ago because of his crusading tendencies. The city felt sure prosperity would blossom if a wide-open policy were adopted. Horse racing, gambling, dog racing, roulette, and other types of "entertainment" were spread over the day and night. Disorders broke out, culminating in a $100,000 hotel robbery. There were others besides the city officials who enjoyed personal liberty. The underworld organizations came and collected and appreciated the opportunity.

Such experiences show the effects of losses in moral reserves and show our tendency to discredit temporarily the idea of any value to physical, mental, moral, or spiritual reserve. Reserve is today in many respects an obsolescent item. It must be revived. We pay large forfeits for our carelessness. An example of our crowding to the limit comes from a New England city where, during a sleet, 14 autos came over a hill and crashed into an obstruction a short distance beyond the crest of the hill. Not one of the 14 drivers could see the necessity for suffering the inconvenience of slowing down and driving with a reserve space between himself and the man in front.

The disruption of our family unit by our modern civilization is bringing untold misery. We see distracted fathers and mothers plead before officials of the law insisting that their children could not possibly have committed the crimes for which they are being held. Ministers are implored to give assistance in an attempt to break the hold of the law. Investigations show that these parents took little interest in the associates of their children, made no efforts to find where or how they spent their leisure minutes.

The typical development of juvenile crime begins with small offenses, such as picking pennies off papers at a newsstand, taking food from stores or materials from construction sites. Next comes trips across town on the rear of trucks to pick up bicycles which are later sold through the assistance of dealers who ask no questions. If not caught, they continue to such crimes as burglarizing houses and hold-ups. Three boys, properly deployed, can be surprisingly effective in going through a house while the owners are out. They will be caught, but the months or years of growing petty crimes and a few quick, easy dollars develop a habit. It is extremely difficult to reorient these children to the theme of earned rewards for honest labors.

A popular scapegoat for our present-day crime is to attribute it to the influences of science. Unemployment is charged to science and our machine age. An analysis of one industry will show the fallacy of this position. Prior to the advent of the automobile there were about 1,000,000 wagon and smith workers who took care of our transportation equipment. Ten million employees are necessary to care for our demands on the motorcars. The same analysis will blast the charges against science in other fields. The developed methods of science have indeed put a few individuals on the shelf of unemployment. The perfection, power, and definite responses of scientific equipment demand clear thinking and honest acceptance of full responsibility for results. The employee who was so successful in explaining all accidents as the fault of associates is certain to get a surprise when he attempts to blame the precision machine. The machine will not accept the blame. Some of our careless operators have discovered these facts too late.

THE GARDEN OF EDEN STORY

The Garden of Eden story of the first crime is too accurate to be discarded as an amusing story. In that report we see an owner and superintendent with rights, an assistant who, by honest labor, may earn much of food, enjoyment, and safety. As the assistant contemplated the idea of rights he developed a complex. Without properly balancing the rights of a creator and owner, entitled to privileges greater than that of an assistant, he decided to act upon the theory that all things within his reach belonged as much to him as to anyone else. That becoming as gods was only a question of the possession of material items regardless of the ennobling training and development incident to earning them. This assistant later discovered those consequences which follow the taking of unearned rewards and in violating fundamental laws. The verdict and punishment were severe and direct. They are the same whether you read them in the book of Genesis or in the experiences of modern humanity.

Other causes of crime could be reviewed but we must close with the experiences of the sexual sophisticates who think they can catalog all human misfits as victims of sex influences. To them there are no mysterious physical or spiritual developments between virtuous members of opposite sexes. They grab, they handle, they live entirely in the physical animal realm. Things spiritual scarcely exist to these realists. The idea of God knitting two souls into one or in any way whatever blessing a union of two lives is beyond their credulity.

Frequently there comes a realization that life is not all physical. With the increasing advent of mental and nervous ills into an apparently healthy physical body we find it necessary to expand our thinking. By the use of officers, armies, and munitions we hold back our crime. With medicines, vaccines, and surgical instruments we have little fear of many of those plagues of the physical body which were so destructive in former centuries. The barbitals may relieve our physical pains but they are not specifics for mental afflictions. "Evil spirits" trouble millions today. The present age is making this sad discovery.

FROM WHENCE COMETH OUR HELP?

With what shall we combat these mental ills which result from magnified material ideals and neglected starving souls? How long shall we be able to continue our battle of physical force against general crime at an annual cost of $100 for each individual man, woman, and child? There are some observers who predict a crash at an early date.

Those who observe the actions of some of our political organizations and compare achievements with promises see too many exceptions and special favors to hope for much aid from political officeholders. Naturally officers elected by a political party, if they expect to continue in power, give some thought to the welfare of the party. Political campaigns cost money. Will an official disregard the power that elevated him to the office? Will delegates nominate a candidate from whom they have no commitments?

A study of newspaper and radio advertising reveals that one of their functions is to loosen up purses and to sell items, many of which develop destructive habits. The spender is made the center of attraction. Not much assistance will be expected from these agencies if only we remember they are commercial adventures and are not likely to bite the hand that feeds them.

We are entitled to our doubts regarding effectual aid from the movies as we see them today parading the assumed virtues of the cocktail and the good fellowship tied up with the abundant servings of liquor and unrestrained liberties. No ill effects are pictured. In fact, our children are led to believe that liquor and comedy are synonymous and that liberty is the key to all happiness.

Our universities are one of our best agencies in the fight against crime. Many schools are giving courses on the origins of crime, on the developments of rackets, and delineating their effects on society. They realize the seriousness of the situation and the stalemate which exists between the efforts of the law and the escape of so many criminals.

THE CHURCH CAN MEET THE PROBLEM

The title of this paper declares the church must and can meet the crime situation. Shall we advocate delegating legal authority to the church? It would be a mistake to permit the church to attempt to handle legal matters. Jesus refused to enter the controversy over dividing an estate, although He was asked to do so. He was not interested in prosecuting the woman taken in adultery, though the law was clear on the situation. He lost his life by reason of a legal official accepting a church verdict rather than giving the protection to which the subject of the Roman Empire was entitled. The church's records in temporal sovereignty in the Middle Ages and more recently in Spain and in Russia are not strong arguments for its ability to cope with temporal affairs.

An analysis of the methods of our legal machinery, when it functions, shows that it deals largely in one realm only. Our laws say pay $5,000 damages and go free, go to prison 5 years and all will be forgiven, separate from that woman and forget the past or go to the chair and give up a life. The church can never speak this language. Such measures are, however, effective, and until we recruit the first lines of defense the Nation must depend upon them. The criminal is punished in terms of things which rate high in his evaluations. Obviously such punishments may not redeem him or reach deep enough to remedy the cause of the crime. After spending 5 years in prison he may repeat the crime, feeling certain he will not be caught again. Tacitus, the Roman historian, saw the futility of dependence upon laws when he wrote, almost 2,000 years ago, "Corruption abounds in the state and the state abounds in laws."

Most certainly the church will not be regarded as an intruder if it attempts to make a more specific contribution in solving the crime problem. In fact, its opportunity to function in this field is almost universally recognized. The law extends an unusual privilege and responsibility to pastors to whom erring members make their confessions and ask for guidance. It will not compel the pastor to reveal the confession. Courts recognize the sacredness of the situation and the powerful redemptive influences at the disposal of the pastor. Pastors and churches must not fail to meet this responsibility.

WILL GOD AID?

A carefully studied interpretation of the Old Testament seems to indicate that God did aid His children in overcoming their enemies and in supplying many of their needs. May we expect Him to aid us in suppressing crime? There seems to be an abundance of evidence that God gives us aid today, but not in doing those material things we can and should do for ourselves. This change in God's methods, if there has been a change, should strengthen rather than weaken our faith. Let me illustrate. At some time in the past (whether it be 6,000 or 6,000,000,000 years matters not) man was less skilled, less able to protect himself, less able to provide for his needs, and less able to command the services of natural agencies. Some power guided his development. Some power protected him. Some power placed in his body instincts of preservation, toleration, and service. Some power elevated him. We are not able to relive the past and witness the growth of these miracles. We may, however, witness a similar miracle in the lives of some of our present-day animals. The bird which has never observed the building of a nest—in fact, it may never have seen a nest—will next season at a definite time construct a nest. This nest will be so specialized and so accurately constructed that the ornithologist will accurately name the bird which built the nest.

Try as I may, I cannot explain where and how the nest design is stored with the bird. Why not accept the easiest explanation and see where it leads? Assume that the Master of Life gives personal assistance to the bird and that He has more than a passing interest in the creatures of His creation. It does not destroy one's personality or make him ashamed to attribute such acts to a benevolent Guardian of all creation. Yes; God aided us yesterday, He aids us today, and He will aid us tomorrow.

GOD'S CREATION DOES NOT MOCK HIM

It is not uncommon for the popular leaders of our own generation to fail to grasp this theme. Barnes, in his Society in Transition, ties himself up unnecessarily on several occasions, and hopelessly so, when he rates our behavior as the result of strict causation as invariable as the law of gravitation, and later, on the same page, says: "If one wishes to lessen the volume of crime, he must endeavor to eliminate those social habits * * *," etc. How, under causation as invariable as the law of gravitation, can one "wish" or "endeavor"? Wells, in his recent book, The Fate of Homo Sapiens, is reported to have pictured the universe as bored with man and to have predicted that the race will eventually end in the disease-soaked ruins of a slum.

It is unfortunate indeed that minds get into such cul-de-sacs. Surely the unfoldings and developments of the race and the advances of science during the years of recorded history have charmed, if not inspired, these minds. Can it be that they are victims of their own physical, animal developments? As their bodies have developed they have doubtless admitted developments in other fields; but now as the physical and mental infirmities of age begin to demand recognition these minds are helpless. They naturally anticipate similar reactions for the entire creation. Leaders frequently betray their mental ages and corresponding fears by constantly referring to impending crises in their specialized fields. The church must substitute confidence of eventual victory where these frightened prophets proclaim disaster. The poet's picture of a mysterious journey and safe arrival, "soothed and sustained by an unfaltering trust," is too bright for their limited or distorted visions. Apparently they cannot conceive of a continuing advancement of humanity or a major power for good maintaining control for ages after they have departed. Such minds and predictions have appeared in all ages of the past. They are in no sense unique to our generation.

If we should admit that the race can be maintained in the status quo for several years to come by armies, prisons, and fears, we cannot picture an all-powerful and all-wise Architect interested for centuries in seeing only repetitions on the part of His creations. The set-up demands advancement. It has shown advancement during past centuries. Jesus gave us a glorious thought when He said, "My Father worketh and I work." He did not say my Father watches for His own entertainment. Let us make it possible for God to aid us in combating the crimes which threaten to hide the advancements gained through centuries of toil.

LET THE CHURCH COMPLETE THE STORY

The church has the solution to the problems of crime. Its hands are clean. It can meet the situation effectively, and with divine aid it can develop that living soul in man which will not support crime. The soul responds and develops as it meets and comprehends the true themes of lives and associates these with the corresponding rewards. If the church can accurately portray the themes and experiences of criminals, it can reduce the present-day tendencies and cause more and more victims of misguided leadership to abandon those temporarily attractive roads which lead eventually to disappointment, miseries, and despair. Criminals stripped of their weapons, associates, and newspaper publicity will be recognized as yellow cowards rather than as heroes. Few young people will care to imitate them when they discover the truth about their lives.

When the movie shows the apparent enhancements of social position or centers of attraction and amusement associated with cocktail etiquette, drunkards' antics, sex liberties, or other vices, let the church continue the story. Part of it can be found at the homes where the headaches are slept off, where the debts tend to pass the income. More of it may be found in the courtroom or in the morgue as the now sober and penitent (if alive) hero of the party tells his story. Some of the story can be found on the hospital or asylum charts. Another chapter can be found in the bank accounts of the saloon keeper and parlor hostess and in the spending accounts and the luxuries enjoyed by the owners and promoters of the crime industries. Compare these with the net balances of the drinker, the dope fiend, and the gambler. Lionel Barrymore, as Dr. Gillespie, preached a sermon in a few words when he advised his patient he might now use either whisky or beer to his heart's content. The patient, surprised, reminded the physician that a few years earlier he had advised him differently. Dr. Gillespie admitted the truth of the statement but reminded the patient he had not taken the advice then and that now it was too late. His prompt dismissal of the doomed man with a harsh "Call the next patient" was an effective and proper disposal of the case. Men will choose safety and make right decisions when they are convinced of the accuracy of the picture of their future.

This situation raises the perennial question of the advisability of persistent begging and insistance that the victim abandon his criminal habits. With a sufficient amount of begging and pleading, most men will promise to reform. Too frequently they do not reform. Further pleadings may cause them to again promise to reform. In fact, it may be much easier to promise than to be pestered with the pleadings. There is little to be said for attempting to force the rescue of individuals who have no interest in being rescued. Jesus did not commission a group of his disciples to restore Judas at any cost. He dignified the value of our free will and of a man's own soul by saying in effect, "Judas, make up your mind and act accordingly." Unless we can in some manner develop a genuine desire to be rescued we may find it more effective to devote our efforts to those who truly wish to reform. Judas went down in shame and served as exhibit No. 1 among his associates.

WHATSOEVER A MAN SOWETH

Many church members are, by virtue of their simple trusting natures and uniform honesty, easy victims for high-pressure exploitations. A bit of flattery, the personal touch, and an enthusiastic appeal and the victim is caught. The young man or woman enjoys the companionship of the evening and may match the indulgences of the crowd, little dreaming of the price to be paid. Road signs are dignified messengers though they may proclaim only a "blind alley." The egotist makes his ventures, takes his risks, and feels safe. He is sure he will never be exposed. He decides to drop one vice for another and is surprised to find himself a victim of blackmail. Any minister or teacher can illustrate these statements with examples from current experiences of people, as relayed to him by his associates in other communities. Experiences in the locality should be transmitted to other localities. Let me illustrate by cases from my own records. A young man was purchasing a home on the installment plan. He was employed and was happy with his wife and small daughter. For some reason he started betting. He took chances on all sorts of gambling devices. He found himself unable to meet the payments on his house. He borrowed from the manager of the gambling house. He continued to gamble, part of it on credit, and lost. The manager demanded payment on the loans. The victim gave a check on a bank in which naturally no funds were deposited to his account. The mortgage was being foreclosed. One day the manager of the store received a printed note asking him to prepare a package containing $1,000 and wait for further instructions at the peril of being bombed or of having his child kidnapped. Next day a phone call advised the manager to give the money to a boy who would come to the store. Later the young man was caught, identified, convicted, and sent to prison. Many people felt it would have been more satisfactory if the manager of the store had also been sent to prison. But it was not so arranged by the lawmakers who license gambling.

The second case concerns a young office clerk who, in the performance of his duties met the charming daughter of a wealthy member of the top social register. He decided to put forth every effort to win the girl for his wife. Her tastes called for costly dinners, elaborate parties, trips, gifts, and all those expensive expressions of affection. His $35-a-week salary and $200 savings account were not sufficient to complete the courtship. Rather than tell the truth and probably lose the girl he forged checks on the firm's accounts. He had married the girl before he was caught and sent to prison. He discovered to his sorrow and to the humiliation of the girl, that although all things may be fair in love, our laws are not so generous.

So many similar wrecks of careers are paraded before us daily that one feels like shouting to the church and its organizations to wake up and make a definite attempt to prevent some of these wrecks. It is the duty of the Sunday school and the church to educate its members and to show them the natural and logical results of such ventures. The criminals study their intended victims and pool their ideas and plans for attack. Shall we stand by and hope the Lord will educate and protect the innocent against the snares of keen criminal wits? Secure texts from the library and inform your people on the fruits of crime.

VICTORY BY MENTAL FORTIFICATION

Recent methods for criminal reform include repetitions of the details of crime, explaining consequences, placing strong emphasis upon making right choices, and showing how it is possible to achieve victory. The victim interested in reforming himself is drilled through the mental cycle many times. The proper choice becomes a part of his nature and later, when the real temptation arises, the correct method of escape also arises with it. The man seriously interested in returning to society will make the proper response just as the well-drilled soldier makes automatically the correct movement though in the confusion of battle.

The church can with dignity and with spiritual and financial profit aid its weaker members who are prone to do as they are told to do, its trusting members who accept all men as truthful, its young people who are great imitators, and its visitors who seek evidences of worth in modern religion by inoculating them against crime. Why wait until the wife and children are in rags and starving or the murder has been committed before offering advice? Look up your concordance on "beware." Jesus and his disciples knew the significance of the word and made definite applications in their uses of the word. It is time to use it again in an occasional sermon or in a Sunday-school lesson. Our International Sunday School Committee might well expand the temperance lesson to a more modern subject such as Lawlessness, Crime, Fruits of Crime, or Enemies of Body and Soul. Alcohol is not the only enemy of the church. If those writers who give us such excellent expositions of the lesson would spend a few days in court and familiarize themselves with the events which developed into the entanglements with the law, they would find it difficult to limit their lesson comments on crime to the space available.

TANGIBLE EVIDENCES

Occasionally one discovers some fact that surprises him by its plainness and simplicity. One such discovery came to me several years ago, and proved to my satisfaction that few witnesses can speak with the force and convincing manner of the consecrated church member. The wise attorney does not press them on cross-examination. My first opportunity to hear such testimony came in a midwestern city where a 70-year-old Kentucky mountain mother was called to testify in the trial of a prison guard. This guard had written the mother that her son was dangerously ill in prison and that morphine was necessary to save his life. She was deceived. She purchased two ounces of morphine and shipped it as a box of cigars in accordance with the instructions from the guard.

The Government discovered the facts in the case and arrested the guard. Naturally the mother was subpenaed to appear as a witness at the trial. Finding her son in excellent health was a pleasant surprise to her. He had never been ill. There were conjectures as to whether she would complete the case for the Government by admitting her part in purchasing and shipping the opium as in so doing she would incriminate herself. Careful questioning by the prosecution brought out the facts without complete incrimination. The defense attorney felt that he could cause her to weaken her testimony by reminding her that an admission of any part in purchasing or shipping the narcotic would make her liable to imprisonment. She had been deceived, she had committed a crime. The situation was tense. Everyone was anxious to see how this saintly lady who, as reports had informed us, "was religious," would maneuver while in the shadow of a prison sentence. Would she deny her guilt or would she follow the teachings of her religion and make a full confession and trust the law to give her that forgiveness and pardon which her religion would give? We were given the answer promptly. In less than 5 minutes she rehearsed every detail of the case, from the receipt of the letter telling of her son's illness (the son had not been ill) to the shipping of the narcotic disguised as a box of cigars. Attempts by the defense to stop her were of no avail. Her story was responsive, competent, relevant, and material to the case. There was now no doubt of a technical incrimination of herself but that did not bother her. Her face disclosed ease, confidence, and integrity. She left the stand with the step of a victor. No one had any question as to the truth of her statements. The guard was convicted and sent to prison. She was given a short sentence and the sentence was instantly suspended. There are millions of this type of people in America of whom we can truly say, "They are religious." We need millions more. As the church builds such lives it builds our first line of defense. It is upon the inherent honesty and unquestioning faith of such individual lives that the security of our future rests.

A review of years of the history of mankind shows that God has released to this generation more secrets and blessings to save us from physical and mental diseases and sufferings than were ever released to any people in any previous age. The message of assurance, if repeated today, might say, "I have reserved to myself more than 7,000 souls who have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal." He is ready and willing to have His earth support us in more ease, luxury, and safety than ever before if only man in proper reverence will accept the blessings. He alone offers the cure for many mental ills. Let the church inventory its sources of power and proudly proclaim its strength. The gates of hell shall not prevail!

We have traced many of our present curses to a lack of understanding of that universal freedom given to man. God wished man to be free and daily offers evidences that true freedom can be made to work to man's welfare rather than to his destruction. All benefactions can be traced to God's interest in His creation. There are thousands of proofs of the upward pull of His power. He can and will save us from crime when we put forth our own efforts and do our part. God is not the author of failures in the mineral, vegetable, animal, or planetary kingdoms. Why should we anticipate failure on man—His most glorious creation?

We are daily surrounded and encouraged by clouds of witnesses in the realms of physical science, nutrition, life, and those supreme realms of mental and spiritual influences which echo our text: "Make no mistake—a man will reap just what he sows; he who sows for his flesh will reap destruction from the flesh; and he who sows for the spirit will reap life eternal from the spirit."

Cost of Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

STATEMENT BY HON. RUSH D. HOLT, OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by me to the citizens of West Virginia on the subject of the cost of government.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF RUSH D. HOLT TO CITIZENS OF WEST VIRGINIA

The cost of government is going up.

While the cost is mounting, the records show that the amount given to the aged is going down.

Too many have been looking across the ocean to the war in Europe and forgetting the United States. Too many have been thinking about the terrible conditions in Europe and forgetting the terrible conditions here. It is time to look after America by looking after the American people.

The West Virginia old-age pension in September 1937 amounted to $14.63 average per month. In September 1939 this had declined to $12.48 average.

Two dollars and fifteen cents may not seem much but it means a lot to those who get but twelve to fourteen dollars a month. If we cut expenses, let's start some place else than on the aged.

The average per family for dependent children in West Virginia for September 1937 amounted to $22.16 per month. This declined to $19.47 in September 1939. Think of reducing the amount to care for dependent children by $2.69 a month while the taxpayers' money is wasted by the millions.

The blind in West Virginia had their monthly average reduced. In September 1937 they received $17.94 average. This was cut to $15.90 by September 1939, a reduction of $2.04 a month.

There are plenty of places to economize before reducing the allotments for the old, for the blind, and for the dependent children.

The Challenge to Civilization—Cost of Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. LEWIS W. DOUGLAS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an able address delivered by Hon. Lewis W. Douglas, former Budget Director and Member of the House of Representatives, before the New York Herald Tribune Forum on Wednesday, October 25, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mme. Chairman, may I express my appreciation of your invitation to speak on this platform under the general title, the Challenge to Civilization, and under the more specific lead, Cost of Government.

Challenge to civilization means, I presume, challenge to the variety or social, political, and economic structure which has marked the development of human culture in western Europe and the Americas during the nineteenth century and the early part of the twentieth, a structure deriving its strength and vitality from the conviction that the emancipation of mankind can be had by creating an environment in which the individual is free to develop and, indeed, enjoys the opportunity to develop his qualities of mind and heart according to his talents, a structure resting on the view that the individual is endowed with dignity and nobility and possesses a capacity for reasonable action and self-restraint, a structure preserving for the individual in all its fullness the fundamental and treasured right to dissent.

It seems necessary to make this presumption because civilization is never destroyed; civilization changes.

In a period when we are all preoccupied with events across the seas and speculating on the consequences of those events on our own destiny, it is well to remember—the forum compels us to do so—that what we do here at home may have as profound an effect on our future as what others do abroad.

In speaking of the cost of government may I first make the observation that it cannot be completely understood when examined as an isolated phenomenon separated from its social setting, from economic strains and stresses, from its monetary and international environment, and from a cavalcade of subjects which go to make up the whole of a certain type of public policy. And, second, that high cost of government cannot be viewed as something which is wholly indigenous, as it were, to our own country. In fact, it is a phenomenon which is observable in varying forms in every major country of the world.

The phrase "cost of government" requires definition. By it I do not mean whether budgets are in balance or out of balance. I do not mean whether the level of public expenditures can with reasonable expectancy be equaled over considerable periods of time by the level of public income derived from reasonable taxes levied on the national income. I do mean that level of public expenditures which can only be equaled, if it can be equaled at all, by public income when industrial, commercial, and agricultural activity has risen to an unnaturally high stage and when the tax structure imposes excessive exactions on the national income. I do mean a cost of government so high that only the peak of an economic boom, combined with a very onerous tax structure, can produce sufficient revenue, if it can be produced at all, to bring expenditures into equilibrium with income The cost of government—spending—so defined becomes a legitimate, if not a necessary subject for debate.

So defined it is, indeed, a challenge to civilization. For those who attach no significance to the lessons of experience, this may appear to be an exaggerated statement. But for those who would attempt to learn from history without at the same time imposing the dead hand of the past on the future, this observation cannot be lightly brushed aside. Too often in recent history liberal governments have been wrecked on the rocks of loose fiscal policy. A survey of the last quarter of a century confirms this conclusion. Public spending, undertaken for reasons however legitimate and humanitarian, has invariably had consequences uncalculated and unforeseen at the time spending was commenced, consequences which, among other things have expressed themselves in a complete remolding of the structure of national and even international life. Spending initiated as a measure for the protection of liberalism and human rights has almost always become ultimately one of the most powerful and ruthless forces of reaction.

In a major part of the world, more particularly, perhaps, here at home, there have been advanced during the course of the last 7 years four principal justifications for spending.

In 1931 and 1932, when the full impact of falling prices and deflation was undermining the private credit structure of the country, it was urged that the public credit be used for the purpose of preventing a complete debacle.

In 1933, when the full impact of the intensity of the deflation manifested itself in the form of unemployment on a terrifying scale and when local resources were no longer adequate to carry the burden, it was urged that the public credit be used for relief purposes—to prevent the complete impoverishment and even starvation of those who, seeking employment, anxious to work, were unable to find it.

Later, when recovery lagged behind the calculated speed of its upward trend, it was urged that public spending—the use of the public credit—would prime the pump—would, in fact, be an instrument of recovery.

And still later, in the more immediate past, when pump priming produced so delicate an economic readjustment that a relatively small reduction in expenditures contributed to causing a devastatingly sharp recession, it was urged that opportunity for the investment of private funds had permanently disappeared and that, therefore, the Public Treasury must become the spender.

These four justifications can be classified into two major groups, differing from each other in one profoundly significant respect. The first two—that is to say, the use of the public credit to prevent a collapse of the institutions of private credit and to provide relief—presuppose that public spending is bad, but that it is the lesser of two evils. The second major group—that is to say, public spending as an instrument of recovery and public spending as a substitute for private investment—rests on the premise that spending in and of itself is good. Thus the rationale of spending has progressed from one end of the spectrum of public finance to the other—from something which was bad but nevertheless better than its alternative to something which is inherently of unqualified advantage and permanent benefit to the Nation.

This perspective of the progressive shifting of the justification for spending reveals the extent to which we have in the short span of 7 years moved away from the traditional convictions of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. We must understand the implications of this startling shift if we are to understand the issue it presents.

With the view that public expenditures, however bad, are sometimes necessary, whether to provide for the national security or to relieve human physical distress, no one can seriously take issue. Many may question the extent to which the public credit has been, or is being, used for relief. Many may disagree with the administration of public expenditures for this purpose. Many may believe that the division of financial responsibility between Federal, State, county, municipal, and local agencies should be readjusted. Many may think that money previously expended on other purposes should have been diverted to the more pressing needs of relief. But no one who has witnessed the discouragement, the futility, even the terror in the faces of those who confront starvation can legitimately for a moment question the objective.

With the two justifications for the use of public credit which presuppose public spending to be unqualifiedly beneficial, many, myself among them, disagree on wholly objective and impartial grounds.

The theoretical argument advanced in favor of priming the pump is that by expending public expenditures during a depression purchasing power will be augmented, private spending will be increased, a spiral of recovery commenced, Government expenditures reduced, the Budget balanced, and public debt liquidated. Implicit in this theory, for which experience provides no support, is the abstraction that a government, having claimed the credit for fostering a recovery, will accept the blame for inducing a depression that may follow a reduction of expenditures commenced at the wrong time or in the wrong amount. Implicit in this theory is the unalterable fact that some agency of public authority must make two highly technical and exceedingly delicate decisions—first, when in the business cycle shall public expenditures be reduced; and second, by how much. Can the Congress of the United States or any parliamentary body make this sort of a judgment, requiring, as it does, an impartial nonpolitical and professional review and evaluation of a complicated array of statistics and estimates of quantitative and qualitative business activity? And if a parliament cannot make these two difficult decisions, must not the responsible representatives of the people lose their control over the public purse strings by committing the task to an irresponsible body?

Perhaps these questions are unanswerable. Perhaps government, or public authority, will be unwilling to run the risk of inducing a depression by retrenchment. In this event the policy of spending must be continued by administering ever-increasing doses of public funds in an effort to maintain a rising or even a stationary level of economic activity.

As the more recent experiences in Europe, indeed as all experiences reveal, this volume of public spending ultimately produces economic disintegration manifested by the threat, if not the fact, of widespread public distress. Attempts to minimize these consequences require the use of totalitarian measures and totalitarian techniques—measures and techniques designed to control, to regulate the prices at which goods and services may be sold, the quantities in which they may be produced, with what they may be exchanged in the market places of the world; these techniques at last become necessary to direct the investment of capital and even to expropriate pools of private savings. The decision for us to make is whether this totalitarian system is compatible with responsible representative, constitutional government. History provides us with a categorical answer in the negative.

Many will probably dismiss these observations and questions as being indicative of exaggerated fears—ghosts under the bed. But the least that can be said for them is that they present a serious enough picture to require convincing and impartial answers.

Finally, the last justification for spending, that is, that our frontier has disappeared, our economy has matured, that there is no opportunity for private investment and that, therefore, public authority must become the spender, should be reviewed, too, in terms of its implications.

The frontier in the United States officially disappeared in 1890. Why, then, 40 years later, should its disappearance be the cause of a sudden, amazingly, abrupt, and profound change in our national economy? Does the geographic frontier offer the only incentive for private investment? Are there not other frontiers which would invite private investment on a large scale if some of the present uncertainties were eradicated? It is indeed a simple matter to make the assumption that there is no opportunity for private investment and then by a series of public acts to create an environment in which it does not and, in fact, cannot occur. If there is no place for private investment, then on what basis is public investment made? If for purposes which are not sufficiently productive to reproduce their capital costs, then is not such public spending essentially a process by which our store of capital and our national wealth become slowly depleted? Fundamentally, does not this theory presuppose a declining national capacity to work and to produce goods and services? Does not an increasing volume of public investment continuously made in projects, which, over a given period of years, reproduce their capital cost, presuppose ultimately Government operation and ownership of the means of production in a very large part of the area of our economic life? And if it does, what sort of a government, vested with what sort of powers, exercising them through what sort of agencies, and under what sort of restraints, is its counterpart?

Experience provides the answers to these questions. Logic may give us the same or different ones. It is for us to insist that these answers reveal the full implication of a policy of public spending and disclose its ultimate effects on the set of values which has come down to us from the early days of the Republic.

Neutrality and the National Defense

REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit certain tables to supplement those submitted with my speech on neutrality and national defense on November 1, which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at pages 1263 to 1268.

Naval aircraft expenditures (exclusive of ordnance for aircraft)

1920	$4,616,000
1921	4,531,000
1922	5,380,000
1923	6,167,000
1924	5,853,000
1925	4,923,000
1926	8,235,000
1927	12,340,000

Naval aircraft expenditures (exclusive of ordnance for aircraft)—Continued

1928	$8,554,000
1929	18,480,000
1930	14,245,000
1931	12,199,000
1932	8,715,000
1933	7,208,000
1934	12,273,000
1935	20,691,000
1936	26,561,000
1937	20,963,000
1938	27,265,000
1939	24,238,000
Total	253,437,000

Estimated expenditures

1940	$75,494,000
1941	68,148,000
1942	71,545,000
1943	70,819,000
1944	65,248,000
Total	351,254,000

Navy Department, Office of Chief of Naval Operations.

Expenditures of the Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department, for munitions (including armor, guns, mounts, ammunition, and explosives) during the years 1925–39, inclusive

1925	$7,463,316
1926	7,049,199
1927	9,589,387
1928	12,818,683
1929	16,859,709
1930	17,635,214
1931	15,941,615
1932	13,762,340
1933	13,120,299
1934	22,105,699
1935	42,336,135
1936	60,113,936
1937	56,215,705
1938	59,756,154
1939	73,026,169

On the basis of the existing Navy, including provisions for the 10-year building program now in progress (which should, it is believed, enter into an estimate of this nature), the following estimate is furnished of the annual needs of the Navy for munitions, including armor, for fiscal years 1941–45, inclusive:

Estimate

1941	$120,000,000
1942	135,000,000
1943	135,000,000
1944	130,000,000
1945	125,000,000

Navy Department, Office of Chief of Naval Operations.

United States exports of crude sulphur to selected foreign countries, 1929–38

[Long tons]

Year	France	Germany	United Kingdom	Canada	Japan	China	Total
1929	136,732	169,474	43,856	200,012	----------	270	855,183
1930	56,190	120,569	28,683	166,943	----------	150	593,312
1931	73,457	82,218	23,635	111,958	----------	195	407,586
1932	60,591	31,275	18,129	95,800	----------	1,005	352,610
1933	84,093	69,139	47,149	122,954	----------	----------	522,515
1934	71,829	38,819	63,734	145,384	----------	2,500	507,115
1935	45,455	42,839	56,252	119,554	----------	----------	402,333
1936	73,660	42,534	79,004	155,700	----------	4,750	547,199
1937	107,111	47,349	104,067	193,947	----------	9,000	675,297
1938	98,751	32,817	99,000	83,000	----------	(1)	575,957

[1] Not quoted.

Source: Foreign Commerce and Navigation of the United States, 1929–37. Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, bulletins on trade of United States with France (May 1939), Germany (March 1939), United Kingdom (May 1939), Japan (April 1939), China (May 1939), Canada (May 1939).

United States exports of refined and scrap copper to selected foreign countries, 1929–38

[Thousands of pounds]

Year	Refined, ingots and bars	Old and scrap	Total
FRANCE
1929	175,265	2,654	177,919
1930	141,237	4,578	145,815
1931	109,481	7,867	117,348
1932	62,367	3,196	65,563
1933	72,885	4,608	77,493
1934	116,318	2,986	119,304
1935	64,346	550	64,896
1936	81,744	3,466	85,210
1937	78,394	3,017	81,411
1938	64,221	4,008	68,229
GERMANY
1929	178,879	19,189	198,068
1930	98,360	14,288	112,648
1931	58,283	37,910	96,193
1932	30,447	19,121	49,568
1933	34,762	8,928	43,690
1934	72,762	10,127	82,889
1935	49,833	11,702	61,535
1936	65,279	13,948	79,227
1937	75,070	23,716	98,786
1938	148,666	23,701	172,367
UNITED KINGDOM
1929	175,450	1,958	177,408
1930	142,789	2,220	145,009
1931	94,249	5,453	99,702
1932	59,950	4,056	64,006
1933	26,597	2,006	28,603
1934	82,415	1,235	83,650
1935	109,043	382	109,425
1936	61,096	669	61,765
1937	105,582	784	106,366
1938	61,231	(1)	61,231
CANADA
1929	38,692	4,463	43,155
1930	13,764	1,341	15,105
1931	7,119	817	7,936
1932	187	3	190
1933	92	1	93
1934	162	46	208
1935	208	1	209
1936	380	387	767
1937	4,922	1,662	6,584
1938	1,563	(1)	1,563
JAPAN
1929	7,954	4,129	12,083
1930	3,187	1,756	4,943
1931	188	2,502	2,690
1932	448	2,716	3,164
1933	28,158	7,399	35,557
1934	113,769	4,828	118,597
1935	106,265	3,243	109,508
1936	79,852	5,355	85,207
1937	145,689	10,839	156,528
1938	217,880	3,805	221,685
CHINA
1929	5,604	54	5,658
1930	5,627	27	5,654
1931	4,723	----------	4,723
1932	740	76	816
1933	4,071	2	4,073
1934	3,755	55	3,810
1935	3,485	----------	3,485
1936	5,096	67	5,163
1937	8,938	----------	8,938
1938	952	----------	952
TOTAL, ALL COUNTRIES
1929	822,454	37,635	860,089
1930	594,115	33,886	628,001
1931	405,396	67,177	472,573
1932	221,955	34,358	256,313
1933	249,164	28,437	277,601
1934	524,733	39,651	564,384
1935	521,471	19,083	540,554
1936	440,781	26,447	467,228
1937	590,127	41,828	631,955
1938	741,091	43,621	784,712

[1] Not quoted.

Sources: Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Foreign Commerce and Navigation of the United States, 1929–37. Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Bulletins on Trade of United States with France (May 1939), Germany (March 1939), United Kingdom (May 1939), Canada (May 1939), Japan (April 1939), China (May 1939). Monthly Summary of Foreign Commerce of the United States, December 1938.

Twelve Months Under the New Rules of Civil Procedure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. ALEXANDER HOLTZOFF

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by

Hon. Alexander Holtzoff, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, at the Judicial Conference for the Third Judicial Circuit, held on Friday, September 22, 1939, in Atlantic City, N. J., entitled "Twelve Months Under the New Rules of Civil Procedure."

The address is as follows:

In accepting the invitation kindly extended to me by the senior circuit judge to discuss Twelve Months Under the New Rules of Civil Procedure, I felt a considerable degree of delicacy. It seemed to me that it involves some presumption on my part to speak on this subject before this select group, for it is you and your colleagues throughout the Federal judicial system that have breathed the spirit of life into the new rules and made them a vital and virile force. On the other hand, I am very much in the position of an observer reporting on the results of a battle to the generals who had borne the brunt of the fighting. In spite of my hesitation and misgivings, however, Judge Biggs' courteous invitation leaves me no alternative but to venture on this interesting and important topic.

In the history of law reform the year 1938 will mark noteworthy epoch. The adoption of the new Federal civil procedure ranks in its importance and significance on a par with the abandonment of common law pleading in England as a result of the adoption of the Hilary Rules in 1834, and the inauguration of the present simplified procedure in that country in 1875. President Roosevelt has recently characterized this far-reaching step as a notable accomplishment and as "an outstanding milestone along the road of law reform."

The separation between law and equity, which persisted in the Federal courts in spite of its abrogation in most of the States, and the many varieties of procedure in actions at law, which were necessitated by the Conformity Act, led to a bewildering complexity in the field of Federal civil procedure. The third circuit afforded a striking illustration of this condition. Each of the States comprising this busy jurisdiction has a different type of pleading and practice, which it was incumbent upon the Federal courts to follow.

The new Federal procedure has met with universal acclaim, as, in addition to possessing the virtue of uniformity, it may be said to constitute the quintessence of simplicity. Occasionally a few lawyers, momentarily oblivious of the fact that the function of the courts is to administer justice rather than to cultivate an artificial and useless science, have uttered sighs of regret because the rules have cast into oblivion much abstruse and laborious learning relating to minute points embraced in such intriguing subjects as forms of actions, refinements of pleading, joinder of parties and of causes of action, counterclaims, and other similarly enlivening topics too numerous to mention. It is perhaps this general attitude, which is at times exhibited by some members of the legal profession, that Shakespeare had in mind when he put in the mouth of Rosalind this quip, in answer to the question, With whom does time stand still? "With lawyers in vacation, for they sleep between term and term, and then they perceive not how time moves."

The purpose of the new procedure has been to throw into discard the technicalities that acted as a brake on the progress of a lawsuit; to abolish what has been so aptly termed as "the sporting theory of justice"; to provide efficient machinery for the ascertainment of truth; and to expedite a determination of each controversy on the merits. The watchword of the new procedure is found in rule 1, which provides that the rules "shall be construed to secure the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action." Anyone who has followed the application of the rules during the first 12 months of their existence must inevitably reach the conclusion that this principle has been kept in view and observed by the courts. The rules have been interpreted and administered in the liberal and flexible spirit contemplated by their framers. The courts are entitled to strong commendation on the effective manner in which they have adopted and applied the new procedure. They are justified in feeling a sense of achievement.

The path of every outstanding reform and every notable innovation is, however, beset with pitfalls. The new Federal procedure was no exception. It was menaced by two serious dangers. First, there was lurking the possibility that the new rules might be destroyed in a bog of technical decisions. The history of the New York Code of Civil Procedure stood out as a horrible example of what may eventually happen to a simple practice code. Fortunately, the Federal courts have not exhibited any tendency of this nature, and so far this peril has been avoided. The second danger confronted by the new procedure was the possibility that such variations might gradually arise in the interpretation and application of the rules in the 85 districts as gradually to cause a departure from the uniformity envisaged by the framers of the rules, and eventually lead to a development of 85 varieties of procedure—one of the serious conditions which the new rules were intended to remedy. This hazard, however, has likewise been averted.

The courts, which have been piloting and steering the new craft, have charted a safe course. So long as there is no deviation from it there is no danger that the ship may be stranded on the shoals of technicalities or wrecked on the rocks of divergent interpretations. Continued vigilance is, however, indispensable in order to preclude even a possibility of such a frustration of the purpose and objective of the new procedure.

It may be of interest to examine some of the principal problems that were presented to the courts for solution during the first 12 months of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and to summarize some of their experiences, which may prove of general interest.

An inquiry has been occasionally propounded whether the Conformity Act is still in effect and may be enforced as auxiliary to the new procedure. Section 1 of the act of June 19, 1934, however, which empowered the Supreme Court to promulgate rules of civil procedure, clearly repeals the Conformity Act. The new rules must be regarded as the sole guide to Federal civil procedure, except, of course, in respect to matters which are expressly excluded from the operation of the rules by their very terms.

A topic that seems to be appropriate for consideration in this discussion is that of pleading. Brevity and simplicity of pleading is one of the principal objectives of the rules. In order to assist in attaining this goal, illustrative forms are included in the appendix to the rules. One of the questions that has arisen is, What constitutes a sufficient averment of negligence? Among the forms contained in the appendix is a complaint in an action for personal injuries caused by the negligent driving of a motor vehicle. It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant negligently drove a motor vehicle against the plaintiff, but no statement is made as to the negligent acts or omissions with which the defendant is charged. This form appears to have been a source of considerable perturbation. A doubt has been raised as to whether the form contains a sufficient statement of a cause of action, or rather a claim, for the term "claim" has happily superseded the phrase "cause of action."

Curiously enough, it is a peculiar paradox that in this respect common law pleading was simpler than code pleading. At common law, an allegation of negligence without specification of the acts of negligence sufficed, while some authorities under the codes have insisted that such an allegation must be expanded, in order to indicate the particular negligent acts or failures to act of which the defendant was being accused. Last January, in the southern district of Ohio, the form contained in the appendix to the rules was sustained and a mere general charge of negligence without specification was held sufficient.[1] Subsequently, the circuit court of appeals for this circuit rendered a progressive opinion, approving a similar form, and sustaining the sufficiency of a general allegation of negligence,[2] thus allaying any doubt that may have existed on this point.

Another question that has aroused a considerable amount of interest in connection with pleading under the new rules relates to the subject of contributory negligence. Rule 8, subsection (c), enumerates certain defenses that must be pleaded affirmatively. Among those listed is contributory negligence. It has, of course, been the general rule in the Federal courts that in a negligence action the burden of pleading and establishing contributory negligence is on the defendant. On the other hand, in some of the States, New York and Illinois for example, the absence of contributory negligence must be pleaded by the plaintiff and proved as a part of his prima facie case. On April 25, 1938—almost 5 months after the rules were promulgated—the Supreme Court handed down its opinion in Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins, which has already become a cause celebre.[3] It overruled the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson,[4] that on matters of general jurisprudence the Federal courts might develop their own common law and held that on all questions of substantive law the Federal courts were bound to enforce the law of the States irrespective of whether it was statutory or common law.[5]

This decision, as has been remarked by one district judge, has "legally speaking turned the world upside down."[5] One of the necessary consequences of the doctrine of Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins has been a change in the Federal rule that contributory negligence is an affirmative defense. This, indeed, remains the rule applied by the Federal courts in those States in which it constitutes the law of the State. In States like New York and Illinois, however, in which the opposite doctrine prevails, it becomes incumbent on the Federal courts to require the plaintiff to establish the absence of contributory negligence as a part of his case. What, then, happens to the enumeration of contributory negligence as an affirmative defense in rule 8? This subject was discussed at length in a well-considered opinion in the eastern district of Illinois.[6] The conclusion was reached that in a jurisdiction in which the burden of showing the absence of contributory negligence was on the plaintiff, the defendant was not required to interpose contributory negligence as a defense, but where the burden of establishing contributory negligence was on the defendant, it was necessary to plead it affirmatively. The court suggests that this conclusion is not inconsistent with the plain meaning of rule 8 (c), since the rule should be construed as merely requiring contributory negligence to be pleaded affirmatively whenever it is used as a defense, but not if it plays a different role in the litigation. In other words, if the defendant has the burden of proving contributory negligence, he must plead it affirmatively in order to avail himself of the defense, and is not at liberty to advance it under a general denial. He does not have to plead it where the plaintiff carries the onus of showing freedom from contributory negligence. This solution seems entirely reasonable and satisfactorily reconciles the doctrine of Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins with the provision of rule 8 (c).

---

[1] Hardin v. Interstate Motor Freight System, 26 Fed. Supp. 97.

[2] Sierocinski v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 103 F. (2d) 843 (C. C. A. 3rd).

[3] 304 U. S. 64.

[4] 16 Pet. 1.

[5] Wham, J., in Francis v. Humphrey, Eastern District of Illinois, 25 F. Supp. 1, 3.

[6] Francis v. Humphrey, supra.

Considerable debate has been engendered in regard to the proper scope and function of bills of particulars. It must be observed at the outset that there is a sharp differentiation between bills of particulars in the code States and bills of particulars under the new rules. Under the codes, bills of particulars are generally ordered after issue is joined, for the purpose of furnishing information needed by the moving party in preparing for trial. Under the new Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, an application for a bill of particulars lies only before the answer is served. In fact, it has been held that under the new rules motions for a more definite statement and motions for bills of particulars are interchangeable and coextensive. The purpose of such relief is to obtain only such information as is required by the moving party in order to enable him to plead. On the other hand, information needed in preparation for trial is secured by interrogatories. It must be borne in mind in this connection that procedure by interrogatories does not exist under some of the codes, and that, therefore, liberal use of bills of particulars is essential in the local courts in such jurisdictions.

This limitation on the employment of bills of particulars has been worked out in a number of cases decided under the new rules, most of them in the southern district of New York. It appears to be a desirable restriction, since it assists in expediting joinder of issue and thereby the trial. This result is due to the fact that a defendant who moves for a bill of particulars is not required to serve his answer until he receives the bill. Therefore, a liberal use of bills of particulars would tend to prolong litigation rather than to speed it. On the other hand, no prejudice results from circumscribing the scope of bills of particulars, since the desired information can readily be secured by interrogatories without postponing the joinder of issue.

My summary of the development of the law on this point would not, however, be complete were I to fail to observe that the cases are by no means in unison. Different judges have reached divergent conclusions. Some decisions have been rendered which give to bills of particulars a broader scope than seems to accord with what I may perhaps denominate as the majority rule.

An important and far-reaching innovation in legal procedure is to be found in third-party practice, which makes it possible to avoid circuity of action by enabling a defendant to bring in as a third-party defendant either a person who is liable over to him on the plaintiff's claim or who is originally liable to the plaintiff. This procedure is not entirely a novelty in the Federal courts, for it has been known in admiralty for a great many years. Moreover, in those few States in which it formed a part of the State procedure, it was employed by Federal courts in actions at law, pursuant to the requirements of the Conformity Act. The rules, however, make third-party practice an inherent feature of Federal civil procedure.

At the very inception, a vital question arises in connection with the use of this contrivance, namely, Is it necessary that there exist an independent ground of Federal jurisdiction for the third-party complaint? In other words, if the original suit is based on a diversity of citizenship, must there be a like diversity between the defendant and the third-party defendant? The solution of this fundamental problem would seem in turn to depend on the answer to the query whether a third-party proceeding is to be regarded as ancillary to the main suit or as an independent proceeding. If the former, obviously an independent ground of Federal jurisdiction is not needed. If the latter, a third-party complaint may not be maintained unless the defendant can show Federal jurisdiction for the controversy as between him and the third-party defendant. Manifestly, if the narrow view were adopted, third-party practice could be but rarely invoked, especially in cases in which jurisdiction is based on diversity of citizenship. Frequently, there may be a diversity of citizenship as between a plaintiff and defendant without the existence of this element as between the defendant and some person who has agreed to indemnify him, or who is liable to contribution.

The circuit courts of appeals do not seem to have spoken on this matter as yet. The district courts, however, guided perhaps by the inspiring judicial admonition that "we must let our minds be bold," fortunately, are, one by one, adopting the view that a third-party proceeding is ancillary or auxiliary to the main action and, therefore, does not require an independent ground of Federal jurisdiction. This conclusion has been reached in two districts in this circuit, the western district of Pennsylvania and the dictrict of New Jersey.[7]

Third-party practice under the new rules covers a more extensive field than third-party practice under some of the codes, for it is not limited to cases in which the third-party defendant is secondarily liable to the original defendant, but extends also to instances in which the third-party defendant is directly liable to the plaintiff. This distinction was comprehensively discussed in a case decided in the District of Columbia.[8]

The next topic to which I should like to advert is pretrial procedure. A wealth of experience elsewhere formed a substantial background for the introduction of pretrial procedure into the Federal courts. In England, where it is known by the appellation of "summons for directions," it has been in vogue a great many years. Every case is regularly subjected to this process for the purpose of defining and restricting the issues to those actually in controversy. Some years ago it was introduced in the local courts in Detroit with a view to reducing inordinate arrears and excessive congestion of the dockets. It proved highly successful and was transplanted to Boston, where it met with equally gratifying results. It has been particularly effective where the court dockets are overcrowded, and some expedient is needed for breaking the jam and speeding the disposition of cases.

Within a few weeks after the rules went into effect, pretrial procedure was adopted as a regular feature in the district court for the district of Massachusetts. The entire jury docket was called for pretrial procedure by one of the judges, who was assigned to devote his entire time to this work. The session consumed 3 weeks. During that period 313 cases were filtered through this mechanism. The result was a final disposition of 130 cases, or over 40 percent of the aggregate. As to the balance, stipulations in respect to facts, documents, and similar matters were frequently made, which considerably shortened the trials. The result was a substantial reduction in the congestion of the docket and in the waiting period for trial as regards cases that were ready for disposition. So successful was the experiment in respect to jury cases that this fall it is planned to extend the practice to nonjury cases.

The district of Oregon likewise adopted pretrial procedure for every case as a matter of ordinary routine. Its experience is equally favorable. Many other districts have invoked pretrial procedure to a greater or less degree. Among them is the district of New Jersey, where a very large percentage of all the cases on the docket has been subjected to the process. The universal conclusion, wherever this practice has been invoked, is that it invariably results, at the very least, in abbreviating trials and thereby expediting the progress of litigation through the judicial mill.

It may be of interest to observe that the district court for the District of Columbia has recently adopted a rule on the subject and has announced that commencing this month a pretrial docket will be called as a regular feature of the business of the court, and that one judge will devote his entire time to this activity. It is believed that the success thus far attained indicates that pretrial procedure has passed the experimental stage and is a device that may be adopted as part of the regular routine throughout the entire Federal judicial system.

One of the noteworthy features of the new rules is found in their treatment of the subject of discovery. There is provided a veritable arsenal of different discovery weapons, all, however, fashioned to achieve the same end. Their field of usefulness is limited practically only by the ingenuity and resourcefulness of counsel. It will be recalled that these weapons are five in number: Depositions, or "examinations before trial," to use the terminology of the codes; interrogatories; production and inspection of documents and other objects; requests for admissions; and physical and mental examinations. The purpose of discovery is to afford a means, not only for securing evidence which the moving party needs in support of his case or defense, but also for procuring information which may be of help in preparing for trial. Consequently, the moving party may take depositions not only for the purpose of obtaining evidence on issues on which he has the burden of proof, but also for the purpose of inquiring into matters relating to his adversary's case. Similarly, the mere fact that the matters regarding which discovery is sought happen to be within the knowledge of the moving party, is no objection to taking a deposition of the adverse party or filing interrogatories in respect thereto. The reason for this conclusion is obvious. Frequently it is not sufficient for a party to have knowledge of the facts. It is necessary for him to transform them into such shape as would render them admissible in evidence. Moreover, it is manifestly useful and desirable, with a view to diminishing the expense of trials and the time consumed by them, to ascertain in advance to what extent the facts will be admitted by the adverse party.

Requests for admissions have a cognate purpose. If the party on whom such a document is served either is familiar with the facts or else has the facilities for readily ascertaining their accuracy, there is no reason why he should not admit the truth under penalty of being required to recompense the adverse party for the expense incurred in proving the facts at the trial. The philosophy underlying this procedure is that a lawsuit should not be conducted as a controversy at arm's length, or as a game of chess, in which the most skillful player secures the palm of victory. On the contrary, it is assumed that litigation is to be regarded as an efficacious mode of determining the truth and adjudicating rights. Whatever pertinent information is in the possession of either party must be made available to his antagonist prior to the trial.

An interesting illustration of the use of requests for admissions is found in a case decided in the eastern district of New York.[9] It involved an action brought to recover under the double-indemnity provisions of a life-insurance policy. Whether the plaintiff was entitled to receive double indemnity depended on whether or not the deceased died an accidental death, as alleged in the complaint. The insurance company took the position that the death was not accidental, but was the result of a participation on the part of the deceased in a fracas which had been caused by pouring too many libations to Bacchus.

In addition, the defendant contended that the policy had been obtained by misrepresentations, consisting of a concealment of the fact on the part of the insured that he had received considerable medical attention during a specified period preceding the presentation of the application for insurance. Counsel for the defendant

[7] Bossard v. McGwinn (W. D. Pa.), 27 F. Supp. 412; Kravas v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. (W. D. Pa.), 28 F. Supp. 66; Satink v. Holland (N. J.), 28 F. Supp. 67.

[8] Crim v. Lumbermen's Mutual Casualty Co., 26 F. Supp. 715.

[9] Walsh v. Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Co., 26 F. Supp. 566.

served a request for admissions, composed of a long series of sentences or short paragraphs, each comprising a separate detail or distinct fact bearing upon these two issues. The court upheld the propriety of this course.

I have just briefly epitomized the principal rulings that have been handed down on the subject of discovery during the past 12 months. There have, indeed, been a few decisions that have taken a somewhat narrower view of certain phases of the matter. I believe however that my résumé represents the predominant doctrines.

An ingenious approach on the part of the framers of the new rules to the subject of evidence lends considerable interest to this vital topic. The person whose resourceful mind originated the idea embodied in rule 43 that the Federal courts should apply either the Federal or the State law of evidence, whichever happens to be the more liberal for the moment, is entitled to the gratitude of both the bar and litigants. Naturally, as rulings on questions of evidence are made in the course of a trial, few opinions are rendered in this branch of the law by nisi prius courts. The circuit courts of appeals have not as yet been called upon to construe the new rule on this point or to define its scope and application. Notice has been attracted, however, to the consideration given to the matter in the Southern District of New York during the protracted trial of the action brought by the Government under the Sherman antitrust law against the Aluminum Co. of America. On one occasion during the proceedings, when a close question of admissibility of a certain item of evidence was presented for decision, the presiding judge observed:

"Rule 43 does not deal with the law as to what testimony should be excluded. It deals only with what is admissible under the law of the United States or the law of the State in which the particular court sits. It is intended to liberalize admissibility of testimony, but has nothing to do with what should be excluded."

It so happened that in that particular instance the State law required the exclusion of the evidence. The Federal cases had not settled the question or worked out a Federal rule. The judge indicated that he was not bound by the New York rule, but that, since the question was an open one in the Federal courts, he was free to develop a Federal rule on the subject. He concluded that, if the Federal rule evolved in this manner should admit the evidence, he was free to overrule the objection.

Among the important advances made by the new rules is that relating to summary judgments. This is a practice that is thoroughly familiar to lawyers practicing in many of the code States. It has had a potent effect in discouraging defenses interposed solely for the purpose of delay and in enabling a party who can show that he is clearly entitled to recover and that there are no material issues really in controversy, to secure a judgment without waiting until the case can be set and reached for trial. The experience of the State courts, as well as of the English tribunals, had established the usefulness of this device long before it was transplanted into the Federal judicial system. The Federal courts during the past 12 months have readily adopted this practice and permitted its utilization in a variety of instances. It has been invoked, not only in cases in which the plaintiff was able to show by affidavits or other similar means that no material issues were raised by the answer, but also in instances in which the defendant interposed an affirmative defense, such as the statute of limitations or res adjudicata, and was able to show that the plaintiff could not successfully meet the plea. Incidentally, it was held in the eastern district of New York in an action against the United States under the Tucker Act, that the Government was subject to summary judgment procedure to the same extent that another defendant would be under parallel circumstances.

The new rules have destroyed one of the traps for the unwary that theretofore beset the practitioner in the Federal courts. I have reference to the metaphysical and esoteric doctrine that if both the plaintiff and the defendant move for a directed verdict, they must be deemed to have waived a trial by jury, although if only one of them makes such a motion, no waiver follows. Incidentally, this was one of numerous instances in which the Conformity Act did not rise to the rescue of the lawyer who practiced principally in the State courts and entered the portals of the Federal tribunals only on rare occasions. Even in such jurisdictions as New Jersey, for example, in which under the State law no waiver of a jury trial was inferred from the fact that the parties had joined in a motion for a directed verdict, the Federal rule to the contrary nevertheless governed, presumably on the theory that the Conformity Act exacted conformity only "as near as may be." A great deal of satisfaction has been derived by the bar from the change in Federal procedure in this respect. Needless to say, no deleterious effects have been observed as a consequence of its introduction into the Federal courts.

Equally welcome was the rule which permits the court to take the verdict of a jury subject to a later determination of the questions of law raised by the motion for a directed verdict. The result is practically to introduce into Federal procedure motions for judgment non obstante veredicto—a practice that is, of course, especially familiar to Pennsylvania lawyers.

Rule 83 is perhaps worthy of some attention. It authorizes each district court to adopt local rules on all points not covered by the general rules. Such a provision was obviously indispensable, and yet it was not entirely lacking in a potential danger. Implicit in this rule was the possibility that local rules might gradually lead to divergencies in procedure, one of the principal evils which the act of June 19, 1934, sought to cure. There was also the possibility that some districts might adopt detailed rules dealing with minutiae that might prove as cumbersome and as technical as some of the codes in the code States. The judicial conference a year ago noted the need for uniformity and simplicity in local rules. It expressed the view that such rules should be few, simple, and free from unnecessary technicalities. It created a committee composed of three district judges to examine the various district rules and make recommendations in order that the greatest practical degree of uniformity throughout the country might be secured. The work of this committee is now in progress.

In the inauguration of any far-reaching reform the period of transition and adjustment is likely to give rise to some temporary difficulties. In this connection the principal problem confronting the courts was what should be done in respect to pending actions that had been instituted prior to the effective date of the new procedure. The Supreme Court in rule 86 provided that the rules should govern "all further proceedings in actions then pending, except to the extent that in the opinion of the court their application in a particular action pending when the rules take effect would not be feasible or would work injustice, in which event the former procedure applies." In other words, as is usual with changes in adjective law, the new procedure is applicable to pending cases and is not restricted only to cases thereafter filed. It is only in the extraordinary case, in which it appears that the application of the new rules would not be feasible, or might result in an injustice, that an exception is to be made.

The courts have resolved the questions that have arisen in connection with pending cases in a manner that facilitated the transition from the old procedure to the new. Generally, it may be said that the validity of a proceeding in a pending action is dependent on the law as of the date that the proceeding was taken. In other words, if the date was earlier than September 16, 1938, the action is to be tested by the law then existing; if subsequent to the effective date of the new rules, the latter should govern. Pleadings filed prior to September 16, 1938, remain, and repleading has not been required merely for the purpose of conforming to the new rules. On the other hand, pleadings filed subsequently, even in such an action, must conform to the new procedure, rather than that prevailing when the suit was instituted.

As a corollary of the general doctrine to which I have just referred, the sufficiency of pleadings filed previously to September 16, 1938, has been generally tested by the law in effect as of the date of filing. There is one exception to this course, however, in the interest of liberality and expedition. If a pleading would have been insufficient under the law prevailing as of the date of filing, but meets the requirements of the new rules, it would seem futile to rule that such a pleading is defective. Such a decision would be but brutum fulmen, for obvicusly the party against whom it was rendered could immediately replead, in which event the sufficiency of the new pleading would be tested under the new rules. Although the prevailing tendency has been in accordance with what seems to be the practical view, there have been a few decisions to the contrary.

It has been universally held that the new rules relating to depositions and other forms of discovery should apply to pending cases. A salutary exception has, however, been evolved in respect to those few cases that had been pending for a long time and in which the taking of depositions under the new procedure would have the effect of postponing the trial for a considerable period.

It will be recalled that the new rules abolished writs of mandamus. Nevertheless, it has been held by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia that mandamus proceedings instituted prior to September 16, 1938, may be maintained and brought to a final conclusion. This consummation is obviously desirable, since otherwise the relator would have had to dismiss his proceeding and institute a civil action under the new rules, thereby losing considerable time and incurring needless expense. In this connection it may be observed that although the new rules purport to abolish writs of mandamus entirely, the rules are intended for the guidance of the district courts and do not affect the circuit courts of appeals, except in respect to appeals. Consequently, in those cases in which circuit courts of appeals issue original writs of mandamus, the writ still exists and should not be deemed abrogated by the rule which provides for the abolition of the writ. For example, some months ago the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit entertained and passed on the merits of an application for an original writ of mandamus directed against a district judge.

Some questions have arisen in connection with appeals in pending cases. All of the courts are inclined to adopt the principle that any appellate step taken, or which should have been taken, prior to September 16, 1938, must meet the requirements of the law then existing. Any step taken or to be taken subsequently to that date need conform only to the new rules. For example, it has been held in the first and ninth circuits that compliance with the requirements as to severance is to be exacted in the case of an appeal taken prior to September 16, 1938.

A question of this type was presented to the Supreme Court in McCrone v. United States, which was decided last April.[10] It may be interesting to note, in passing, that this is the only decision thus far rendered by the Supreme Court in which that tribunal construed or interpreted the new rules. It involved a contempt proceeding. A judgment finding the contemnor guilty and committing him to jail was rendered by the district court. An appeal was taken in his behalf to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. Deeming the contempt to be criminal, rather than civil, counsel filed a notice of appeal under the criminal-appeals rules, instead of filing a petition and securing an allowance of the appeal. The Supreme Court concluded that the contempt was civil, rather than criminal, and that therefore the appeal had not been properly taken. Counsel argued that, since the new rules permitted civil appeals to be instituted by notice, he was within the rules in any event. The Court called attention to the fact, however, that the notice of appeal had been filed on May 2, 1938, when the controlling statute required a petition and allowance of an appeal in a civil case. It consequently held that the validity of the appeal depended on his compliance with the law then existing and could not be determined under the new rules. The appeal was dismissed.

[10] 307 U. S. 61.

So satisfactory has the new procedure proved after it has been in operation for a short time that the Supreme Court in the Orders of Bankruptcy, which became effective last February, provided that the rules shall be followed as nearly as may be in proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act. On September 1 the new rules similarly became applicable to copyright suits as the result of an amendment made by the Supreme Court to the Copyright Rules.

The great reform in Federal procedure has thus been safely launched and is successfully making rapid headway, due very largely to the sympathetic attitude on the part of the judiciary and the effective manner in which the members of the bench have construed and applied the new rules. While this outstanding measure is of momentous importance to the Federal judicial system, its significance extends far beyond its effect on Federal jurisprudence. Perhaps the greatest tribute that has been paid to this notable accomplishment is found in the fact that in numerous States movements are afoot and in some of them steps have already been taken to secure the assimilation of the new Federal rules or at least such of them as are appropriate, into the local courts. One may well envisage the existence in a not too distant future of a simple, uniform civil procedure throughout all the Federal and State courts. When that consummation is reached, inconsequential controversies over points of pleading, practice, and procedure which hamper and retard the determination of substantive rights, and which rightly seem of no importance to the litigants, will be reduced to a minimum. The law will then be freed from some of the procedural fetters by which it has long been shackled.

Prospective Increase in Latin American Trade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ARTICLE BY FELIX COTTEN

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Felix Cotten, published in the Washington Post of Sunday, October 22, 1939, on the subject of the prospective increase in trade between this country and Latin America.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of October 22, 1939]

WITH RIVALS AT WAR, UNITED STATES EXPECTS SPURT IN LATIN AMERICAN TRADE—TRADE TO STRENGTHEN MONROE DOCTRINE TIES—WITH GERMAN AND BRITAIN FORCED OUT OF THE MARKET, AMERICA HAS OPPORTUNITY TO CULTIVATE SOUTH AMERICAN RELATIONSHIPS

(By Felix Cotten)

American business, so far as its Latin American customers are concerned, is in pretty much the same position as the general merchandise store whose chief rival has gone out of business.

That is, the war has forced Germany, with its cumbersome array of barter agreements, out of the Latin American market. Germany in recent years has ranked second to the United States as an exporter of manufactured goods to that region.

Translated into political terms, this means that American business right now has an excellent opportunity to bind still closer, through trade relationships, the ties which have given life to the Monroe Doctrine.

The administration, naturally, has not been slow to sense the situation. "Pep talks" to business were begun shortly after war broke out. Businessmen were urged to take advantage of their opportunity and yet were cautioned to build goodwill for the future rather than to strive for maximum immediate profits. Under Secretary of Commerce Noble has taken the lead in this missionary work.

THE NEW BUSINESS HAS ITS PROBLEMS

But the problem is by no means so simple as much of the discussion has indicated. It is like the case of the storekeeper who finds himself without his chief rival, and yet faces a multitude of complexities in trying to take over the new business which suddenly has started banging at his door.

In the first place, Latin America comprises a widely scattered lot of customers. There are more than 120,000,000 of them, and they live in an area which spreads in most irregular fashion over about 8,000,000 square miles. They are citizens of the 20 republics of Central and South America and certain oversized islands, like Cuba. Their foreign trade in 1937 was valued at more than $4,000,000,000.

The United States is this vast region's biggest customer. In addition, it sells in normal times more than twice as much merchandise to this region as any other exporting nation. In 1937, for example, 34.2 percent of the dollar value of Latin American imports was from the United States, 15.3 percent from Germany, 12.6 percent from the United Kingdom, 2.9 percent from France, and 34.9 percent from other countries. The latter figure includes Japan, whose trade with Latin America in 1938 dropped to 53 percent of the 1937 figure, due presumably to the stress of the Chinese conquest. It also embraces such countries as Italy and the trade among the Latin American countries themselves.

In 1937, 31.1 percent of the dollar value of Latin American exports was taken by the United States, 17.6 percent by the United Kingdom, 8.7 percent by Germany, 4 percent by France, and 38.6 percent by other countries.

WAR SLOWS UP TRAFFIC WITH EUROPE

The war means presumably that the trade of England and France with Latin America will be drastically curtailed temporarily, although they are not confronted with the same situation that faces Germany. In other words, England, with her superior navy, is able to control ocean trade and to impose a blockade on Germany so far as ocean-going commerce is concerned. But belligerents usually are too busy at home turning out equipment, munitions, and supplies for their fighting forces to devote much attention to trade which absorbed their energies in peacetime.

American business, therefore, has been freed of its chief rival in the Latin American market. The countries now at war with this rival will not be able to do nearly as much business in that market as they have been doing.

IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN DIFFERENT—IF * * *

If the Latin American republics had relied on the United States all along for needed manufactures, of course, they would not have been faced with such an emergency. But the matter is not that simple.

The countries to the south, being big producers of agricultural products and various kinds of raw materials, have had to look for markets for their products in all parts of the world, and they have naturally bought goods from countries where they have sold goods, particularly when the countries buying their goods offered inducements of one kind or another.

Some indication of the probable effect of the present war on Latin American trade may be obtained from an examination of figures covering the period of the last war. From 1910 to 1914, 24.8 percent of the dollar value of imports of the Latin American republics was from the United States, 24.8 percent from the United Kingdom, 15.9 percent from Germany, 7.9 percent from France, and 26.6 percent from other countries. The United States, in this period, took 34.1 percent dollar value of the exports of these countries, the United Kingdom 20.9 percent, Germany 11.4 percent, France 7.9 percent, and other countries 25.7 percent.

In the war period of 1915 to 1919, however, the United States sold Latin America 49.3 percent of its outside purchases. The share of the British Isles dropped to 17.2 percent. France's share declined to 4 percent, and that of the other countries rose to 29.1 percent. In the case of Germany, it was a black-out, due again to the British blockade.

During this period also purchases of the United States jumped to 45.6 percent of the exports of these countries. British purchases increased slightly to 21.3 percent, and French moderately to 8.4 percent. Purchases of other countries dropped to 24.6 percent. Again, and for the same reason, no German purchases were shown.

The feeling that American business now has a rare opportunity—one that may never present itself again—is practically unanimous, both among business leaders interested in Latin American trade and Government officials. Nevertheless, students well versed in the problem have a word of caution for those inclined to expect too much. They are able not only to point to the above figures on the experience of the last war, but to cite many other circumstances showing that the United States will have no monopoly on the trade suddenly cut off from Europe, and in some instances will not be able to take advantage of it even if American businessmen should be so inclined.

Administration participation in the situation has divided into two general courses of action. Aside from encouraging businessmen to take full advantage of their opportunity, and warning them not to try to exploit this region, efforts are being made to foster trade expansion through trade treaties, extension of credits, and the development of markets in the United States for Latin American products.

It is inevitable, of course, that this activity should be interpreted in some quarters as in part a rather opportunistic attempt to take advantage of England and France by snatching their trade.

So far as Germany is concerned, there has been no display of sensibilities, since the Nazis have not been particularly noted for sentiment anyway and have been suspected of having political designs, not entirely friendly to the United States, in their aggressive development of trade with Latin America.

Due to a desire not to offend England and France and their interests in Latin America, there is a growing tendency among Government authorities to veer away from any appeal to the mercenary instincts of American business. Stress is placed on fair dealing. Use horse sense, Undersecretary of Commerce Noble told representatives of American export and import organizations here a short time ago. Don't try to profiteer at the expense of Latin American buyers. Don't sell them shoddy goods at high prices, as was done too often during the last war.

The official attitude now apparently stacks up something like this: Latin American countries are to a large degree against it. They are in a disadvantageous bargaining position because they must look to us for supplies. Therefore, we want to help them all we can. We are going to try to see to it that they get a fair deal. Meanwhile, we realize that the diversion of a great deal of the trade from Europe is a temporary thing, and that it will revert back to Europe when the war is over.

Experts on Latin American trade say the people of those countries resent the suggestion that American business regards the war dislocation as an opportunity to get all their trade. Countries that trade heavily with England, moreover, don't like the idea that the United States may be taking advantage of England. On the other hand, there is no historical evidence anywhere that trade ever gave much heed to sentiment, and British trade, it is pointed out, certainly has been no exception to this rule.

Regardless of the official attitude, the Government will do what it can to foster trade with Latin America. Officials most concerned with political relationships in this hemisphere are anxious to use trade ties to the fullest possible extent to cement political ties.

For one thing, the administration is trying to develop markets in this country for Latin American products in order that Latin America will have more dollar exchange with which to buy American goods. This is the point where the most constructive work may be done, Noble has emphasized, since a shortage of dollar exchange has been one of the obstacles to trade expansion with some Latin American countries.

LONG-RANGE PROGRAM UNDER WAY

It would be a mistake, however, to imply that efforts to build up markets for products of these countries was only started recently. It has been a continuing thing. In fact, a long-range program, designed to promote American markets for such articles as rubber and manila hemp, has been sidetracked in favor of an immediate program aimed at finding markets for things which may be produced immediately.

The object in this case is to enable the countries to the south to increase their dollar exchange immediately, since the necessity for buying a greater share of their supplies in this country will aggravate dollar exchange shortages and may cause hardships in some cases.

Panama hats for women is one thing which officials are trying to encourage. Ecuador [not Panama] has been making panama hats for American men for a long time. Could they develop some designs for American women? Then there are a lot of handicraft articles, such as fancy textiles, laces, leather specialty goods, women's gloves, glassware, woodenware, native pottery, and the like, for which markets might be found in this country. Brazil, Chile, and Argentina are leading producers of these articles.

They are being produced right along to some extent, and production presumably may be stepped up. In the case of rubber, however—well, it takes 8 years to grow a rubber tree that will produce rubber.

The Commerce Department is calling in department-store representatives in the near future to find out what handicraft and similar articles they might use, the amount they can use, and the prices they are willing to pay. This information will be relayed to representatives of the South American governments.

The conference is simply one of a series of conferences with trade groups for the purpose of promoting Latin American trade. Representatives of organizations trading with Latin America, in response to admonitions by Noble, assured him that there would be no unwarranted or unusual price increases in goods sold to this market.

BRITAIN NOT OUT OF MARKET

It is not to be assumed that Great Britain is turning its head the other way while the United States is trying to foster trade with Latin America. Government experts point out that exchange-control devices put into effect by England after war broke out may be used to prevent Latin American countries from using sterling exchange obtained by sales of goods to England to buy merchandise from the United States.

This would mean that an effort would be made, at least in some degree, to force Latin American countries to take British goods to the extent that England bought Latin American goods. Considerable trade which otherwise would go to the United States might be diverted in this way, some experts feel, since England's purchases from Latin America increased in the last war. Evidence, however, is that it would not work out this way in reality, since England simply will not be producing manufactured goods for sale to Latin America to the extent that she would be buying its raw materials.

Principal export items of United Kingdom to Latin America in 1937

[In thousands of dollars]

Articles	Argentina	Brazil	Chile	Colombia	Mexico	Peru	Uruguay	Venezuela
Total	99,094	34,838	9,411	14,963	8,596	5,931	11,418	8,788
Coal	10,838	2,922	------	------	------	------	1,436	------
Cotton:
Piece goods	15,895	275	1,386	7,304	623	790	1,157	3,109
Thread	1,860	558	505	515	------	------	992	------
Yarns	3,602	1,076	555	628	378	------	------	------
Disinfectants, etc	1,298	------	------	------	------	------	------	------
Electric goods and apparatus	2,694	712	364	26	56	146	54	145
Iron and steel manufactures	17,270	3,312	1,137	519	1,489	541	835	1,060
Locomotives, trams and parts	1,923	6,162	65	153	------	457	98	------
Machinery and parts	6,292	5,112	609	800	1,164	511	449	591
Motor vehicles and aircraft	1,747	1,057	166	------	221	102	670	------
Paper, cardboard	1,110	169	118	83	------	42	78	38
Pottery, ceramics	1,093	365	80	31	------	84	114	61
Rayon and silk manufactures	1,165	176	201	123	303	60	111	64
Sodium compounds	1,024	1,573	154	------	88	68	122	------
Spirits	1,196	299	47	484	214	145	234	228
Woolen and worsted tissues	10,852	405	1,260	1,787	300	560	1,054	584

Principal export items of Germany to Latin America in 1938

[In thousands of dollars]

Articles	Argentine	Brazil	Chile	Colombia	Mexico	Peru	Uruguay	Venezuela
Total exports	59,174	64,863	24,310	16,587	18,407	12,432	14,405	15,391
Coal	1,597	4,516	------	------	------	9	106	29
Paper and wares	2,227	680	593	611	1,307	434	506	------
Clay and earthenware	1,886	478	315	371	428	294	330	272
Pharmaceuticals	2,567	3,743	975	2,057	2,486	639	371	849
Steel and iron pipes	1,821	1,240	488	499	390	229	193	2,197
Iron bars, shapes and other iron wares	9,173	7,627	3,098	2,235	462	333	2,620	1,839
Leather and textile machinery	1,301	3,152	496	447	526	172	408	149
Locomotives	1,902	1,700	59	------	------	11	41	------
Power machinery	1,371	1,477	636	263	466	314	189	317
Printing machinery	1,213	733	391	125	155	364	137	121
Motor vehicles and aircraft	2,729	3,417	3,208	283	324	880	1,155	397
Electrotechnical equipment	4,545	3,718	2,150	712	855	622	1,281	560
Chemical products and dyes	4,261	4,025	597	526	663	207	276	172
Precision instruments and optical	1,109	1,635	403	298	488	270	106	332
Textiles (cotton and wool)	1,593	782	2,361	1,665	510	1,558	465	804

All War Casualties Are Not Human Beings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, not all of the casualties of war are human beings. Horses and mules, poor dumb creatures, are mercilessly sacrificed on the fields of battle or in the titanic struggles to move supplies behind the lines. Some of the most pathetic stories brought back from the front are stories of the suffering of dumb animals.

Our hearts should bleed for them, but we should not be content with mere indulgence in sympathy, however straight it may come from the heart. Somewhere there should be authority to stop the exportation of horses and mules for service on the foreign fields of carnage, and if that authority does not now exist it should be provided, either by Executive action or by statute.

This should be done at once, for the representatives of foreign belligerents are already in America arranging for the purchase of untold numbers of horses and mules for use in the war.

Secretary of State Hull informs me that there are now no legal restrictions on the exportation of horses and mules to any foreign country. This is much to be regretted for war shows no mercy to dumb animals, and there is imminent danger that many horses and mules raised in America may soon be destroyed, perhaps frightfully mangled, in European battle zones.

The American Humane Association is doing a splendid service in calling to the attention of the President and others in authority the pathetic fate that awaits many horses and mules unless something is done to put a stop to this unholy traffic. In a letter to me Sydney H. Coleman, president of the American Humane Association says:

I have had reports, but no definite truth, that the French Government has agents in this country at the present time looking over the situation with the view of buying a number of thousand of animals. I have no doubt that all the warring countries are doing the same thing, but I have not been able to learn that any large shipments have yet been placed.

I addressed letters of inquiry to Secretary of State Hull and James W. Young, Director of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and because of the widespread interest in this subject I present their replies for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 27, 1939.

MY DEAR MR. LUDLOW: I have received your letter of October 18, 1939, requesting information in regard to the number of animals that are being shipped abroad for the use of belligerents.

In reply I have to inform you that this Department does not maintain statistics regarding exports of materials other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war. I am, therefore, transmitting a copy of your letter to the Secretary of Commerce in order that such material as may be available in the Department of Commerce concerning the number of animals that are being shipped abroad for the use of belligerents may be sent to you.

I may add that there are no restrictions on the exportation of horses and mules to any foreign country.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE,
Washington, October 24, 1939.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: With reference to your letter of October 18, we have been unofficially informed that representatives of the French Government are going to Texas to purchase horses and mules. We have no information as to the extent of these contemplated purchases at the present time but will gladly advise you if we hear anything further in this connection.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES W. YOUNG, Director.

Letter Carriers' Convention Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY, OF OHIO

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by me at the Thirty-second Convention of the National Association of Letter Carriers, at Milwaukee, Wis., Labor Day, September 4, 1939.

The address is as follows:

The Chair will now recognize Secretary M. T. Finnan.

Secretary FINNAN. My brothers, no occasion in which I have participated in the long years of this association has brought me greater pleasure, nor has it found in me greater response, than the duty which I am about to perform. I am to introduce to you a man who needs no introduction. I am to introduce to you one of the greatest, outstanding Members of the House of Representatives; a man who has given the best that is in him to the constituency of his district, and that district has honored him by reelection from time to time, and in doing so they have honored themselves.

This gentleman has been your champion, your friend, and your counselor. His name is a household word wherever a letter carrier's family resides, from Hawaii in the west to Puerto Rico in the east. He is one of the most learned, able statesmen in Congress. He is a man who has made a deep study of postal affairs. He is a man who has stood ready at all times to advance measures that would improve the working conditions of letter carriers—and God bless him and his family for a piece of legislation that has been enacted that will make the name of SWEENEY forever remembered. [Applause and cheers.] I present Hon. MARTIN L. SWEENEY, of Cleveland, Ohio.

(Those present arose, applauded, and cheered.)

Hon. MARTIN L. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, national officers, delegates to this golden-jubilee convention, ladies, and gentlemen, my congratulations to this great organization gathered here at Milwaukee to celebrate a very important event—the founding of this great organization 50 years ago. I hope that you will have a very successful convention; in fact, I know you will, and the regret that I have is that I must leave today to go to your brother clerks' convention in Houston, Tex. Otherwise, I would be very happy to stay here and properly celebrate this golden jubilee as it should be celebrated.

I salute the delegation from Ohio here today, who are my fellow Buckeyes, and I salute especially Branch 40, of Cleveland, Ohio. [Applause and cheers.] I want to let you in on a secret. It is not a secret any longer. It is public knowledge. Branch 40 is an enthusiastic branch of the letter carriers. It is a militant branch with a conscientious membership. They made elaborate preparations to come to this golden-jubilee convention. They were going to be arrayed like Solomon in all his glory. They secured very nifty uniforms and, lo and behold, last Thursday afternoon when delivery was made to the post-office building, it was discovered that all the shirts had been stolen. [Laughter.] I was at a loss to know whether they could get suitable uniforms in the short time; in fact, I expected them to come here in their B. V. D.'s, but I am glad to see them here in the substitute uniforms that they have secured.

I am going to recommend that you adopt a constitutional amendment—in fact, if you do not adopt it, I am going to make an appeal to the President of the United States, who is now changing our holidays, as you know [laughter], to issue a proclamation to prohibit the letter carriers and clerks from having their convention at the same time. It makes it tough for Members of Congress with bad "dogs" to get around to both of them. [Laughter.] It would be a fine thing if you could space the time a little, because I know that you exchange greetings with the clerks and they are your coworkers. You are both part of the great American Federation of Labor. You have so many things in common many of us would like, if the time permitted, to attend both conventions.

I am very happy to follow the last speaker. I want to pay this tribute to Jess Donaldson. I have watched many men in that Department. They are all fine individuals, but I do not know of a more conscientious servant in the entire Federal service than Jess Donaldson. [Applause.] Kindly, courteous, efficient, recognizing his responsibility to the Department that he represents, and recognizing his responsibility to the great army of men in that Department, we have always found him a very helpful individual in the problems that confront the Post Office Committees of the House and Senate. In fact, I want to say now that our recent victory in meeting the ruling of the Comptroller General that the substitutes were not part of the Post Office Department was due in a large measure to the kindly advice, the encouragement, and the assistance of Jess Donaldson. We were able to pass that bill for whatever it is worth (it is a start) and to escape a veto.

Just yesterday I received the Comptroller General's opinion and have not had time to digest it personally. However, your national officers will consider it in the discussions of this convention, I think, and if there be any doubt about some of the rulings or the opinions, there is no question in my mind that if correction must be had, when Congress convenes in January our committee will take under advisement a proposal to make those corrections.

The big thing is this: We now have a law that the suffering substitutes are part of the Post Office Department. [Applause.] It has been a hard fight, a tremendous fight, for substitutes to get that recognition over a span of many years. Many of us recall the lean days, before the advent of the 40-hour week or the 44-hour week, what distressed conditions the substitutes experienced, and how we had to plead again and again to the Congress to give us some aid. This is another demonstration of the activity of your national officers in battling for this legislation and kindred legislation.

You may well be proud of President Gainor—you may well be proud of him I say—because his has been a labor of love to the organization that he has represented over a quarter of a century. I must say with a great deal of pride that he stands here in the city of Milwaukee and his heart throbs as he remembers the pioneers of 50 years ago who laid the cornerstone of this organization, proud that he was privileged for 25 years—a little more—to follow in their footsteps, unflinchingly, though the road was hard at times. As the verbal torpedoes were directed against the ship of state that he was steering, he knew that as long as men are human and they have human traits, there will be misunderstandings and differences of opinion, but he knew that his objective always was right and good for this organization that has honored him. I have watched him in the harness in Washington. I have watched him with his able worker, Mike Finnan, make the rounds of Congressmen's offices, appearing before the committees, representing your viewpoint, carrying out the mandates of this and every other convention honestly and without fear of contradiction from any man, standing up for what he believed to be right.

I at this time salute those two able workers of your organization, President Gainor and Mike Finnan. [Applause and cheers.]

I have always made it a practice, as those of you who have heard me speak before know, never to lose sight of an opportunity in any public address to a group of postal workers to encourage them to strive and strive again for better conditions, and so, as I read President Gainor's report in the letter carriers' magazine, I read of what took place here in Milwaukee 50 years ago when they laid the foundation for this organization, when they set up a program in their agenda, when they said, "We are going to strive to get for letter carriers $100 a month." One hundred dollars a month may sound a little out of place now, but that was the standard wage for which they were striving—a living wage at that time.

It was the beginning of the drive to knock at the doors of Congress and to present the legitimate demands that they always do present, without being in fear or trembling of any political postmaster, of any political President, if you will. Civil service is a fine institution, but civil service must never be used to the point where men's minds are shackled, where their mentalities are suppressed, and they cannot speak openly to benefit their own conditions and that of their fellow men. [Applause.]

Certainly no one wants to have the letter carrier on his beat stopping every 5 minutes talking with the housewife about the election of a town clerk or judge or engaging in promiscuous political activity. Certainly, no one wants to see the clerk at his box, throwing his schemes, become inefficient by discussing partisan politics with his colleague or coworker, but once that day's work is done, once that man comes to the meeting of his branch, he certainly has a right to speak on public questions and local questions. [Applause.] He certainly has a right to speak to the Congressman who represents him. They are only public servants, and he has a right to register his appeals and to lay his appeals before the legislative body, the only body to which he can look for relief.

The last Democratic Postmaster General before the present one goes down in history as not a friend of the postal service. You remember those days when the service was demoralized—and I say this with kindness to the individual who is now departed, but I am relating a historical fact—by the arbitrary attitude of an individual who said, "We are going to effect economies in government at the expense of the postal employees. We are going to put the Post Office Department on a paying basis, pay as you go, if you will." Certainly, anyone who has studied the great Postal Service knows that that is not the philosophy of this great service. The late Clyde Kelly went all over this country preaching that doctrine. [Applause.] Again and again he stood up in the Congress of the United States to destroy that fallacy. Later he was aided by that champion of all champions, Senator JIM MEAD, who again fearlessly proclaimed the proposition that the Post Office Department is based on service and is not a commodity to be sold at a profit; that it is not to be run on a penny-wise, pound-foolish basis. We have been successful in carrying out that philosophy of service.

I think the great American public has a fine feeling toward the Post Office Department. It is the closest of the Federal departments to their firesides. Their contact with their Government is first with the Post Office Department. The letter carrier all over the country is respected by his constituents, by his neighbors. They see in him epitomized the Government itself. They watch his efficiency. They know how, in season and out, in heat or cold, he is doing his duty efficiently, and I say there is no group of men in the entire Federal service who give more efficiency than the post-office employees of Uncle Sam. [Applause.]

I say that with your auxiliary, the strong arm of this organization, you can do great things. You have security, as compared to other groups today, but better still, you want to retain that security. Who knows but that in the next session of Congress, an economy wave may start again? Who knows but that an attempt may be made to inflict the vicious furlough system? Who knows but that a penny-wise, pound-foolish administration of government may be in vogue again, as it was in 1933 for a while when the Economy Act was perfected?

You just can't effect economies in government by destroying the purchasing power of the personnel. It just can't be done. Somehow, big interests seem to think that is the way to do it. Why, I wouldn't doubt but that in a few months those who shout "Balance the Budget," those who say "You are building up an army of indigents on W. P. A.," may come to Congress and point out "Why, if we can hire people for $60 a month on W. P. A., we can certainly cut the letter carrier who gets $2,100 a year, or the post-office clerk who gets a like figure, and bring them down to that starvation wage."

Oh, I say, that's a possibility. I hope that no Member of Congress, no colleague of mine, will ever sponsor such a silly philosophy. [Applause.] I would like to see, and I hope there always will be, the employees of this great service militantly setting a standard for Government employees, setting the high standard that you fought for to date.

Through all the struggles of 50 years, you have had some accomplishments; you have made considerable gains, and those gains have trickled down somehow to the little fellow who is unorganized. Your constant fight for recognition, aided by the great American Federation of Labor, has brought in my opinion, encouragement to the great masses who are now organized in many parts of the country, and to the hundreds of thousands more still unorganized, who ought to be organized for their mutual benefit, for the protection of their wives and families, who believe in collective bargaining [applause], who believe that men must unite and get together to meet the challenge of the machine age that is slowly crushing civilization in this country.

Those are gains that you helped to pioneer; those are gains you may well be proud of now as you sit here in this session 50 years after the pioneers built this organization, and say, "We did something in those last 50 years in the field of labor."

We can sympathize, we can resolve and congratulate organized labor everywhere today, Labor Day, in the progress they have made in our present day and generation. The selfish industrialist today has no place in modern society. He has to meet the issue; he has to recognize that those who toil are part and parcel of a joint enterprise; that they have to share in those profits. He has to insure for those individuals and their families a decent annual living wage—I was proud to see the American Federation of Labor, of which your President Gainor is a vice president, declare in its council meeting in Atlantic City—and probably will reaffirm its statement again in its convention in October—that they are striving now for an annual living wage for all employees. [Applause.] When that day comes—and I hope it does come rapidly—it will dispel the fear that hovers over the homes of hundreds of thousands of families today, of men who are in seasonable work, like the automotive industry, who may work only 4 or 5 months a year, and then after their unemployment compensation has run out, become victims of charity, on the dole, or receive local assistance.

So I believe I am correct in saying that the letter carriers and the postal employees of this country can take a lot of credit for the advancements made by labor up to this year of our Lord 1939. [Applause.]

I want to pay a tribute now to the Postmaster General of the United States. I made a reference to a former Postmaster General, and I may say I made it with a degree of charity, speaking from a historical standpoint only, in an effort to bring before you the distinction between individuals, sometimes, and their respective philosophies. Perhaps I can say better than any man in this country, as a Member of the House Post Office and Post Roads Committee, what I think of the Postmaster General of the United States. He is of my political faith, yet I can disagree with him, and I do disagree with him. There are some things about the New Deal that are screwy, but there are certain substantial things about the New Deal that I do glory in. [Applause.] I glory in the fact that the New Deal made possible collective bargaining in this country by law. [Applause.] I glory in the fact that the New Deal is responsible for a wage and hour bill [applause] that lifts up from serfdom the track walker in Texas who got 19 cents an hour, to at least a minimum of 25 cents an hour; that takes out of industry child labor—wherever it exists—and assures a minimum wage and shorter hours for those who were helpless before this sort of legislation.

Those things I credit the New Deal with, and I am part of that philosophy and go along with it. I am here to say that I can say with truth—because I am at variance with some of the political issues of the New Deal and its chairman, who is the chairman of the Democratic National Committee as well as Postmaster General—that there never was a Postmaster General in the United States who was more efficient, who was more kindly, who was more humane toward employees of the Post Office Department than Jim Farley. [Applause and cheers.] I want to give credit where credit is due—and that is a fact. He has been efficient; he has been a gentleman all the way through. His fine staff of men, the personnel under him, contact our committee daily when we are in session. They contact your national officers and legislative committees. They know full well that what I say is true.

Time will not permit me to go further. I want to review your great parade and experience the thrill that I know your officers will get when they commemorate the memory of those who built this organization. I would like to stay in Milwaukee a long time. I belong to the Consumers' League [laughter and applause]—if you know what I mean. I understand the police force of Milwaukee have issued a standing order throughout the country notifying the police departments elsewhere that if any native of Milwaukee at any time or any place becomes a victim of amnesia [laughter], all they have to do is go out and get a bottle of Schlitz and hold that before him, and after he drinks one bottle he will tell you he is from Milwaukee, and after he drinks two he will tell you his first name. [Laughter.]

I do hope you will have a very enjoyable, successful convention. It has been a pleasure to be here, and I hope when we go back to the next session of Congress we will carry out as far as we are able to the mandate of this convention as expressed by the majority vote when you get into your deliberations within a day or two.

Thank you very much. [Rising applause, cheers.]

Milk in Chicago

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ARTICLE FROM FORTUNE MAGAZINE

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD portions of an article published in the November issue of Fortune magazine on the subject Milk in Chicago.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Fortune for November 1939]

MILK IN CHICAGO—WHEN MEADOWMOOR DAIRIES CUT THE PRICE OF MILK 2 CENTS, THE BOMBS BEGAN TO BURST—THEN CAME THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT WITH CHARGES OF CONSPIRACY

Most Americans know that there is a milk problem. They know it because milk is continually in the news and the news is always bad. It is of farmers who, having milked the American cow, proceed to dump her product into the country lanes in fierce milk strikes. It is of racketeering unions who upset milk-delivery wagons in the city streets. It is of endless investigations into the Milk Trust, wherein the National Dairy Products Corporation and the Borden Co. are damned for manipulating the prices of milk and milk products to the benefit of their shareholders. But behind the headlines in the news Americans know there is a milk problem in a very practical and specific sense. They know that whereas the farmer gets between 3 and 5 cents for his milk they are asked to pay from 9 to 16 cents for it. They know that this is neither equitable to the farmer nor to the consumer. American ingenuity and American business have a long record of bringing products such as the automobile and the radio and a hundred other marvels to an ever larger public. But in the case of the basic commodity milk it might be said that the last great landmark seems to have been back in 1893, when pasteurization came into use. Since then, to be sure, there have been many advances in providing a clean milk supply. But the problem of low-price mass distribution remains unsolved. Between 1926 and 1936, indeed, the per capita consumption of milk dropped by 3 percent.

Because the milk business is so antediluvian when compared to other departments of American industry, it would seem that there should be easy and simple remedies. Yet the inquirer into the problem of milk is well advised to proceed with some amount of caution. A quart of milk delivered at the doorstep—cold and white and pure—should be easy to understand. It has been squirted into a pail by the hands of a farmer or by a milking machine. It has been transported by train or truck to the city where it is pasteurized and bottled.

There is nothing in all this that is not A B C to the average intelligence. But the economics of milk as opposed to its physical production is not simple. The very subject of milk pricing, the manner in which a subsidiary of National Dairy Products Corporation decides to charge the consumer 14 cents for a quart of milk, involves one in an Alice's Wonderland of accounting practice and a metaphysics all its own. But quite aside from the technicalities, the subject of milk is complex, because it leads out into about every problem connected with the American economy. On the one hand, a quart of milk packages in itself the entire farm problem. On the other hand, it poses that central problem of American business—the recurrent problem of whether Americans want a free competitive economy or a price-regulated, monopolistic economy.

It is that particular question which it is well to have in mind in any discussion of milk and milk pricing. But so big and so complex is the milk business that we shall here consider it in two different ways. In the article that appears on page 83 the reader will find a discussion of some of the larger problems of the dairy business and a practical suggestion as to how milk might be brought to the consumer cheaper. Here we shall be looking at a specific city to see how the forces operate that today tend to keep the price of milk so high. Those forces form a pattern, and they might be seen as readily in terms of New York, or Philadelphia, or Boston, or San Francisco, or almost any large American metropolis. But one city above all others invites study, and that city is Chicago. Not only has Chicago milk been subject to prolonged Federal investigation—an investigation that ended in 1938 in the indictment of practically everyone of prominence in its milk business—but the record of Chicago, although fairly typical in its outlines, has produced some shocking extremes. For here it turns out that the one company that has tried to make money by getting milk to the consumer at low prices has had to fight labor, big business, and the Department of Agriculture itself.

That fight constitutes the story of Chicago milk in recent years, but before coming to it it is well to reconnoiter the terrain where it occurred.

There are today about 140 dealers who pasteurize or distribute milk in Chicago. Of these about 42 get all of their milk via the Pure Milk Association, the rest from outside farm cooperatives; but the 42 distribute about 75 percent of the city's total supply. About 50 percent of all Chicago's milk is handled by two large companies. The biggest is the conservative, family-controlled Bowman Dairy Co., which is headed by taciturn Dr. D. B. Peck, but still largely owned by the Bowman family. Last year it did a business of about $26,000,000, of which about $15,000,000 was in fluid-milk and cream sales, the balance in dried milk and other manufactured products, on which it makes all of its profits. The second-largest distributor in Chicago is Borden-Wieland, a kicked-about division of the Borden Co., which last year did a $15,000,000 business, largely in fluid-milk and cream sales. It has been losing about $300,000 a year since 1923, largely owing to the fact that it makes no profitable manufactured products, and is the headache of the Borden management.

Yet it is with a chiseler that the modern story of Chicago's milk really begins, and his tactics have loosened up the tight relations of farmers, dealers, and labor that we have outlined above. The name of the chiseler is W. R. Schaub. And the name of his company is the Meadowmoor Dairies, whose headquarters are in the heart of Chicago's tough West Side, just off Maxwell Street, that half-black, half-white thoroughfare where the pushcart venders sell anything from vegetables to second-hand girdles.

He has broken just about every rule there is in the milk game, both in getting his supply and distributing his product. In his relations with farmers, Schaub disregarded the normal method of payment obtaining in the Chicago area and in most great milksheds. This is the classified or multi-price system. Stripped of its technicalities, this system means that a farmer is paid one price for the milk that a distributor uses in fluid form, another price for milk used for cream, and another price for "surplus" milk that is used for evaporated milk, butter, cheese, and other manufactured products. The actual price received by the farmer is a blend or weighted average of all of these. Thus in December 1930, when prices were high in the Chicago market, farmers in the Pure Milk Association received $2.67 per hundredweight (5.6 cents per quart) for class 1 milk, $1.29 for milk for cream, $1.07 for surplus, and the average or blend worked out to $2.44.

When Schaub came into the market in 1933 the depression had driven prices far below these levels. Farmers were frantic and were selling their milk for any price they could get at roadside stands. So hectic did conditions become that during the summer of 1933 Secretary Wallace, acting under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, stepped in to try to stabilize prices. In November, or about the time Schaub's operations began in earnest, the price of class 1 milk was pegged at $2.10 per hundredweight (4.5 cents per quart) and in that month farmers received a blend price of $1.83. The A. A. A. agreement also attempted to peg the consumer price of milk at 12 cents.

Schaub, along with other independents, fought the agreement in court, and meanwhile, in defiance of the Department of Agriculture, bargained with his farmers on a much less complicated basis. He guaranteed them a flat price of $1.85 per hundredweight, or about 4 cents per quart for all of their milk no matter how used. His farmers were glad to get this price, since it was slightly better than the blend price for milk that other farmers were receiving. Obviously he had a considerable advantage costwise over the bigger dealers who, if they lived up to the agreement, had to pay 4.5 cents a quart for their fluid milk.

Meanwhile Schaub was breaking unwritten laws in other directions. Back in 1932 Meadowmoor had adopted a system of distribution known as the vendor or peddler system. Under this system instead of employing milk drivers, Meadowmoor sold its milk for cash off its platform. Here it was picked up by vendors who then peddled it along their own milk routes. Most of these vendors had been former employees of the large companies and members of 753, but had been laid off in the depression. They bought trucks and went to work for themselves for whatever living they could make. On this system they could deliver Meadowmoor milk for 1 cent under the big companies.

Schaub took over this system but adapted it to store sales, and by means of the stores established larger savings in costs. Whereas a driver or a vendor can deliver only about 300 quarts of milk per day to the home, he can deliver about 1,000 or more quarts to stores, since he sells in larger quantities and makes fewer stops. Getting his milk from his farmers for 4 cents, Schaub sold it off the Meadowmoor platform for 6. The vendor delivered to the store for roughly 7, and the store sold it for about 8½ cents. This was 3½ cents below the price of Bowman and Borden milk. They soon had to come down, but Schaub has usually kept 2 cents under their delivered price.

In the beginning big stores would not handle Meadowmoor milk, and the company had to induce small independents to enter the field. In a single week during 1933 Schaub claims that one of his drivers helped start 10 or a dozen small shops. The whole method of store mechandising was hateful to Local 753, because store sales mean fewer drivers. While Chicago dealers had always had some store sales, they had never pushed them hard. A storekeeper is a far more changeable person and a far shrewder bargainer than is a housewife, and many a storekeeper treats with 3 or 4 companies at once playing one off against the other. It was not, indeed, until 1938 that Borden and Bowman milk was sold in stores at 2 cents under the price charged on their delivery routes.

THE STRIKE

Schaub got his first taste of the wrath of the organized interests of Chicago during the milk strike of January 1934—just 3 months after he took over. The strike was touched off when the Department of Agriculture gave up its first milk-marketing code as a bad job. Immediately the officials of Pure Milk and the big Chicago dealers met to try to reach a price agreement of their own. The dealers, pressed by competition from Meadowmoor and other independents, demanded a reduction in the price of milk paid to farmers. The Pure Milk Association refused. The strike was called on January 6, and 3 days later the tie-up was nearly complete.

Nevertheless, a few independents, among them Meadowmoor, decided to run the blockade. They had a stormy time of it. Along the country roads armies of irate farmers marched to and fro, dumping milk trucks, stopping trains, and puncturing milk tanks. In the city, members of Local 753—temporarily thrown out of work and hating the "guts" of the independents anyway—did their bit. In a single night half a dozen trucks were dumped into the Chicago River. The big dairies could do little to stop the fracas. The independents, however, were quick to interpret the strike as a gang-up against them.

For this they had reason. The Pure Milk Association stated that the strike had three purposes: (1) To get the Federal marketing agreement reestablished; (2) to keep distributors from hammering down prices; (3) to drive the cut-rate dairies out of business. In an embattled statement the independents blurted out to the papers: "Developments which are now apparent to everyone indicate collusion by the Milk Trust to put the independents out of business. * * * The independents insist that public demand make necessary the continuance of the cash-and-carry milk store. The public is entitled to milk at the lowest possible price."

The strike, the worst in Chicago's history, was finally called off on January 11, and before the month was out the Department of Agriculture was back in the market with a second marketing code, which lasted until March 1935, when the Department again withdrew. Schaub disregarded the second marketing order as he had the first, and continued to pay his farmers on a flat price basis. Meanwhile his store method of selling continued under heavy attack, until finally Meadowmoor Dairies got out an injunction against Local 753 prohibiting picketing and violence. Appeals have kept it in and out of the courts ever since. The case reveals a long and bitter record.

THE INDICTMENTS

Such is the stuff out of which the lawsuit of Meadowmoor Dairies v. Local 753 is written. But the suit was not to remain simply the quarrel of a cut-rate dairy company and a union, for it was undoubtedly the reverberations of the case that led Assistant Attorney General Thurman Arnold to give the Chicago milk situation a long and searching inquiry during 1937. The investigation resulted in grand jury indictments returned in 1938 against just about everyone of any prominence in the industry from President D. B. Peck of the Bowman Dairy Co. and Charles L. Dressel, president of Borden-Wieland, to Mr. Fitchie and Mr. Sumner of the union. The indictments charged that between 1935 and 1937 a conspiracy existed to fix prices in the area to producers and to consumers and to keep independents out of the market. Pure Milk and the big distributors, so the charges ran, fixed the prices. Pure Milk then refused to sell to anyone not adhering to them; the dealers in their turn made it tough for chiselers through their control of the Milk Dealers' Bottle Exchange, which refused to return bottles to independents. Local 753, it was charged, chipped in with acts of violence, and finally the Board of Health discriminated against producers and distributors not adhering to the price scheme.

The Government's case has not been tried and the evidence is still locked up in the safe of Leo Tierney, the government prosecutor. Certainly it opens up new vistas. Dr. Bundesen, for example, has always been fair to Meadowmoor, according to Schaub, and his troubles come from a different direction. Back in 1933, as we have already noted, he made it difficult for independent farmers to get adequate inspection. More recently he has been under attack for his dubious role in the failure of Chicago to allow paper milk containers to be used in the city. The Mayor Kelly milk ordinance of 1935 makes it mandatory that milk be sold in bottled form and this has been interpreted to mean glass. At present both the American Can Co. and the Ex-Cell-O Corporation and an independent dairy, Fieldcrest, have suits against the city to force it to allow containers. Dr. Bundesen says the whole matter is up to the city council. But the pressures on the city council are obvious. Distributors have a big investment in bottling equipment and labor knows full well that paper containers tend to facilitate store sales.

The Government's case has not come to trial because last summer the indictments were quashed by Federal Judge Charles E. Woodward, reinforced by a remarkable opinion. The opinion held that an antitrust suit will not stand up in the case of the marketing of milk because the Sherman Act has here been completely abrogated by the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act, which was passed in 1937 to supersede the A. A. A. As interpreted by the judge the act makes the Secretary of Agriculture solely responsible for the manner in which milk products are marketed in every shed of the country. "The Sherman Act," said the judge, "embodied the philosophy of unrestrained competition. Later legislation has embodied the philosophy of collectivism and harmful competition."

THE PAY-OFF

Judge Woodward's are weighty words and happen to be prophetic. Mr. Arnold has taken his case up to the Supreme Court, but meanwhile the forces of collectivism are hard at work in the Chicago area. For this summer the Department of Agriculture moved in with a third marketing order at the instance of a majority of the farmers, dominated by a tremendous vote of the Pure Milk Association. The new order will cut directly across Meadowmoor's tactics of paying a flat price for its milk, arrived at by independent bargaining. It will force every dairy in the shed to report monthly on how it has sold its milk—its net effect will be to make every dealer pay precisely the same price for milk going into fluid use. It will take away from Meadowmoor the competitive advantage we have noted it enjoyed over its larger rivals in the matter of its milk supply. The order is disconcerting to Schaub, especially as many of his own farmers voted for it. "They brought it in, now let them see how they like it," he says. He is bitterly opposed to it both because it will cut down on profits and because business to him means open bargaining. He sees no more reason why he should be told how to buy his milk than why he should be restricted in his manner of selling it.

His is a fair question. Here is a small company that, in the course of 6 years, has built up sales of $2,000,000 during the time that Bowman and Borden have both seen a decline in their sales volume. Here is also a company that has done something that older companies have not been able to do—make a profit on fluid-milk sales. And here finally is a company that for a profit has reduced the price of milk to the public. Yet it has met the opposition of labor, the scorn of larger companies, and again faces the Government itself.

So far as the Government is concerned, Meadowmoor faces a losing fight. The American dairy farmer is no longer a competitive animal, and, living in an industrial world, probably cannot afford to be. Mr. Schaub's method of payment to his farmers had the virtue of simplicity, but it is also well to note that he profited by it only because a huge bloc of farmers in the area was trying to enforce a different scheme. Whether their system is better or not would lead far into the realm of milk pricing—"from whose bourne no traveler returns"—and to no purpose. A majority of farmers voted for the agreement, and Mr. Schaub is going to have to abide by it.

So far as Mr. Schaub's distributive methods are concerned, he has a great deal on his side. It is charged that Meadowmoor sweats its labor, and it is unquestionably true that Meadowmoor venders work longer hours than do the members of Local 753. But the vender system of distribution is not the important part of Meadowmoor's technique. The important thing is that the company has aggressively pushed and dramatized the cut-rate method of store distribution. This method has spread in Chicago until at present about 50 per cent of the business of Borden and Bowman is of this kind. But, as the article on page 83 shows, this method of selling milk might be pushed much further if the chain stores took a larger hand in it. For already they have shown that in some cases it is possible to pay the farmer 5 cents for his milk and sell it for 9.

But the significance of Meadowmoor does not lie entirely in results achieved. The significance lies precisely in that epithet that is most often heard hurled at Schaub's head, the word "chiseler." Schaub has been a "chiseler." He has even broken the law. But the "chiseler" and nonconformist has his virtues. For a dozen years the large dealers have declared themselves to be in a jam. They have pointed to the demands of the farmer on the one side and the demands from labor on the other, and, having given that defense of rigid milk prices, have felt vindicated and gone their way. Occasionally there arises a small company that, not too scrupulous as to its means, shows that something can be done, and does it. And, like a sputtering match which throws light over a room and reveals its shapes and outline, such a company illuminates an industry. The milk business needs such illumination, and the light defines the two alternatives that now seem open: Either the industry will drift until it is made an outright public utility or the big units will reduce prices and return to the competitive wars with some faith that they are worth winning.

Agricultural Exports and Imports

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, while the farmers' markets are being bartered away under the trade-agreement program, I feel that the record of agricultural exports and imports should be kept current, therefore I am inserting a table covering a 9-month period.

Agricultural exports, imports, and trade balances, 9 months ending September 1938 and 1939

Agricultural products	9 months ending September—		Increase (+), decrease (−)
	1938	1939
Total agricultural:
Exports	$602,674,000	$418,441,000	−$184,233,000
Imports	711,647,000	794,700,000	+83,053,000
Import balance	108,973,000	376,259,000	+267,286,000
Total trade	1,314,321,000	1,213,141,000	−101,180,000
AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS
Cotton, unmanufactured	160,550,000	121,964,000	−38,586,000
Tobacco, unmanufactured	92,822,000	61,317,000	−31,505,600
Foodstuffs (total)	331,369,000	216,604,000	−114,765,000
Corn	86,890,000	12,253,000	−74,637,000
Wheat	70,410,000	34,199,000	−36,211,000
Wheat flour	17,790,000	18,534,000	+744,000
Oil cake and meal	6,929,000	6,595,000	−334,000
Vegetables [1]	9,824,000	11,863,000	+2,039,000
Fruits [1]	62,509,000	57,040,000	−5,469,000
Meat products	21,048,000	24,392,000	+3,344,000
Lard [1]	13,587,000	15,397,000	+1,810,000
Dairy products [2]	4,429,000	5,104,000	+675,000
Other foodstuffs	37,953,000	31,227,000	−6,726,000
Other agricultural products	17,933,000	18,556,000	+623,000
Total agricultural exports	602,674,000	418,441,000	−184,233,000

[1] Fresh, dried, and canned.
[2] Except fresh milk.
Source: U. S. Department of Commerce figures (Oct. 26, 1939).

The Relief Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, now that the House and Senate have acted on the neutrality measure, the most important matter which faces Members of Congress is the working out of some of our all-important domestic problems. Let me say right here that I believe the Congress should remain in session if for no other reason than to provide some relief for the millions of unemployed and needy in our country.

One year ago this time approximately 135,000 persons were working on W. P. A. in Massachusetts. During the past year this number has been cut to 73,000, causing untold misery and distress. I have been told that 3 weeks ago there were on file in the W. P. A. Massachusetts headquarters at Boston more than 100,000 certifications of those in need for these 73,000 jobs. Mind you, each and every one of these 100,000 persons have been declared as needy and eligible for relief.

Under the present law, those employed on W. P. A. for 18 months or more are forced to take a 30-day lay-off. With reference to this 30-day lay-off group in Massachusetts it has been estimated that 90 percent of those dropped from the rolls are striving to be reinstated, being compelled to do so because of the absolute impossibility of their securing work elsewhere.

Many of those included in the quota-reduction groups—those persons who were laid off in May and June because of dwindling appropriations—have been reinstated, taking the places of those later laid off under the 18-month rule. A few newly certified cases also received assignments to projects. It can readily be seen, therefore, that the greater portion of those laid off under the 18-month rule cannot be reassigned and at the same time private industry has made provisions for but very few. I am told that the point has been reached in Massachusetts where it is impossible for the officials to grant an assignment to one person until another is laid off under the 18-month rule, dies, or quits the W. P. A. of his or her own volition.

Hardly a day passes that I do not find attached to the pleas of these unemployed ample evidence of their eligibility, distress, and plight in the form of rent bills, doctors' bills, notices advising gas and electricity are to be shut off, pawn tickets, and other such proofs.

All sorts of cases can be cited. It is pitiful when a man with a pawn ticket for his suit of clothes, on which he received $2, cannot get any help. I have another case of a woman with four children, all of school age. Formerly on a sewing project, she was dropped under the 18 months' rule and has now been unable to secure any income for 8 or 9 weeks; her husband was recently taken to a State hospital and she has received an eviction notice effective in a week. A special plea has been made in her behalf, but the harassed W. P. A. officials could only reply that the quota is filled and that they will endeavor to do the best they can in her behalf.

It is no exaggeration to say that it is common for me to receive from eligibles threats of suicide because of their desperation and destitution.

All of these conditions, Mr. Speaker, have been caused by the failure of this Congress to appropriate sufficient funds to care for our needy citizens, who surely have a greater claim upon the Congress than the insurance companies and banks which we rescued a few years ago from potential bankruptcy. To my mind, the greatest danger our country faces is not from without but from within—from those driven to desperation by the unwillingness of Congress to properly provide for their temporary needs.

The appropriations committee on deficiencies will, I understand, meet within the next few weeks. Why not now? Congress could very properly ask the deficiency committee to meet early next week and report within a few days a deficiency appropriation which would permit of our providing funds for the needy. Personally, I sincerely trust that every Member of the House will vote against adjourning this session of Congress until we have shown our interest in the welfare of our people by appropriating sufficient funds to provide shelter, clothing, and food for those of our citizens in real need.

In addition to the ten or twelve million people unemployed, Members of the Congress should bear in mind and consider the plight of the 15,000,000 American school and college graduates, a large percentage of whom have never yet been privileged to find employment. To my mind immediate consideration should be given to providing some means whereby these school and college graduates, many of whom made many sacrifices to obtain an education, will be privileged to place their talents at work. Surely young America, as well as other Americans, is deserving of consideration on the part of the Congress.

Twenty-first Convention of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT THOMAS
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY, OF OHIO

Mr. THOMAS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, I include therein the following speech by the Honorable MARTIN L. SWEENEY, of Ohio, which was delivered before the Twenty-first Convention of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, held in Houston, Tex., September 6, 1939:

Mr. Toastmaster, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, at the outset I want to extend to you the greetings of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives. I also want to extend to you the greetings of the chairman, Congressman MILTON ROMJUE. He asked me to make this personal statement to you: That due to unforeseen circumstances he was prevented from being here tonight. I am sure if he were here you would extend to him a very hospitable greeting, because he is a very fine Member of Congress; a worker in your behalf for many years in his long term of service on that committee. If you will permit me to indulge, I would like at this time to pay a tribute to the man who represents this city in Congress—this district—the Honorable ALBERT THOMAS, who is on his way by boat, but will not be here until Friday. He is a splendid type of American, a good legislator, and a good friend of the post-office employees. [Applause.] He always comes to our aid when we appeal to him in behalf of legislation affecting your interest.

I want to extend my congratulations now, lest I forget, to this convention in its action today in making unanimous the election of the "Big Four," as we call them, which insures their return to Washington again. From my contact with them in the past 8 or 9 years in Washington, I know of no greater group, a more sincere group, or a more modest group, if you will, than your splendid chairman, Leo George, Bill Horner, Bill Otte, and Johnny Torka. They are not the belligerent type of lobbyists or legislative agents; they reflect credit to your organization. Sometimes they don't get what they want, but always with a smile and always with a gentlemanly attitude they present their legitimate demands. It is well that you should place your confidence in men of that type. It is well that you should remember that Leo George was fired from his Government position for his activities in behalf of your organization.

It is well for the younger members to bear in mind that he was suspended for speaking out and exercising his constitutional right to speak out as an employee of the Post Office Department on matters concerning the welfare of the employees at a time when it was dangerous in the city of Chicago, and in the Nation, some years back. That is all history to the older members. I always take the occasion, whenever I speak to a group of postal employees, be it in some obscure hamlet or in a metropolitan center, to encourage you to stand up like Americans always for your constitutional rights, always remembering that you are civil-service employees; that the Government expects and does get from you a certain degree of efficiency in return for the security wage they pay you, and in return for the benefits that you have in serving Uncle Sam; but no Congress, no executive, has the right to foreclose your voice or your lips from speaking out as American citizens on any fundamental question that affects the welfare of you and your fellow citizens and your family. Of course, that doesn't mean that the letter carriers as a group can engage in a political argument with the corner grocery man, or that the clerks can stop arbitrarily and discuss politics, or discuss the ball game, or anything of that kind with his fellow clerks to the detriment of the Service. You don't do that, because you are highly trained, but once you take off that uniform, if you are a carrier, and once you leave the post office, if you are a clerk, and you go to your branch meetng or you participate in matters concerning your welfare and that of your families and your Nation, you are exercising your constitutional rights, and no man, no power, no Congress, can ever take that away from you. [Applause.]

I am glad to bring you the greetings of the great convention that is being held in Milwaukee. Your fellow workers are having a splendid convention celebrating their golden jubilee of organization. Theirs is a historical convention. They are having a great time up there. They picked a good town in which to have a good time. [Applause.]

I was up there the other day and the only complaint I have to register is that some of us who were invited to be guest speakers, like Jesse Donaldson, representatives of the Post Office Department, some of the Congressmen, Senator MEAD, and others, had to fly back and forth to make both conventions. You don't give us much chance to even get beered up in Milwaukee; that is, those of us who are members of the consumers' league. We ought to have time to finish up in Milwaukee, then get rested up and take a plane down here to the Lone Star State, and, if we so desire, to get "oiled up" down here. [Laughter.] I don't think your convention is going to take any action about changing the date of your convention. I have been thinking seriously of talking turkey to the President. You know he has control of Thanksgiving Day now. [Laughter.] He has advanced Thanksgiving a week. I am going to make a plea to Mr. Roosevelt the first time I meet him and see if he won't issue a proclamation spacing these conventions about 2 weeks apart, so that we Congressmen won't have to be flying back and forth to keep engagements.

The convention that I am privileged to attend here is significant to me because it marks my first visit to the Lone Star State and completes now my record of being in every State in the Union. [Applause.] I am visibly affected by the atmosphere, the environment of this metropolitan city of the South. Its real hospitality and friendly atmosphere almost meets you everywhere you go. It is a typical American city, like a giant stretching and expanding, destined, I believe, to be one of the greatest cities in the world. The committee in charge of this convention is doing a splendid job to make the visit of everybody here a pleasant one. I want to register my personal thanks to your local committee for the fine work they have done in making this, a great convention, the success that it is. [Applause.]

I was buttonholed out on the street this morning by some of the delegates. They got hold of me and said, "You are going to talk tonight, and we want you to put in a plug for a certain town east of the Rockies that wants the convention." "What town is that?" I asked. "That is Cincinnati," "Well, how can I put in a plug like that?" They said, "Well, you can say this, can't you; that on your way to Houston you passed through Cincinnati. Tell the convention that." [Laughter.] Then I walked down the street, and another gang buttonholed me and said, "We understand you are going to talk tonight and we want you to put in a plug for St. Louis." "How can I do that?" I asked. [Laughter, applause.] Then they said: "Well you can tell the audience that on your way home you are going to pass through St. Louis." So I am between the devil and the deep blue sea, and the only way I can square myself is to go out for the golf tournament and take sides with an open mind.

CONDEMNS FALSE ECONOMY

We have just finished the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, and I am just going to take a moment to talk about that. Perhaps it will not go down in history as some of the previous sessions will, or have gone, with its record of advancement of legislation that affects your group, but we did make some gains, and we did recognize the fact that we wanted to get legislation through that would escape a veto, possibly, and make a steady gain. I should say the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House is a nonpartisan committee. It is a splendid group of gentlemen who are actuated only in serving the Government and serving the great employees of the Post Office Department; they reached the conclusion that we were going to hold the line in this session of Congress. We were not going to allow any false economy or false philosophy to penetrate the deliberation of that body. In other words, we were not going to permit wage cuts at a time when we thought it was dangerous; we were not going to follow the penny-wise pound-foolish administrators of government at this or any other time, who think that is the way to save money and effect economies—by wage cuts.

Many of us are still on the committee who remember the rigid Economy Act of 1933 that unbalanced the budget of every poor postal employee and made no material gain for the country. It caused hardships in the homes of countless thousands of postal employees, and, as you all know, every vestige of that was repealed in 18 months. So this committee was determined not to have a repetition of that again, and I say to that we have been successful. There was no attempt at a furlough; there was no attempt to cut wages; and gains heretofore made by the allied postal groups of the country are safe. And, so far as I am concerned—and I think it is true of the other members of the committee—they will be safe for a long time to come. [Applause.]

We passed the substitute bill; we made some progress. Perhaps this measure was not the kind of bill all of us would have agreed upon, but we did meet the objections of the Comptroller General, who ruled that the substitutes were not employees of the Post Office Department, even though they paid into the retirement fund, and were compelled to report every day. Now we have a law that declares that they are part of the Post Office Department; they are employees. Substitutes are given their annual leave and sick leave under proper rules set up by the Department, which are now published. If it needs any correction, that can be made next session of Congress.

Let me say in passing, I want to pay tribute to the fine part your organization played in passing that substitute bill, the splendid cooperation of your legislative agent, Bill Horner; Leo George, your president; and others down the line; and the fine presentation made by the charming lady who is the head of your auxiliary, who appeared before the committee, Mrs. Herman Lowe [applause], who went out courageously on behalf of the wives, families, and children of the substitutes in the Postal Service. I say it is a good omen, it is a fine sign, to have your auxiliary leaders come before a committee and present the women's viewpoint, the wife's viewpoint, the mother's viewpoint, the housewife's viewpoint, the woman who has to balance her budget, and tell the committee just what is in the minds of their membership. So I take my hat off to you, Mrs. Lowe, for the fine presentation you made on that occasion.

I also take this opportunity to pay tribute to one of the finest public servants that I have ever had the pleasure of knowing in my congressional career for the last 8 or 9 years, a man who goes out of his way, not only to assist your legislative agents, but also Members of Congress, bringing the experience of 33 years to our doorstep, to we younger Members of Congress the supreme knowledge that he has. A career man, a man who is outstanding in the service of the Post Office Department, doing a good job for his country, doing a good job for his Government, coming down before the committees of the House and Senate, making his presentation according to his conscience and according to his lights as affecting his Government and the welfare of the employees, and who aided us splendidly in our substitute legislation when we had to make compromises—I refer to our friend who is here tonight, Jesse Donaldson, of the Post Office Department. [Applause.]

So, outside of the substitute bill, the abandonment of Saturday in the computation of time for annual leave—and that was a step in the right direction—again your organization played a prominent part in that, by assisting the committee and by assisting the Members of Congress in voting for that measure.

TAKE PRIDE IN YOUR AFFILIATION

The most important thing, to my way of thinking, is the affiliation of this organization with the great group known as the American Federation of Labor. [Applause.] I take no part in the controversy that is known to all of us that now exists, the division that exists among the leadership of the ranks of labor in this country. I hope to God it is settled; I hope to God there is an adjustment made in the near future; because, if not, this breach only satisfies the selfish industrialist, the class who never measures up to his responsibilities and who not only characterizes but interprets the man who works for him as a chattel. They follow the old axiom of the Napoleons and Caesars of old, "Divide and conquer." They alone may benefit by this division. You are affiliated with a great branch of this labor group, and I can only speak from experience as one who was an officer in that organization for 10 years, and as one who carried membership in that organization; as one who watched its progress during the past 35 years, and familiar with the gains accomplished.

It was a happy thing to know that the Federation of Post Office Clerks and the Letter Carriers of the country, the national associations, are part and parcel of the great American Federation of Labor. The American Federation of Labor has marched shoulder to shoulder with your legislative agents in every critical battle in Washington. They aided you in the days when Congressman Reilly started the 8-hour law referred to by the distinguished Third Assistant Postmaster General. They aided you back in the days of the 44-hour bill, and again under the leadership of JIM MEAD, when the 40-hour bill was passed. The American Federation of Labor went on record in their convention, notified their members, and put out a campaign by letter and telegram and by personal appeal to the Members of Congress. They gave us great support when those measures were under consideration. So I hail this as a gain, to be affiliated with an organization like that, and I know your membership will grow and it will be gaining strength because not only of the friendship but also the attachment of this organization with the American Federation of Labor.

We have an obligation in this day and age, and I am not going to discuss national affairs very much tonight; it has been discussed already. I think we all know the temper of the people of the Nation. In this room, probably 80 percent of the audience here assembled have a vivid recollection of that last World War. Many of them are men who carried the musket and went across to Flanders Field, who slept in vermin-infested trenches, who came back with weakened lungs from gas, poison gas; and other physical injuries. Others have children who went over there; youngsters, 21 and 22 years of age, who never came back. This is a time to be calm, but it is also a time to remember that the President of the United States has asked us to be neutral, but not in thought.

We have a right to think, as he said, and we can't control the thinking apparatus of anybody, but we should not give any false expression that might stir up anybody. With the recollections of that last World War fresh in our memory in these critical days, we want this country to go forward toward a solution of our domestic problems. We have our own domestic war on our own hands. The tragedy that we have seen as Members of Congress for the past 4 or 5 or 6 years is appalling. When I recite to you—and I think I can give you the experience of most Members of Congress in metropolitan centers—that I have to talk to a hundred persons each day, a hundred citizens who come to me crying for an opportunity to work on W. P. A.; college men, laborers, lawyers, doctors, who under our dislocated economic social system want to support their families, and are glad to get $60 a month, now cut down to $59 per month in some of the metropolitan centers on the W. P. A. That is not a living wage. Stand out, you Federated Post Office Clerks, for a change in this economic system and see that the W. P. A. worker, your brother, is brought up near the level that you enjoy today, that he may get a living wage. [Applause.] Assist the industrial worker who works in the factory and on the railroad, in the commercial activities of our country; assist him in his struggle now, sponsored by the American Federation of Labor, to insure to him an American annual living wage; assist in taking the fear out of the homes of these people, people who work where they are able to work in industry, 4 and 5 months in a year of seasonal activity, literally strapped to the lever of a machine in the mass-production practice of our land. You see them as you go through those factories. Men are picked because of their muscles, their sinew. No man over 45 is called for employment—selfish industrialists want the cream of muscle and sinew. We have to meet the challenge of the machine age. It is part of your duty, part of mine as a public official, part of our duty to speak out. Let the chips fall where they may.

I am not a hundred-percent new dealer. I think some of the New Deal measures are screwy. That is the only way I can put it. [Laughter and applause.] But I say this: That the part of the New Deal program, if it is called New Deal, attempting to salvage humanity, has been unmatched by any administration. [Applause.] That feature of the New Deal that gives consideration to suffering humanity, prevents starvation, that puts clothing on naked citizens, that gives shelter to those who have no shelter—that is justice; the kind of justice that God Almighty expects of a government. It took courage in the face of a lot of criticism to even go that far under our capitalistic system. I do acclaim these advances. That program I do support. There can be no balancing of the Budget when we have 12,000,000 men out of work; there can be no balancing of the Budget when we have bread lines of individuals forming every day to get surplus-commodity food to supplement their meager relief budget or starvation wage on W. P. A. There can be no progress in this country when little children are deprived of the natural food that they need.

MAKE PEACE IN DOMESTIC WAR

We talk about the last World War and we see each day the stream of humanity passing before us; veterans with their limbs off, their health shattered; men 42 or 45 now; and we feel sorry for them. A kind government gives them a pension; a kind government gives them a preference for work. But we haven't started to compile the tragedies that are yet to come in this domestic war of ours today. I mean the casualties that will result from the tremendous loss of life, when thousands of children who for the past 5 or 6 years have been deprived of the kind of food that contains the necessary vitamins to build up sturdy systems, who have been living on cabbage and prunes and potatoes—the only variation next day being potatoes, cabbage, and prunes. That is not the kind of food that they are entitled to today; when these youngsters get to be 16 or 17 they are not going to have resistance to ward off tuberculosis and other diseases; they are going to fall by the wayside; there is going to be a tremendous increase in the mortality rate in the very near future.

That is the tragedy of this period we are going through. We can help—yes—by cooperating together. Pay no attention to the calamity howlers. I say to those who call themselves "rugged individualists," who would go back to the laissez faire of 25 or 30 years ago, "That day is over; we have got to march forward now." And by the same token I say let's concentrate on this domestic war in this country and not on any fight across the sea that doesn't belong to us, nor is of our creation. [Applause.]

To explain just what I think about that over there, I will probably have to tell Senator JIM MEAD's story to make myself clear. JIM MEAD tells a story about the fellow who was in the barber shop getting a shave, and he had a white apron around him. He was lying back in the chair, with his face all lathered with soap, and the barber ready to shave him. He heard a fire engine going down the street, sirens blowing. About that time a little street urchin stuck his head into the barber-shop door and hollered, "Shultz's home is on fire; Shultz's house is on fire." The fellow jumped out of the chair and rushed down the street, apron flying in the breeze, soap all over his face. He ran about seven city blocks and then stopped and said, "What the hell am I running for? My name ain't Shultz." [Laughter.] Shultz's home is on fire. We probably sympathize because of the Shultz fire abroad, but we didn't start the fire. It is not our house. We can sympathize with them in what is going on over there, and we can sympathize tonight when human beings of German and Polish blood engage in mortal combat over an imaginary boundary line in the so-called Free City of Danzig. If those warring factions could come to a free city like Houston, Tex., to bask in the sunshine of Texas; to breathe the free air of America; to understand how people can live in harmony in this great Lone Star State and every other State in the Union, they might take a lesson from the solidarity of America, a nation of all bloods, all creeds, all phases of humanity, all shades of political beliefs, who get together and understand each other and treat each other as members of a common brotherhood. We wish for them that opportunity, but I am afraid it is too late. I am afraid we will just have to wait for results and be guided accordingly.

This has been a great convention. I shall carry from it pleasant memories, and I want to express my thanks to the committee for inviting me to come here. I may say to you that I go back to the next Congress fortified with the knowledge that we have made no mistakes; that the thing to do is to legislate and legislate and legislate some more, always having the objective in mind to better your condition and not to pull down the other fellow.

I don't doubt but that in the future some of the classes or groups that I referred to before may sponsor an economy drive, may say to the Government: "Why, you have kept 4,000,000 people alive on $60 a month. You are paying too much when you give a clerk $2,100 a year or $1,800 a year. The fellow in the factory doesn't get that. Come on down to the selfish industrialists' level, Uncle Sam." That may happen. So I say you are justified in watching legislation day in and day out, all the time, striving to get not only for yourselves more and more security, to hold what you have, but helping to improve that other fellow, that $60-a-month Government employee, if you will, not civil service, who does not have the security you have; retirement benefits, annual leave, sick leave—those fine benefits you have today. He is your brother. He is your fellow American; we have got to lift him up, and at the same time elevate your own position higher and higher. By doing that you will bring him up in proportion. That has been the philosophy of the American Federation of Labor. It has been your philosophy from the start, so I greet you and say, "Keep it up." It is the only sane, sensible way to go forward as a militant organization of Federal employees. [Great applause.]

Facts Versus Folklore—An Adventure in Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. T. V. SMITH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS BY JOSEPHINE WILKINS, OF ATLANTA, GA.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I, as a reconstructed rebel and a proud southerner and northerner, include an address by a gentlewoman, Josephine Wilkins, of Atlanta, Ga. She is a member of the coordinating committee, citizen's fact-finding movement, as president of the Georgia League of Women Voters.

The address is as follows:

I come from the South. I was born in the South. Most of my life has been spent in the South, where several generations make me part and parcel of the region. Irrespective of any of its alleged idiosyncrasies—I love the South. That fact I wish to make clear, and firmly establish at the outset.

Physically and geographically the South is part of the Nation. Yet social and economic lines bound it as definitely as might a foreign boundary. It is bound by mountains of sensitive pride, which too long have stood as the natural result of the search—the very human search—for some compensation on the part of a proud people humiliated through defeat—a people who have found that compensation in thought on glories of the past. Naturally this habit of looking backward has established a pattern of thought which revolts against the new—which rebel against change. The South is bound by valleys of economic depression, with all of the social ills which poverty so freely breeds—by hillsides of economic and social erosion due largely to the slow draining away of its resources through an economic unbalance brought about by such national factors as the American tariff and freight-rate differentials.

Any social program planned to serve the South must necessarily take its traditional attitudes into consideration. These attitudes find expression in the folklore of its people. In my own State, for instance, they take form in such widely heralded slogans as "It's great to be a Georgian" and "The Empire State of the South."

An experience of my own is an illustration. As a child I was taught at the feet of a greatly revered southern lady. Even now I can hear her: "Which was the first State (to do this)?" "Which was the first State (to do that)?" And after each question, in a deep, throaty voice—fairly caressing the word—she would answer, "G-e-o-r-g-i-a." One of my greatest disillusions came when further knowledge caused this childhood halo to vanish from my State.

However, a little story that I heard a few days ago is pertinent. Some men stopped on a corner where a group of small boys were playing baseball. One of the men asked a little fellow, "What's the score, son?" "Twenty-seven to nothing, against us," the boy replied. "That's too bad," the man said. And the little fellow came back with this, "No; it ain't so bad—we ain't been to bat yet!"

The South "ain't been to bat yet."

I shall not belabor you with an analysis of national practices which have contributed so largely to the fact that my region has remained in a colonial status for these many years, though the temptation to do so is great. Suffice it to say, what no doubt is common knowledge to most of you, that some way must be worked out whereby part of the wealth, long drained from the South, can be replaced. It must be done for the good of the Nation as a whole—for the good of other regions, as well as the South. For the South is the new market—the new frontier.

A SOUTHERN STATE LOOKS AT ITSELF

Your president, Paul Kellogg, has manifested encouraging interest in the effort being made by one Southern State to look realistically at itself, and has asked that I tell you of it. I refer to the Citizens' Fact-Finding Movement of Georgia.

Many of you saw Jonathan Daniel's story of the venture carried in the March issue of Survey Graphic. Those of you who saw it probably recall the cut carried on the front cover. It was an outline map of Georgia with a group of little silhouettes, representing the organizations engaged in the fact-finding program, shown as lifting up the top layer of the State and peering down inside to see what was going on. Mr. Daniels served our pride well when he began his article: "In Georgia the most important thing may be happening since Sherman's march through."

In my State the public utility which furnishes most of the power and light is the Georgia Power Co. This program which I shall discuss has interestingly been called the real Georgia Power Co. It has been said that "it is generating the power which is lighting the minds of the people of Georgia."

The foregoing comment can be well used to illustrate the work. The Power and Light are reports on various aspects of the State. These reports, the Power and Light, are generated by well-known Georgians who are experts in their chosen fields, and are distributed monthly in the form of booklets. They are prepared at the request of the official heads of 17 State-wide organizations, such as men's luncheon clubs, women's clubs, farm associations. The State heads of these groups serve as distributing centers. They send the reports to their 5,000 affiliated groups in communities throughout the State. The heads of these local groups are the substations. Through programs based on the reports, they electrify their local membership, which represents a combined total of 250,000 persons. In addition, from a central distributing plant maintained jointly by the organizations the reports are sent directly to 7,000 other individuals who have requested them—you might call this direct electrification. Thus, 12,000 reports—12,000 units of this Power and Light—are flashed out monthly over far-reaching lines. Although consumption in kilowatt-hours cannot be definitely known—and short circuits, of course, exist—there is abundant evidence of wide use.

WE WILLED A WAY

The program came about in this manner. In the spring of 1937, 2 years ago, a number of individuals began discussing among themselves the paradox of the State—its natural wealth and its human poverty. Participating in these discussions were the official heads of a number of State-wide organizations. In the offices of the men, on the porches and in the living rooms of the women, we talked about the State and the region. The discussions centered around the fact that the southeast has the three natural requirements of a high order of civilization. It has natural wealth, admittedly unsurpassed by any region of the Nation. It has fine climate. It has people. Yet it is the poorest section of the Nation. That this does not make sense is evident.

We talked of the drain of wealth from the region—drain through unfavorable trade balances, through migration of skilled workers, through migration of youth educated at public expense. We recognized that the section was going yearly into the red. Any business house going into the red would immediately take an inventory, would check up on its assets and liabilities, would review its policies. We discussed taking an inventory of Georgia. And gradually a proposed coordinated program took form.

In August we came together. We met to consider the program collectively. At that meeting around a dinner table in a little hotel room in Atlanta, the Citizens' Fact Finding Movement was launched.

In the meantime we had found our first fact. We found that it was the exception when the head of one of our organizations knew personally the head of another. Yet the aim of each group, in broad principle, is to raise the social level of the State. In working toward this common aim, we recognized that more basic information about the State would increase the effectiveness of each separate group.

I cite the program of one group by way of illustration. It is a well-known men's civic club. It has a program for the blind. In assisting those so handicapped, it is doing a fine job. It buys canes for the blind and glasses for the blind, has operations performed, and provides instruction and libraries in Braille. But in Georgia half of the babies have no medical attention at birth. Midwives attend many. Too often there are no drops in the infants' eyes. Georgia is continually breeding a new crop of blind children for this civic club to buy canes for. The club will not soon run out of a program.

As for my own group, the League of Women Voters, we have found through this fact-finding venture that we had been missing the mark in our approach to many of the things we advocate.

PROGRAM PLANS PROJECTED

Georgia organizations represented at the aforementioned meeting and those which have since developed the fact-finding program are: The men's civic clubs—Civitan, Exchange, Kiwanis, Lions, and Rotary; a feminine counterpart of these, the Pilot Club; the Association of University Women, the Business and Professional Women, the Congress of Parents and Teachers, the Federated Church Women, the Federated Women's Clubs; the Education Association, the Library Association, the Press Association; the Home Demonstration Council (composed of 1,100 small groups of rural women), the United Georgia Farmers, which recently was organized in the State; and my own group, the League of Women Voters. These are all State-wide organizations and each has affiliated local units which meet regularly throughout the State (with the exception of the press and the library associations and, to some extent, the education association). As I have said before, they are composed of 5,000 local groups and have a combined membership of 250,000 persons.

Let me briefly describe the program as we planned it when we met together. We based it on the principle of a State inventory. Twelve subjects were selected on which concise factual reports on Georgia would be obtained. Georgia—Past and Present, was chosen as the first in order to orient the program through a brief historical sketch of the State. Other subjects selected were: Natural Resources, Agriculture, Industry and Commerce, Health, Education, Public Welfare, Penal System, Political System, Tax System, Federal Activity, and Religious, Civic, and Social Forces. In connection with the last subject we sought to obtain an index of the organized forces of the State, together with some discussion of their relation to the information we expected to gather.

We agreed that the reports should be limited to facts, with no opinion included. The type of information we had in mind would not necessarily require new research. We wanted known facts about the State brought together in tabloid form so that they could be easily used by average people like ourselves—key information which usually one can gather only by searching through many volumes in libraries.

We also agreed that the reports should be made by outstanding Georgians—our own people—Georgians recognized as being well versed in knowledge of the State. We realized that the reports would require great time and labor and that we could not logically expect such work to be done for any one of our organizations singly. However, the scope of our collective plans led us to believe we would receive the cooperation which we planned to ask. We would use our best judgment in selecting these persons—selecting those whom we considered sufficiently free of economic and social ties to permit them to give us unbiased information.

We would issue monthly reports over the period of a year. These we would reproduce in sufficient quantity to allow us to send one copy to each of our affiliated groups in communities throughout the State, to assist in program making—as research material for speakers, round-table discussions, study groups.

Thus we planned to open up channels—existing channels—to reach people with information about themselves and their State. On this information we would endeavor to focus public thought and discussion simultaneously.

The program thus planned was put into effect. Approximately 2 years have intervened. In the meantime the undertaking has grown to far greater proportions than we dared hope when it was begun.

If any one thing is responsible for such success as has come to this fact-finding venture, that one thing undoubtedly is the looseness of the framework set up for carrying it forward. There is no superorganization. The program is developed by each group independently, none losing its identity. The work is coordinated through a committee composed of the State heads of the groups, together with two alternates for each. One alternate is permanent; the other rotates so that key members of the respective organizations can have direct contact with the committee work. This provides three members from each group and still keeps the committee small enough to be workable. We share leadership responsibility. The coordinating committee has no permanent chairman. The chairmanship rotates monthly. The committee holds monthly dinner meetings, alternating them between two of the largest cities of the State, Atlanta and Macon. The sessions are divided between business and an informal discussion of the report for the given month. The authority who has prepared the report meets with us. We have in addition a working subcommittee, the membership of which also rotates. A jointly maintained central office carries out the wishes of the committee.

SIDELIGHTS

While the fact-finding reports were originally designed to serve only the organizations which undertook the program, public demand has broadened the distribution of the reports. Over 7,000 additional copies go monthly to persons who have asked for them. These requests have come from deep down among the people as well as from the higher economic and educated strata. They have come on engraved stationery, and they have come on tablet paper.

Two thousand copies a month are being used by the extension division of the University System of Georgia—used by 50 circuit teachers who in turn instruct teachers. Others are being used in some classes by practically every institution of higher learning in the State. They are being used by the common schools in connection with debates and commencement addresses. They are being used by church societies and business groups.

We recently received a request from Babson Institute, asking for 25 copies of our second series for use in a course on the South. It is the scope of the requests that encourages us most. Little stories center around so many of them. For instance, a communication came from a woman—evidently, judging by the shaky handwriting, an elderly woman. It was written in pencil on lined pad paper. It said, "You know these facts these organizations are getting up about Georgia. Well, if you'll get me a copy of these facts, I'll send you a bottle of pickles." The contract was carried out. The pickles were served at the next meeting of the coordinating committee.

One of the finest aspects of the work is the generous manner in which leading Georgians have given so freely of their time and knowledge in preparing the reports. We have had the cooperation of such men as the Dean of the College of Agriculture, the former chancellor of the university system, and men of this caliber in fields other than education.

Then there is the spirit of camaraderie which has developed among the organization leaders who compose the coordinating committee. Meetings of this committee have been taking place regularly for nearly 2 years on the first Friday of each month, and its members come from all over the State.

Let me tell you of an incident in connection with one of these gatherings. One day last July, you will recall, the afternoon papers of the Nation carried front-page streamers on President Roosevelt's dramatic statement terming the South the "Nation's No. 1 economic problem." It happens that while those papers were being read throughout the country there were assembled around a table in Macon, Ga., the official heads and representatives of 17 of the State's organizations. They had come together to discuss the very subject dealt with in those newspaper stories. Federal activity was the subject of the report for the month. I have thought back many times to the table display that night. We have, by the way, thus pictured the subject of the report at each meeting. That night it followed so closely the information contained in the report on the South later made to the President that, in retrospect, it is of added interest.

The display took the form of an elongated triangle. The three points were dramatized as: Georgia, Industrial Areas, and the National Government. We used for the last a white plaster paris replica of the National Capitol—a beautiful object, about 4 feet high. Train tracks connected the three points of the triangle. A train was shown as moving away from each point to the other. The one from Georgia going to Industrial Areas was labeled "Migration of wealth through unfavorable trade balances," "Migration of skilled workers," and "Migration of youth educated at public expense." An arrow pointing in the same direction informed that the train had been running on "frequent schedule over many years." The train going from Industrial Areas to Washington carried a carload of stage money labeled "Taxes." The arrow bore the statement "More frequent schedule recently." The train going from Washington down to Georgia, thus completing the triangle, also carried money. It was marked "Federal grants and services." The arrow this time stated "More frequent schedule needed." Whether the return of that wealth comes about in this manner or some other, that is our story. Buying power is the need of my region.

I cannot resist describing one more of these displays, the one on the political system of Georgia. Incidentally, it made a box on the front page of one of the State's major newspapers.

Georgia has an excessively long ballot. In fact, we elect everything literally "down to the dog-catcher." We unwound a roll of heavy white paper and had it run from the entrance of the hotel dining room, across the floor, up on the banquet table, over the top of the cocktails, and on up to the speakers' table. It carried broken black lines indicating printing, with these words at the top, "Official Ballot, State of Georgia." Certain instructions were given: "Note—Make yourself comfortable while marking ballot. Get ticket at the right for lounging robe and slippers, reading chair and lamp. Lunch will be served in interim." Georgia ballots also carry a unique little number. With this number it is possible for those who have access to the voting lists to ascertain how a given elector votes. We put a number on our ballot. Under it we added: "Note—To promote efficiency and to expedite matters sign name under this number."

This ballot was removed from the table and other decorations were revealed. A puppet, about 3 feet high, stood on a platform supported by posts marked "Campaign contributions from corporate interests" and "Campaign contributions from private interests." Some of the planks in the platform on which this candidate was running, were missing. They were lying loose on the table and were labeled "Public issues." The planks he stood on were marked "Vilification of opposing candidates." Strings from the puppet, controlling his mouth, his hands, and his feet, were held at some distance by two large hands labeled "Campaign contributors." Of course, there was also the whisky bottle and the cigar.

This candidate had thrown out a lasso toward a barrel marked "pork." In front of it four little men marched, one by one, down the center of the table, supporting a large card marked "Candidates' Campaign." They were labeled: "Workers in State-at-Large," "Workers in 159 Counties," "Workers in 694 Incorporated Cities," "Workers in 1822 Militia Districts." Each carried a "Ticket to the Public Trough." The "public trough" just ahead was piled high with stage money.

Circles at each committee member's place held a brightly colored little hat, flaunting a cocky feather. The member's "hat was in the ring"—and the ring held the words "To raise the social and economic level of Georgia."

GEORGIA'S RESPONSE

In discussing this Georgia program, I would not mislead you into thinking the response to the reports—reports which have thrown spotlight as sharply on our liabilities as on our assets—has been favorable without exception. A number of misgivings were evidenced shortly after the start. You may recall the editorial referred to by Jonathan Daniels. It was entitled "What in the World Has Happened to Georgia?" In no uncertain terms this particular editor made clear that he had been reared to think the State was different from the picture of it given in the fact-finding reports. He said one would think these reports were coming from persons outside the State but instead they were coming from its own people. "What in the world has happened to Georgia?" he asked. Then he added this postscript, "By the way, is this Georgia in the United States or Georgia somewhere near the Caucasus Mountains?"

With few exceptions the State has evidenced fine spirit in response to the work. It has recognized the sincerity of those engaged in the undertaking. The constructive value of such frank self-appraisal has been generally commended. The accuracy of the information has not been challenged. And recognitions from a distance have justly developed a certain amount of State pride in the work.

MONEY MATTERS

The fact-finding reports are sent out without charge. This procedure was adopted early in the program when requests for the reports began coming in. We argued that a charge might result in their reaching only those already actively interested in the State. You naturally question how we have financed the venture. I could answer you, "On a shoestring." But, amplifying, it has been financed through contributions. A few have been relatively large; most have been small. The sum acquired last year reached the handsome total of $5,000. But we have free office space, and the workers are largely volunteers. In fact, we have had a personnel expenditure of only $50 a month. Two young college women gave their time regularly at the office. Also, we have the assistance of N. Y. A. students in assembling the material for distribution.

You might be interested to know that we originally prepared these reports on a mimeograph machine—the first month, on one operated by hand. Many a boy friend of the attractive little office secretary served his term cranking that machine. This method was used until the monthly distribution reached 10,000; it was then no more expensive to print the reports.

Of course, our meager finances have kept us from taking advantage of many opportunities to make the program more effective. They have also placed on some of us work too excessive for the human machine to stand up under for a very long period. Frankly, there have been times when we have questioned whether, after all, we had not created a Frankenstein. But this year we have adopted a more appropriate budget. The work is now sufficiently established to merit it. Our budget is this: One cent for each person in the State of of Georgia toward a program which has as its objective the raising of the people's income 100 percent, in order to bring it up to the national average. There are 3,000,000 people in my State. One cent for each of them would total $30,000. We have broken down our budget in this manner: $10,000 to be obtained in grants from foundations, for the lower one-third underprivileged group; $10,000 in goods and services from Georgians, for the middle-income group with little margin between income and outgo; and $10,000 in financial contributions from Georgians, for the upper one-third privileged group.

As for our progress in raising this budget, all of the goods and services have been pledged by Georgians, and we have made some headway on both of the budget divisions which relate to actual funds, though there is yet quite a distance to go. Funds are difficult to raise down my way.

However, there is one source from which we should be able to take ample care of the financial side of work such as this. It is estimated that a minimum of $3,000 is required to rear and educate a child. Our capital investments of this type, it so happens, frequently move elsewhere to be put into operation as soon as they are completed. And it seems that those in whom we invest most are usually the very ones who go elsewhere to produce. To illustrate, in the last United States census my State shows a net loss in the migration of native-born people equal to one-fifth of the population given for the State. Capitalize this loss and you have a staggering sum. Well, we would like to start a "Georgia Three-percent Club." We would like 3 percent on our investments. We might even strike a bargain and base the yield on the minimum. Even that would handsomely finance work such as ours. You might mention it to your migrated southern friends, by the way.

CURRENT AND FUTURE PROGRAM

Some months ago we completed the inventory on which the first year's program was based and with the last report we sent a query to Georgians. Did they wish the program continued? If so, what did they want? Fully three-fourths of the responses asking that the work be continued proposed that it take the form of suggested solutions to problems presented in the factual reports. Only one reply asked that the program be stopped. "Just such abortions," this response said, "have misled the President into thinking the South is the Nation's economic problem No. 1."

Thus we have based our current work on this public response. The 20 authorities have agreed to give their services to the State again. They will serve as a committee to reconsider the subjects on which the factual studies were made and to chart possible solutions to the problems revealed. The reports consisting of possible solutions as seen by this committee will be issued without indicating the minority or majority opinion of the committee members. In this way it will be left to Georgians to decide what they consider wise future action.

Distribution of this series of reports will start in the fall. Meanwhile we are issuing, monthly, sections of the now well-known Report on Economic Conditions of the South, which we have annotated from our Georgia factual reports. In this manner we are obtaining a picture of the State in comparison with the South as a whole.

TOWARD WHAT END?

This program is directed toward what end, you may ask. It is truly an adventure in democracy. Confidence in the theory of the democratic process leads us to believe that such widespread thought will ultimately find expression in action. If the Nation can continue to maintain itself as a democracy, then this thought on the part of Georgia citizens should eventually find some expression. If we as a nation lose our democratic form of government, then the information and thought stimulated through this program should still be of assistance to Georgians, irrespective of what their situation may be.

A few days ago I was thinking of how closely the present challenge to democracy parallels with marriage. Those of you who have entered into such a union, most probably, exterted yourselves no little before it was consummated. This is generally true of the woman as well as of the man. After marriage, more often than not, the union develops into a more or less accepted state. It is taken as a matter of course. Then frequently there comes a period of—a few side glances here and there. The union requires a little more wooing or it is apt to go on the rocks. We have come to call it "the dangerous age."

As for this democratic union—this union of Uncle Sam and the Goddess of Liberty—we most certainly exerted ourselves before we brought it about. We even went so far as to have physical combat with our English parents because consent was withheld. However, for a long while now we have given it little personal attention. We have let it rock along—have thought of it in terms of permanency.

But we have come to a time when there is a little flirting with other alliances. There are definitely side glances on the part of some of us. There are even rumors of trysting places. This democratic union has arrived at "the dangerous age." We, Uncle Sam, cannot neglect Liberty as we have done and at the same time expect to hold her. Though we have lived with her little, she is still our ideal. In my opinion, unless we evidence greater understanding and appreciation of her, we deserve to lose her.

In this present challenge to democracy do not take too lightly my region. There you will find the Ku Klux Klan, the Silver Shirts, and the Knights of the White Camelia. Take my State, for instance. It is an agricultural State, yet two-thirds of its farmers are landless. Half of these landless are a dispossessed, hopeless people, moving yearly from farm to farm. In cities around industrial plants others are equally as hopeless. Is it not natural that they should listen when new hope is offered? They have followed demagogs. Until their lot is bettered they will follow demagogs again.

Do not take too lightly my region. Its mountains of pride might easily respond to the cultivation of a "superman" philosophy. Its valleys of depression yearn longingly for richer harvests and might readily reach out to whatever promises abundance. Its socially eroded hillsides are fertile for seed which seem bright. Some seeds take root easily in wasted land. Do not take too lightly my region.

Coming from the "Bible Belt," I need not feel it inappropriate to close with a quotation from that book which is so widely read and so little understood. The quotation is one which has great meaning when it is vitalized: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." Many are seeking the truth in Georgia. May it make and keep us free.

Neutrality and American Foreign Trade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

ADDRESS OF REV. EDMUND A. WALSH, S. J.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the following address by the Reverend Dr. Edmund A. Walsh, S. J., vice president of Georgetown University, and regent, School of Foreign Service, delivered at the opening session of the Annual National Foreign Trade Convention, Hotel Commodore, New York City, on Monday, October 9, 1939:

This convention meets under domestic circumstances and during international developments which make this occasion by far the most important date in the long and fruitful series of similar conferences sponsored by the National Foreign Trade Council. Hitherto your objectives have been the strengthening and facilitating of overseas commerce—the defense of foreign trade as an indispensable element of an integrated national economy—the creation of an adequate merchant marine—the improvement of export and import technique, and the financing of a reciprocal flow of commodities in a manner advantageous to seller and buyer alike. Such were the eager hopes of men who still breathed the air of peace and sought to promote the solidarity of the human race by cultivating the amenities of civilized living. But the tragic events of these recent weeks have shattered the very foundation of international relations, particularly with Europe, and presented to the Nation, to the Government, and to the business community, a problem not concerned with perfecting peace or developing foreign trade but involving the very existence both of peace and foreign trade. That is the stark reality confronting us at this hour.

With the Far East still exhausting itself in prolonged warfare, with the Spanish Peninsula well-nigh prostrate as a result of a devastating civil war, with eastern Europe resounding to the ominous tread of communism as its hordes march exultingly westward, and with central Europe aflame with another ghastly conflagration, it would seem that faith in human sanity and hope for human progress now find their last refuge in the two Americas. London, as I left it a few days before the outbreak of war, was a city preparing stoically and methodically for a seige. Hundreds of thousands of children were being rushed to safe places in the interior or southwest. Waterloo Station was piled high with luggage and filled with children being evacuated from the metropolis. Trucks were drawn up before business houses, banks, insurance offices, and similar establishments, loading the records, files, and furniture for removal to a safer zone.

The precaution against air raids, the underground refuges, the sandbags piled around buildings, the trenches in Hyde Park, and the public appearance of gas masks all conspired to dramatize one of the most appalling aspects of modern warfare. Wars were previously wars of governments, of cabinets and ministries—of Talleyrands, Metternichs, and Castlereaghs. Today, as we know, wars will be fought by and against the civilian population as much as by and against the regular army. The use of airplanes against populous cities, begun in the Sino-Japanese and in the Spanish Civil War, was as it were, only a prelude to the full crescendo of destruction from the air now hovering over Europe. Should it reach the climax of indiscriminate bombardment which now seems threatened, the effects on the accumulated treasures and hard-won fruits of western civilization may well stagger the imagination. For the preservation of this last precious haven of peace in the Western Hemisphere and for the safeguarding of our national welfare, we shall have need of cool heads at every conference table and steady hands on the wheel of the ship of state. And both industry and commerce will have need of much self-discipline, much self-sacrifice, much consciousness of the common welfare as opposed to private gain in the difficult days that lie ahead.

From the tone of Herr Hitler's speech to the Reichstag last Friday and from the available reactions of France and England, it now seems fairly clear that not peace but continued and savage warfare must be expected for a very long period. I agree with that thoughtful analysis advanced by Mr. Herbert Hoover last week in which the former President of the United States maintained that Germany, with all its increased power, territory, and population, cannot decisively defeat France and England, because of the preponderant economic resources capable of being mobilized in a test of endurance by those two powers.

On the other hand, candor compels me to agree with the German Chancelor that the combined military forces of his present opponents cannot conclusively crush Germany. Hence, unless some unforeseen element intervenes, the conflict promises to resolve itself into a weary, demoralizing war of attrition, during which both combatants will consume enormous stores of manpower, of material wealth, and human resources until downright exhaustion declares a stalemate—with neither side victorious. In that eventuality, the only victor will be the Bolshevik, who is already taking his preliminary steps by acquiring increased territory in Poland, by assuming virtual military control over the Baltic states, and by advancing into the Carpathians—all without loss of a man. When the two major belligerents have reduced one another to exhaustion, the commissars will be in the strategic position they have always dreamed of—as final arbiters of the fate of a degenerate bourgeoisie ripe for the avenging sword of world revolution. Should that hoped-for hour arrive, the followers of Lenin will have reason to be twice thankful to a German High Staff. For it was Berlin that first introduced the disintegrating virus of Marxian communism into imperial Russia by transporting Lenin and his fellow conspirators from Switzerland to Petrograd in 1917. Once again they have furthered the cause of world revolution by the recent alliance which advanced bolshevism hundreds of miles nearer western Europe over the bleeding body of Poland. It will not be long, I suspect, before the first Soviet horseman will appear in the Khyber Pass spying out the road that leads to India.

But we are more concerned in this convention with the effects of the war on American interests, particularly on American foreign trade. As the conflict continues and settles into that test of endurance which now seems probable, we must be prepared for increasing dislocation of normal commerce not only with Europe but with other affected area. We must be prepared, moreover, for new dangers to our neutrality as each belligerent will seek to weaken his opponent either by increasing contraband lists or by efforts, direct and indirect, to ease the United States into the conflict. With respect to the latter danger, may I voice a feeling that has been growing among many thoughtful men? No responsible person in the United States has thus far openly advocated our militant entrance into the war. On the contrary, it has been declared from the President downward that there must be no black-out of peace in this land. But some of the reasons now being advanced for the repeal of the embargo are so patently untrue that much uneasiness has been created as to the real and controlling motives underlying those arguments. Thus, it has been repeated over and over again that the present embargo should be repealed because it is contrary to international law. We find that contention not only in speeches of individual Senators and other proponents of repeal, but even in the official report of the majority group of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. The last paragraph of that document reads:

"The committee was of the opinion that the provisions in existing law providing for an embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war should be repealed and not reenacted in any form. Therefore, such provisions are not carried in the present proposed substitute.

"The committee is of the opinion that the United States cannot maintain its neutrality so long as such embargo provisions remain upon our statute books. It is contrary to the accepted precepts of international law which prescribes that any belligerent may purchase any article or materials in any neutral country.

"Belligerents as well as neutrals have relied from time immemorial upon this law. It has, for hundreds of years, been recognized by both belligerents and neutrals to govern their conduct toward each other and is today so recognized by the governments of the world with the exception of the United States. It was a voluntary departure from international law by the United States Government, and cannot, in the opinion of the committee, be administered in an equitable or neutral manner nor will it serve to maintain the peace of the United States."

Now, I am not here raising the substantive question of repeal or retention of the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war. That * * * vital issue should be debated on its merits. Possibly it should be repealed. Possibly cash and carry for all commodities, arms and ammunition included, is the indicated policy for the United States in the present crisis. Possibly the time has come to drop pretext and involved legalistic arguments for a frank show of sympathy for France and England. I do not question the sincerity, the patriotism, or the integrity of those who honestly advocate such a policy—as Senator NORRIS and former Secretary of State Stimson have done. But I do express my unqualified amazement at the repeated and unsubstantiated claim that an embargo on arms is contrary to international law as it deprives a belligerent of his right to purchase arms and ammunition in a neutral country. Not only has that untruth been heard on the floor of the Senate and read into its official report, but it has been widely disseminated by men who should know better.

In no place and at no time did international law ever enunciate such a contradiction of the attribute of national sovereignty. International law, recognizing the supreme legal competency of every nation to sell or not to sell any commodity in accordance with its own judgment as to what constitutes its vital interest, merely affirms the right of each belligerent to buy arms and ammunition on a parity with all other belligerents, if the neutral is willing to sell. But the belligerent has no right in law, in equity, or in precedent to purchase on his own demand. That would connote an obligation on the part of the neutral to sell, since right and obligation are correlative terms. The only obligation devolving on the neutral is to sell impartially to all belligerents in case he sells at all.

In pursuance of this right to embargo arms and ammunition, a long series of prohibitions has been enacted by different governments from time immemorial without the slightest violation of belligerent rights. An extensive list of such embargoes will be found in the American Journal of International Law (vol. 33, supp., p. 283–ff.). The present legal advisor of the Department of State, Mr. Green H. Hackworth, told the Foreign Relations Committee in 1936 that an arms embargo creates no legal difficulty; our present highly respected Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, supported a treaty at the Buenos Aires Conference in December 1936, which included an article forbidding the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to any two or more Latin American republics at war among themselves. And the United States twice imposed an embargo on arms to Mexico since 1912, and also during the Chaco controversy, with no subsequent consciousness of having violated international law.

Whence, then, this late discovery that an embargo violates international law? The answer is not far to seek. The discovery is a thin cover for a deep conviction entertained in many quarters that we should take every step short of outright war to assist France and England. The present debate, in truth, is not on neutrality, but on the broad question of American foreign policy, particularly on the advisability of entering into an emotional, a moral, and an economic alliance with the two western democracies against the totalitarian combination. To a very large extent, we have already suspended, if not entirely abandoned, one cardinal principle of American diplomatic tradition—the freedom of the seas. The neutrality debate is rapidly coming down to the next case and revealing that what is being reexamined at Washington is not an incidental clause of a law passed in 1937 but another tremendously important and hitherto cardinal principle of our political philosophy. I am firmly convinced that we are passing through a truly great and historic moment in our national history, one comparable to the periods of fierce debate during the administrations of Washington, Adams, and Jefferson. The country was dangerously divided in its sympathies then, some favoring conservative England, as Hamilton did, and others leaning toward revolutionary France. The argument of the pro-English party was crystal clear—the French Revolution favored by Mr. Jefferson was a potential menace to the tranquillity and peace of the United States; they would all be murdered in their beds if its world-wide ambitions and subversive philosophy were not halted before they reached the shores of the new Republic of the West. It is a chastening historical paradox to recall that the United States in 1812 declared war, not on France, but on conservative England. National interest fanned by the "war hawks" of the Middle West and popular indignation at England's repeated violation of neutral rights finally turned the tide in spite of ideologies and emotional attachments. It was by no means, however, a universally popular war.

The present phase may be further compared to 1823, when James Monroe published to a solidly monarchial Europe his daring doctrine that the New World was no longer a field for future colonization by them but reserved to the American republics. An analogous declaration has just proclaimed that the American republics will erect a neutral barrier for 300 miles of sea around the two Americas—a safety zone, a cordon sanitaire—within which European belligerents will not be permitted to engage in hostilities. Some 5,000,000 square miles of water are thus brought within the new Monroe Doctrine of the sea recently proclaimed at Panama. Whether Europe will accept this latest unilateral revision of international law remains to be seen. England has politely but formally expressed her reservation, and all students of Shakespeare will remember the scene between Hotspur and Glendower in the first part of Henry IV, act III, scene 1:

"GLENDOWER. I can call spirits from the vasty deep.

"HOTSPUR. Why, so can I; or so can any man:

"But will they come, when you do call for them?"

Perhaps the time has come, as many honestly believe, for a third substantial change in our foreign policy. In many quarters it is felt that the United States should drop the pretense of impartiality and abstention respecting a titanic conflict 3,000 miles away and frankly take our stand, short of war, on the side of those belligerents whose principles and ideals more nearly resemble our own. In 1917 we entered into mortal conflict with the Imperial German Government, post factum, after certain rights of navigation had been violated; in 1939 the debate is raging over the advisability of almost going to war with Nazi Germany in advance of being hurt out of loyalty to the ideals of democracy actually imperiled elsewhere and hypothetically menaced here if Germany should win. Prudence and foresight counsel such a decision, it is argued, and there is, moreover, a moral obligation incumbent on America to throw her great weight and prestige into the balance against totalitarianism before it is too late. That is the unspoken but true issue before Congress today; it is taboo in the Senate, although the true alternative is being fully and openly discussed throughout the land, from the Gallup poll down to the village store. The embargo is merely the symbol of an underlying conflict of beliefs. I am not arguing for or against repeal, but against that continued misrepresentation of international law and of recorded fact which in some cases savors strongly of Machiavellian skulduggery.

Whether the embargo on arms be repealed or retained, one thing is certain. Many other provisions of the proposed neutrality legislation seem assured of legal enactment and public approval. Cash-and-carry, the exclusion of American shipping from danger zones, and the Draconian limitations on sea-borne commerce and travel in general must undoubtedly affect adversely our foreign trade. The closing of so many markets will call for courageous readjustments and prompt ingenuity to seek substitute openings elsewhere. Not only do the North Atlantic routes fall within the category of danger zones from which American commerce may be excluded but under section 2 (A) of the proposed Neutrality Act the trade routes to such remote areas as New Zealand, Australia, and South Africa, to Mediterranean ports, to India, and the whole Far East may be closed to American-flag ships. It has been estimated that American exports to belligerent areas, excluding Europe but including Canada, have reached a total of $815,104,283 per annum. If no solution of this grave problem be found, what is to happen to that important balance wheel in our national economy supplied by foreign trade? Even if the productive capacity of domestic industry should be maintained and find an outlet in foreign bottoms operating at their own risk within a cash-and-carry program, what will happen to our merchant marine just at the moment of its most promising rebirth under the present energetic program of the Maritime Commission? Shall we be faced with a new frustration and behold those ships for which we have pleaded for 20 years tied up by hundreds in home ports or seeking in desperation to operate under foreign registry?

The motives underlying these provisions, the determination to safeguard American neutrality, the firm resolve to foresee and eliminate, as far as possible, all provocations leading to our involvement in war are wholly understandable and commendable. Even our foreign trade, important as it is, cannot prevail against the peace and security of the United States, nor against the lives of its citizens and the dangers of war. This does not mean, however, that too sweeping surrender must be made of neutral rights. The history of international relations plainly reveals the universal tendency of belligerents to whittle away the rights of neutrals in favor of their own. It is the duty of the Government of the United States to safeguard not only the Nation's peace but its legitimate rights as well.

There is one bright spot on the overcast horizon. Already a flock of trade inquiries has arrived from Latin American countries now cut off from purchases customarily made in Europe. Trade with those areas has never yet been fully developed and still remains the most promising potential recompense for losses in other quarters of the globe. In the spirit of the recent conference of Panama a concerted and vigorous effort should be made to respond to those inquiries and to the enlarged opportunities they embody. Credit facilities must be studied and a two-way flow of commodities encouraged in order to facilitate payment for imports. Statistics reveal that our trade with Latin America is much less than it was 2 years ago. That should be remedied and still further advances made. Then, if certain trade routes, particularly to remote belligerent areas, must eventually be closed as the lesser of two evils, every resource must be mobilized to employ American shipping in beckoning markets of the Americas. That undoubtedly would require painful readjustments, new organization, and much versatility in adapting old ideas to new emergencies. The robust initiative of the American character created this great country; it will not lose that vigor when confronted with the supreme responsibility of keeping it great. It is not unreasonable to suggest that special Government assistance be provided for the purpose of enabling affected lines to adjust themselves to new routes or otherwise indemnify them for losses incurred in sacrificing established trade connections as a contribution to keeping America out of the war.

One closing consideration. Our neutrality can be maintained, and America spared the tragedy that has again befallen Europe, only by a firm policy in defense of the rights of both the Americas and by stubborn resistance to partisan propaganda. But I see a very real complication arising from another direction. Is Canada an American state within the meaning of the Monroe Doctrine? If she is, and if her territory is attacked by a European power, must the Government of the United States take affirmative action calculated to guarantee the security of our northern neighbor and respected friend? Although the Monroe Doctrine in itself does not exclude warfare between an American state and a European power, and although it embraced only those colonies which had achieved independence and complete separation from European monarchies, excluding those which retained political bonds with Europe, it has been definitely interpreted in recent times, and in very high official quarters, to forbid even military operations against Canada. That is a formidable extension of our defense liability. Since military operations may be launched from the air, or by submarines as well as by land and naval forces, such a possibility with respect to Canada is not a strained nor fanciful idea. That situation needs further clarification, since, in my opinion, it offers a source of involvement which in the rapid and unpredictable evolution of modern warfare may become as proximate and specific as any violation of American rights on the high seas.

Poultry Industry in Need of More Statistical Information

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY B. COFFEE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today H. R. 7616, a bill to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish additional statistical information and marketing service for the benefit of the poultry industry. Efforts will be made to secure early consideration of this measure by the Committee on Agriculture at the next session of Congress. The important poultry industry is entitled to more recognition than the Department of Agriculture is now authorized to accord to it.

During the past 15 years the annual farm value of chickens and eggs has exceded $1,000,000,000 annually. The typical poultry-producing unit is the farm flock, which accounts for the fact that about 85 percent of all farms in the country produce poultry. Aside from the fact that all but 15 percent of the farms in the country are interested directly in poultry production, it is safe to say that practically 100 percent of the population consumes poultry products in one form or another. The importance of this industry is thus self-evident.

The Agricultural Marketing Service now conducts five lines of work dealing with the field of poultry marketing. These include: (1) Production, processing, and storage reports; (2) market news; (3) grading and inspection; (4) research; and (5) regulatory work under title V of the Packers and Stockyards Act.

While these lines include the necessary elements for a comprehensive marketing program, it has never been possible to develop any one of them satisfactorily because of a lack of funds and inadequate personnel. With this situation existing, it has been necessary to undertake the activities in small pieces and under joint arrangement with other activities.

At the present time the Agricultural Marketing Service is expending approximately $175,000 on poultry work, of which about $60,000 is required for the administration of regulatory activities under the Packers and Stockyards Act.

PRODUCTION AND PROCESSING REPORTS

Under this heading a number of reports have been developed dealing with the production and processing of poultry and poultry products. These include monthly reports of the average number of hens and pullets per farm flock, average number of eggs laid, number of eggs per layer, and index prices of eggs and chickens. The cost of feed used in poultry ration is published only as an average for the United States. Once a year the income and utilization of poultry and poultry products is published by States. A monthly report is also issued on hatchery production, egg breaking, and canned poultry.

Adequate provision has never been made for the collection, compilation, and publication of production and marketing statistics. This work has been developed about as far as possible with present funds and facilities. There is need for considerable expansion and improvement in this field of reporting, as follows:

(a) Monthly and annual statistics are needed in respect to commercial flocks, which are increasing in their importance, and the present farm flock report is in need of expansion. Improvement in statistics relating to numbers of birds on farms, numbers of chicks raised and eggs produced will greatly assist farmers in their production program and will be of extreme value to marketing agencies.

(b) There is need for information by principal breeds and classes of poultry, since there are varying demands for eggs of white and brown shell color and poultry meat of different qualities.

(c) The specialized production of broilers has been expanding rapidly but no reports on this important branch of the industry are issued and are vitally needed.

(d) To guide the industry there is a need for more information on intentions of farmers in respect to their flock expansion or contraction; the time, size, and weight of the poultry they expect to market; the degree of flock culling they expect to practice; the percent of eggs and poultry produced, which is consumed on the farm.

(e) Farmers are buying an increasing percentage of the chicks and turkey poults from commercial hatcheries. The hatchery industry has therefore expanded. At present there is issued during the hatching season a monthly hatchery report. This, however, is in need of expansion. It should represent reports from more hatcheries. It should include information relating to the breeds and classes of chicks produced. The number of hatcheries and their capacities should be kept up to date annually and more should be known of their practices.

MARKET NEWS

The market-news project is designed to cover the short-term aspects of the current market situation. This work is now conducted in connection with the dairy market reporting service and consists principally of supplying local market prices and storage stocks of eggs and poultry in a few of the larger markets. Live poultry prices are collected and published covering San Francisco, Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore. Wholesale prices of eggs are published for Boston, Philadelphia, Seattle, and San Francisco. Daily storage holdings are collected for a few of the larger markets, and weekly storage holdings cover a total of 35 markets.

One of the principal deficiencies in the poultry market reporting work is that the coverage is entirely inadequate. The service should be extended to many more markets and should cover these markets more completely than is now possible. Some of the additional work that should be done in this field is as follows:

(a) Reports on market receipts of eggs and poultry are in need of improvement particularly in respect to receipts by truck. Nothing is known of the various proportions of the different qualities of eggs and poultry, and this knowledge would make for improved marketing. Market-receipts information is obtained only at a few markets—New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, and San Francisco. This information should be issued for several more of the important cities and on a more widespread geographical basis.

(b) No adequate and representative figures are available to measure the consumption of eggs and poultry and there is needed a satisfactory report probably from retail outlets which will more properly indicate actual conditions of consumer demand.

(c) Market price information is not readily available except from a very limited number of markets and should be expanded to include many more of the important markets. Prices paid to farmers are reported only monthly and it is believed that farmers and marketers would be materially aided by at least supplemental weekly reports.

(d) Practically no information is currently available on retail prices and this should be reported at least weekly for a number of representative cities.

(e) The reports now issued on canned and eviscerated poultry, liquid and frozen canned eggs, and dried eggs are greatly in need of expansion.

(f) The relation of feed costs as measured by egg-feed ratio and poultry-feed ratio is covered in a very limited way and is in need of improvement and expansion.

GRADING AND INSPECTION

The object of this work is to investigate and certify to shippers and other interested persons the class, quality, and condition of poultry products when offered or prepared for interstate shipment or when received at important central markets.

The service consists of the grading of poultry products in terminal markets and at shipping points for class, grade, quality, and condition; supervision of the inspection of dressed poultry for condition and wholesomeness at canning establishments and at establishments packing full-drawn poultry. Practically all this work is carried on under cooperative agreements with States or other agencies.

To properly safeguard the public interest there is a need for expansion of this service and for its proper functioning there is required additional funds which will enable more effective supervision on the part of the Department and the ability to more adequately educate the producer, marketer, and consumer, of the economic and protective value of graded products.

RESEARCH

The research work carried on at the present time is perhaps the weakest phase of the whole program for poultry and poultry products. All that has been done has been accomplished with an absolute minimum of funds and this field is in urgent need of attention. Sound and economical marketing is not possible without the establishment of standards and grades which indicate various degrees of quality and condition. Work should be done in the following fields:

(a) To properly develop egg standards and grades, there is need for study of such factors as candling light intensity, color filters, candling apparatus as well as the factors which are reliable and true measures of egg quality and condition.

(b) More information as to the consumer preferences and consumer usage is needed to form a sound basis for the development of standards and grades of eggs and poultry and their products.

(c) To be more beneficial to producers there is need for information as to the various qualities of products which can be economically produced.

(d) With present facilities little or no fundamental scientific work can be done to determine the basic factors which would form a sound and economical basis for developing standards and grades for live and dressed poultry, canned and eviscerated poultry, liquid and frozen canned eggs, and dried eggs. These problems should receive immediate attention.

The Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. O. BURGIN

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

LETTER BY HON. GIFFORD PINCHOT

Mr. BURGIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written recently to the Washington Post by Hon. Gifford Pinchot, former Governor of Pennsylvania:

[From the Washington Post]

THE BEST WAY TO KEEP OUT

To the EDITOR OF THE POST.

SIR: There are, as I see it, two things practically all Americans are for in this war: We want to stay out of it, and we want Hitler stopped. We can, I am convinced, get both of these things by repealing the embargo and enacting cash and carry.

The best way for us to keep out of the war is to help the Allies to win it without us. The Allies ought to win the war, first because it is right, and also because that is the best thing for the United States.

This war will decide whether we shall continue to live in peace and security, or whether we must be armed and ready to keep the unbearable Hitler system—tyranny, paganism, persecution, blood purges, faith breaking, and conquest by force—out of this hemisphere.

The Nazis have already given unmistakable notice of their desire to dominate certain South American countries.

Allied victory will bring no threat to peace in the Americas. But would it be good for our peace if a despotism whose law is the law of the wolf pack, which hates freedom, despises religion, looks on small nations as mere loot, and keeps no faith should try to extend its military rule to Canada and the French and British colonies in America?

What chance would there be for permanent world peace if Hitler should win? Can world peace be based on raw force? But if the Allies win, there will be a chance, and this time I firmly believe a good chance, for a peace based on justice and the right of each nation to its fair share of natural resources.

You may not like England or France—because of imperialism, past wars, war debts, or whatever. But suppose burglars were breaking into the houses of your friends. And suppose the chief of police had not always led a model life, owed you money, and was personally objectionable. Would that make you side with the burglars?

This is a free country. We keep our word. We want to live with and trade with free peoples who keep their word also.

I am just as anxious to keep out of war as anyone can be. I do not want my son to go to war. I am for cash and carry and repealing the embargo because that is the way to keep our sons and daughters at home.

We are neutral, and we must stay neutral. But it is no more unneutral to repeal the embargo, which will help the Allies, than to maintain the embargo, which is helping Hitler right now.

Other nations across the sea are fighting the things we hate—cruelty, aggression, the ruthless rule of force. The way to stay out of war is to help them win without us, and so prevent the spread of Hitlerism over the earth.

That we should be helping the unspeakable Hitler by maintaining our embargo is almost unthinkable. That we should help him not only against the right but also against our own interests—that is just simply ridiculous.

Like you, I am for America first, last, and all the time. I am for staying out of the war. Cash and carry and no embargo is the answer.

GIFFORD PINCHOT.

WASHINGTON, October 31.

How Our Government Is Revising the Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, among the students of our great legal systems, none stands out more indisputably above the clamors and passions of the day than the former dean of Harvard University's famous law school, Roscoe Pound. His reputation for clarity of thought, objectiveness of viewpoint, and love of the American system is everywhere unquestioned. When he speaks in terms of our national future, all of us, Republican, Democrat, or dissenter, must pay heed, listening intently to his views.

Recently Dean Pound has spoken, and his words sound a warning to our Nation which cannot be ignored. Everywhere in the world today, he tells us, liberty and justice, the supremacy of law above men, are on the defensive. They are rapidly being forgotten in the midst of an era of chaos and superstitious worship of man-made power. Absolutist governments are superseding the era of equality of opportunity. "Rights, property and human, are regarded as the creations of the moment, subject always to the whim of the powerful, capricious rather than rooted.

To be sure, this trend is most notable in Europe, where dictatorships stridently mount the rostrum to proclaim their deification of brutality to the world. Yet even in our own Nation there are growing evidences of this new spirit. Administrative absolutism may be practiced in a variety of forms. The dictator may mask his designs, or he may shout them from the housetops. The agencies by which power may be asserted are as various as the governments which establish them. Here in the United States, Dean Pound points out:

> Things which would have shocked the American people in the past century seem to be accepted today without a murmur or even to be actually approved. One-sided statutes, one-sided administrative proceedings, may be seen in almost every statute book, every report, and every treatise on politics.

We have drifted far, far from the original views of those who founded our Nation and drafted the Constitution of our Government. To be sure, there are always those who observe too speedily that the times have changed. New conditions breed new demands. Social objectives cannot wait the morrow. They must be met today. Justice must be occasionally set aside in the need for speedy and necessary action. Individual rights must be sacrificed in the interest of the state.

Dean Pound does not hesitate to point out the basic weakness of this line of reasoning. Surely no one can pretend to the divine knowledge which assures us of the righteousness of our causes. We have seen men and women who were completely convinced of the worthiness of their goals repudiated by experience. But why is administrative tyranny gaining momentum in the world today? To find its causes we must look back into the nineteenth century. The early Communists regarded law as a technique devised for the maintenance of a propertied class. Justice and jurisprudence were viewed as schemes to defraud the gullible. Justice becomes mere superstition. Law becomes a mere threat, and rights deemed sacred are no more than claims secured by threats.

In America we have rejected these views. For us, the method of balancing competing claims and interests is the technique of law. We picture justice and law as a set of scales, forever weighing contending forces, striving to achieve a balance between them. No one claims for a moment that human beings, fallible, prejudiced, subject to all the whims that flesh is heir to, have succeeded in this effort to achieve a perfect balance. Yet we have sought to approximate an objective viewpoint which has given men the most pervasive sense of freedom which our world has ever known.

Let us but throw aside objectivity and impartiality as goals for one moment, and the system upon which our law is framed collapses. Yet precisely this is what some of our Federal commissions are doing today. Recently a former commission head declared in almost these very terms his skepticism and bias. Law and principles cannot, he declared, be administered objectively and impartially. If this become the theory upon which we are to operate in the future, our law, our courts, and our principles may be tossed into limbo.

There are four basic propositions which underlie administrative absolutism as it is advocated in our country today. (1) It is asserted that laws are illusory, objectivity is impossible; and hence a bureau deciding each case as it chooses is an efficient unit for doing whatever must be done in any event arbitrarily. (2) The advocates of the administrative agency argue that they are set up at the outset for partisan reasons, or to protect the interests of one class at the expense of another. It follows therefore that when the agency is organized, it is justified in hearing but one side, for that is its original purpose. (3) Still a third proposition declares that there are no such things as basic rights, and those who complain that a bureau is depriving them of something are claiming nothing to which they have a right. (4) And lastly, the theory is put forth that law, being no more than a threat of society, may be as arbitrary as it chooses.

Each of these positions is in complete accord with the ideas of the dictatorships. Each of them is directly antagonistic to the established order of the English-speaking world, in which liberty, equality, rights, reason, and justice to all have become the ruling ideals of mankind. American institutions are utterly opposed to the vesting of arbitrary power in one place. We have never placed confidence in a body of "supermen administrators with infallible hunches, guided by a super-superman at the head of an absolute hierarchy."

The absolutist argument permits the determination of issues upon the basis of secret conferences with one side and indifference to the other. It looks with complacence upon tribunals which are at once investigators, prosecutors, and advocates as well as judge. When hearings are conducted as a mere formality with the ultimate conclusion determined long in advance, justice becomes an empty formula.

This is our problem today. It is a problem which requires the interest of every thoughtful citizen of our Nation. For we must rally to keep law in balance. We must summon our forces and gird up our loins to prevent the destruction of the ideals of justice in a world which has learned to scoff but not to cherish.

Challenge to America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES HAWKS, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. STYLES BRIDGES, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. STYLES BRIDGES, of New Hampshire, delivered at the annual dinner meeting of Indianapolis Association of Credit Men, Columbia Club, Indianapolis, Ind., November 3, 1939:

The history of America is a saga of enterprise, of private initiative, and of the courage of men. Not since the beginning of time have men more justified their presence upon earth. Not since the beginning of time have they more fulfilled the purpose of nature. What they have wrought is an enduring monument to the possible accomplishments of men when left free to pursue the creations of their minds.

Down through the years—from the early colonists of Jamestown and of Plymouth, to the men of our time who fly in the planes through the skies and over the seas—the procession has been that of free men of initiative—of men unafraid.

From the travail in which our Government was born and the travail which, time and time again, has invested it since, the same calvacade has emerged to march on—the calvacade of unfettered energies which knew no defeat.

Ours is a land representative of the conglomerate abilities of the Anglo-Saxons, the Irish, the Germans, the Poles, the French, the Scandinavians, and the peoples of southern Europe who left their native heaths because of religious persecutions, because of political or economic motives—but who left above all because they were men and women of initiative, of daring, and of enterprise.

Men who left the shores of Europe in hardly more than skiffs for the darkness over the horizon were not quitters or white corpuscled sissies. They were not afraid or uncertain of themselves—these men who hewed an American way of living out of the wilderness which greeted them. They were not quitters or shuddering men who pushed westward across the Oregon trail in 1842, who went to the Mormon country in '47, and a-seeking California gold in '48.

They were men of free initiative and daring.

I might interject that neither were they intellectuals stopping along the road to quibble over the "isms" of Europe which they had just left.

Pressing forward into the unknown, they could not have been aware of what the future held for them—save for one thing. They were determined that the future return them not to the ideologies and the persecutions of their past.

My friends, those central Europeans and Irish who came pell-mell to our shores in the decade between 1840 and 1850 were not quitters or men without faith in themselves; neither were the 400,000 Scandinavians who by 1890 had come to just one State of our Union.

Indeed, there is no chapter of history that casts a clearer light on the restlessness of men than the babbling tongues of Ellis Island early in this century, when thousands arrived daily from Europe seeking a free outlet for their abilities. It was the pilgrimage of a people fleeing from the oppression of initiative. They were not quitters or frightened men.

My friends, everything we have today—the wealth of our Nation which, from 1790 to 1939, has increased well over three hundredfold—is the result of free initiative. The free initiative of men has brought us through our wars, our panics, our epidemics, and our plagues to become the mighty Nation that we are. Free initiative is our very lifeblood.

It has brought us through the catastrophe of the Civil War, through our sockless Jerry Simpsons, our Henry Georges, our Knights of Labor, our homestead strikes, the World War—down a glorious road of enlightenment and betterment for the people of our country. It must be our sole regret that we could not have lived all through it—could not have come skipping down the road with it—with that abandon of youth which was its characteristic.

But now a challenge has come to America—another challenge. I suppose the present is always more serious than the past, but I believe today's challenge to America is the most serious in her glorious parade.

The panorama of America today is one of millions of people broken in morale, frightened by what the morrow may bring; millions of persons whose initiative and spirit of free enterprise are checked; millions haunted by the specter of war. We find our people clamoring for an indefinable, intangible something known as security when the very state of mind to which they have been driven pushes them farther away from, not closer to, that security which they seek.

And may I say in passing, in connection with this deceptive word "security" that in all of man's struggles from the primitive to his present state, the nearest approach to security is that of the Arab of the desert, who, untroubled by the worries of richer minds, builds his castle with a blanket on the sands of the night.

Surely that is not what the clamorers for the more abundant life desire.

Whence comes this challenge to America? What is it that is tapping our life stream? It is not an enemy from beyond our gates, my friends. No foreign foe is massing her troops against us. There is alarm among our people over a conflict 3,000 miles away, but that alarm is not caused because we are within range of enemy guns.

Ours is an alarm that has its roots somewhere else.

The challenge to America is right here in America.

Coursing our body politic, like the meanderings of a polluted stream, is a fear, a feeling of uncertainty, a weakening of morale. This is the enemy that stands menacingly over America. This is the challenge to America, and tonight I shall try to define it, to bring its many aspects into focus so that we may study its significance.

We have heard so much in recent years about graphs and charts as describing the state of our welfare, that I shall try to draw this picture in similar form.

Thus at the top of the chart we have a centralization of government with an overspreading tyrannical bureaucracy that is pressing our people down.

Our people, whose forefathers fled the compressed existence of Europe years and years ago, are figuratively being huddled for a return to the fatherland. Oh, we won't need boats for this epochal migration. We won't have Hitler's transportation problems in his effort to repatriate the Germans from eastern European states. We solve that problem by letting the American people stay right here while the fatherland's bureaucracy and straight-jacketed way of living is brought over to encompass them. It would thus seem that our intellectuals who are shaping the vast migration are more efficient than their European brethren, though there is scant comfort for us in that.

The American people, my friends, are being calculatingly pressed into a state where they no longer consider their government a sort of necessary evil but rather as something to which they look for sustenance. They look upon their Government not as something to which they give part of their earnings that it may serve as the arbitrator of their affairs; or to act as their servant in matters for which they haven't time—but rather as something that is becoming more and more their master.

More serious still is the way in which American lives and destinies are beginning to revolve around the personality of one man regardless of whether that man be good or bad, whether he be mediocre in ability, or of the stature of a superman.

This is the challenge to America; this is the attitude that is responsible for the people's feeling of insecurity; what is taking out of them that assurance and confidence, that private initiative which has made this country what it is, and our people what they are.

The spectre of European regimentation is rising, out of the mess which the Europeans have made of their lives, to seduce them. The story of our country is coming to be an American odyssey.

Indeed, we have come down a long way from the majesty of State government to a period when it became necessary for the Federal Government to more actively participate in our highway building; down to a period when our growth of interstate commerce gave the Federal Government a more active supervision of our affairs.

In 1887 we set up the Interstate Commerce Commission; in 1890 the Sherman antitrust law was passed—radical departures from the sufficiency of the States. Those things were necessary to our growth. They were enacted after great thought and study.

But in one apparently desperate leap, since 1933, we have attained the state of civilization in which the Federal bureaucracy looks upon the State governments as mere ornamental appendages to decorate our map. The mayors of our cities, one must believe, have as their chief mission the trip to Washington for greater hand-outs.

In our world affairs we don't consider any more that the United States Government exchanges notes, for instance, with the governments of Germany, Great Britain, or Russia. Now our international relations are judged by what F. D. said to Hitler, Chamberlain, and Stalin, and what they said in reply.

The American people have not come voluntarily to this state of affairs. They would not have willingly thrown away their heritage of private initiative, of free play of energies and abilities. It is their Government that has done this to them, their national leadership—and the vehicle that has stolen this heritage has been debt.

A steadily mounting debt has had as its underlying purpose the control of the country's credit system, and when a nation's pocketbook is controlled that nation is effectively strangled.

This is the challenge to America; this is what is bewildering our people, weakening their fiber, and preparing them for their rendezvous with the ugly witch of dictatorship.

Every minute in the day the Federal Government is spending $23,500. And every minute of the day it goes $11,500 deeper in debt. We are now approaching the statutory debt limit of $45,000,000,000, but those in charge of the Government have no intention of letting even that limit stop them. It is up to the American people—reasserting themselves, the American people drinking once more from that golden cup of their ancestors and acting through their Congress—to stop them. This is what the people did, too, in the matter of the spend-lend bill at the last regular session of Congress. This bill was a subterfuge to get around the statutory debt limit, but it did not prevail. You can imagine, though, the fight that confronts the Congress now, what with the European conflict tending to divert the country's attention and very possibly coming to serve as the new avenue of approach on the part of those who want to regiment our lives.

But it is debt that is responsible for the nervousness of our people; it is debt that was responsible for the confusion in which we have been considering a matter that is so vital to all of us—the conduct of our Government during the turmoil abroad.

Let me digress right here to give you some comparisons between this country's position in 1914 and now, 1939, as we contemplate the second world war. You will see what a long way we have come down the road of what is affectionately called progress.

In 1914 the financial establishments of the important governments rested on something as tangible as gold; today all countries are on an inconvertible paper standard and even Great Britain no longer has any gold backing for currency. We have apparently gone out to corner the world's supply of gold in order to plant it underground in Kentucky. Maybe we do this on the assumption that more gold will sprout.

In 1914 a sound currency and a balanced budget were regarded as essential to economic prosperity. Now this Government believes an unbalanced budget to be the key to a newer and better world.

In 1914 our Federal debt was $1,193,000,000 and Federal expenditures were $7.17 per capita.

Today the national debt, including the guaranteed debt, exceeds $46,000,000,000, and the per capita annual Federal expenditures amount to $75.

There was no income tax in 1914. Today the maximum personal income tax is 79 percent.

Do you wonder that the Senate's consideration of the neutrality bill was so hazy?

It is debt that has given a sprawling and insolent army of bureaucrats their grip on the people. It is debt that has brought the Washington government into the intimacy of your lives, made you groggy in the drawing room or in the marts of trade.

And it was planned that way.

From the very first emergency appropriation of more than $3,000,000,000 back in 1933 to relieve distress and to serve as pump priming, the conception of the spenders has never been that primarily of relieving distress or priming the pump, as they claim, but rather to wrap the people for purposes of control in the tentacles of a bureaucracy.

Manifestly, pump priming was not a purpose, because the spending of these billions, and the billions that have followed, has been accompanied by a browbeating, hamstringing of business, of private initiative against which neither business nor initiative could have possibly reared its head. And it is a fact that relieving distress has been secondary to using the money to carry out "reforms"—reforms the most apparent accomplishment of which has been the stirring up of class hatreds, the stirring up of bitterness between employer and employee, between the farmer and the city laborer, between one section against another.

Out of it all, millions of our citizens are still unemployed—a situation which may now be partially relieved by a war boom. Oh, the absurdity of it.

Is there any wonder that millions of our citizens have tended to waste away; is there any wonder that a generation of our people is probably lost?

To find solutions to these serious problems is the challenge to America today.

Is it any wonder that millions of people, instead of being propelled from day to day by the private initiative which sent our products to all four corners of the globe and our men to top heights of inventiveness, are clamoring for an indefinable something called security?

I should like to ask those of you who, perhaps, several years ago asked a women to forego any career which she may have had in mind, and become your wife and the mother of your children, and who has given up her life to that great work and necessarily hasn't been able to keep abreast of the multitudinous commercial aspects of life. Do you know of any way in which you can guarantee her security after your death?

Oh, I know there are many ways—the best that man can devise under the circumstances. But can you honestly look her in the face and say, "In return for the love and assistance you have given me I have arranged that you will never have to worry about food, clothes, and a roof over your head during your life"?

No; you can't promise that. Because neither you nor I can tell what the morrow will bring.

A personality to whom millions pay daily homage is apparently the stability of our dollar, the stability of our securities, the stability of our business, the stability of our lives.

Our whole debt structure, the value of our money, a so-called managed currency, hinge, apparently, upon this personality—his whims and his judgment of what is best for us. Our entire economic fabric is tending more and more to range around him. In fact, he is threatening to become the fabric.

If I may make light of such a dismal picture, our very living is apt to become as mercurial as the Gallup poll, which purports to reflect the popularity of this man from week to week and month to month. One time his stock is up and again it is down.

I talked a few days ago with a businessman who had been quite a critic of the President, but who now said he was coming to believe that he was all right.

"I have been making money the last 3 months," he explained, and it was apparent he felt a distinct sense of gratitude to the President for letting him make it.

But, I say, my friends, that when we as a people come to placing our whole destiny in the hands of one man—to applaud him when we eat and blame him when we don't—then we are ready for the figurative return to the fatherland, with its regimented way of living.

Let me give you an example of how nearly we have come to that:

The assets of the six largest Government corporations total more than $9,000,000,000. The six largest private industrial corporations have assets of only slightly more than $7,000,000,000.

Here are some figures which may be interesting. The assets of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are $1,694,400,000; of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation $3,106,600,000; of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, $1,614,200,000; of the Federal land banks, $2,328,000,000; Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, $469,800,000; Commodity Credit Corporation, $389,900,000.

Now we break down the assets of the six largest private corporations, as follows:

Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, $1,894,900,000; United States Steel Corporation, $1,822,400,000; General Motors Corporation, $1,491,900,000; Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., Inc.; $789,700,000; Standard Oil Company of Indiana, $693,500,000; the Ford Motor Co., $681,600,000.

If you happen to be a stockholder in any one of these private corporations, you are protected by a maze of laws, regulations, regulatory commissions, and bureaus. The officers of the corporations are subjected to penalties of fines and jail imprisonment for misdeeds, and the law requires that full and complete reports must be made at stated intervals.

You unquestionably have a stake in the Government corporations. Yet, I challenge you to try to find out anything about their operations, their bookkeeping, their items of the red and of the black.

They operate completely around the personality we have been talking about.

Then do you wonder that a general uneasiness has crept over the land to debilitate our people and draft heavily of their energies?

This situation is America's challenge today.

But there is one class, you may rest assured, who have not suffered any lessening of morale. They have, instead, become emboldened. Nowhere in the world do I know of a more confident people than those so-called social conscious bureaucrats.

I would like to give you just one example of their cockiness. The Dies Committee Investigating Un-American Activities recently uncovered the fact that some 600 high and low troops of the Washington bureaucracy belonged to what has generally been considered a Communist-front organization—the American League for Peace and Democracy. The organization admittedly receives its greatest single financial contribution from the Communist League.

But has this disclosure excited any of the administration heads? Not in the slightest. Instead, the Dies committee has been denounced for publishing the names of those employed by the Government and holding membership in the league. You would be surprised at the contempt in which Congress is held by the Washington bureaucrats or, rather, the new dealers among them.

It is not at all infrequent these days for a group of Government employees to meet and formally condemn Congress. Now, there is no suggestion anywhere that these people should be denied freedom of speech. It is simply a question of the advisability of having them with their philosophies scattered advantageously throughout the Government for which the American people pay.

But it does not disturb the heads of the Government. I suppose their tolerance is what they have in mind when they bellow that they are a proletarian government, a government for the masses. Those masses which have been taken into the bureaucracy may well feel they have found a government with a social-consciousness, as the term goes, but God help those millions who have been caught in the economic maelstrom of the past 6 years.

My friends, in conclusion I want to state my conviction that when our forefathers left their European closed existences, when they left a living that was parceled out to them, when they left economic and political systems which stifled rather than loosened the energies of men, they had no idea that their sons would ever return, or rather that they would permit that sort of life over here.

There are many things we can get from Europe. For example, the culture of many of its peoples. We can take its great background of history too—but as something to keep in the background.

What we do not want to do is to adopt a way of living on which our grandfathers and great-grandfathers turned thumbs down in generations past.

I have not the slightest doubt that the world is round, but it does not follow that we, after attaining such great heights through the private initiative of our people, should end up whence our forefathers sprang. I pray that our country may be spared such folly.

Education for "The Same" and for "The Different"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. T. V. SMITH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. T. V. SMITH, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address recently made by me.

This address was made at the inauguration as second president of Brooklyn College, New York, October 19, 1939, of Dr. Harry D. Gideonse, a brilliant young economist and publicist of parts. He now presides over an institution where some 13,000 young Americans are working for college degrees. It is this type of work, under this type of leader, upon which we must rely, beyond even the wisest laws, for the preservation of peace and the restoration of prosperity in America, instruction in political leeway, in personal probity, in social tolerance.

The address is as follows:

There is going on in American education, as there is going on throughout the world of power, a struggle between those who want to glorify what is common to men and those who seek to celebrate what is different. One group is for solidarity and order, the other for freedom and variety. Were it not for the struggle between the two, with the shifts in academic population which it sometimes entails, you of Brooklyn would today be inaugurating a different president, I fancy; and we at the University of Chicago would still be enjoying the lively company of this beloved colleague, Harry D. Gideonse. These competing attitudes toward life we need to characterize as clearly as possible for education, not in order to make an "either or" but a "both and" accommodation. For of course both the same and the different are essential parts of life, and so both are proper aims of education. But which comes first and why—and with what strategy shall we treat what comes second?

I. ON EDUCATING FOR THE SAME

If we place exclusive emphasis, as do folk-worshippers, upon the sameness of human nature, then woe to the Jews, for they are different; woe to the capitalists, for they are different; woe to the Catholics, for they are different; then woe at last to the Protestants and even to the Democrats, for they too are different. When indeed we view the different with suspicion, there is nothing that is not different enough to become suspect. This is the psychological meaning of Marxism: since the "class war" requires a class to war against, any group may get marked for liquidation as "a class" in that curious relativity of misplaced malevolence.

I say "misplaced"; for what men hate who professionalize envy is really themselves, though at one time they see themselves projected as kulaks, another time as fascists, and another time as capitalists. Now the same is a hardy plant in the garden of humanism, and needs little cultivation; whereas the different is more delicate and must be nurtured to come to its best. The same seems indeed to grow wild in the bypaths of life, flourishing without attention, until we begin to take our aggressions out on the different. Then it is the same which disappears rather more than the different, as all men drift apart in a social distance of mutual distrust and suspicion. The same grows larger when men are allowed to think differently and are encouraged to individualize their talents.

The moral of this paradox is neatly put in a legend that clusters around a meteor which fell long ago in Africa. The story has it that the massive hulk was pure gold when it landed at the meeting place of three tribal lands. When the neighboring tribes fell to quarreling over it, the gold turned to silver, and later when they fought over it, it turned to iron. Now the base material appears robbed of all its magic.

Nature has indeed laid in us the pure gold of common sympathy and glad understanding. She has made us much alike, and has placed us in a common environment which itself remains largely constant. Whether she has given men an equal measure of political virtue to enable us, as in Plato's beautiful myth, to stand together in strength against the craft of the stronger brutes, she certainly has endowed us with the potency of sympathy and has equipped us with organs and aptitudes that are very much the same. Have we not all eyes? Have we not hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affection, passions, fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer? If you prick us, do we not all bleed? If you tickle us, do we not all laugh? If you poison us, do we not all die?

Yet in spite of all that Nature has done to prosper our similarity, some men make it their business to monopolize this emphasis as though it were wholly neglected by both nature and custom. The Cult of the Folk is such a carrying of coals to Newcastle. The Cult of the Comrade is another such carrying of coals to Newcastle. What is a virtue in the mean can become by overemphasis a vice and even a crime in the extreme. When sociality turns to pure gregariousness, the social same becomes the curse of civilization. For civilization connotes a reverent regard for variation as well as appreciation of similarity. Particularly is this true in the free field of fancy. In nothing are there such easy and such innocent differences as in the proliferations of ideology, political, religious, cultural.

Yet orthodoxy has invaded even that fine, free field to censor the different and to enforce the same. And this has been as true of secular orthodoxy as of the sacred. No inquisition has ever been more ruthless against ideological deviation than the blatantly secular sacerdotalism known as dialectical materialism and its present bloody brother in arms called nazi-ism. Yet I would not willingly withdraw any of the historic dishonor acquired by zealots in behalf of sacred orthodoxy. Both are bad enough. Inquisitions are not made less inquisitive, nor less odious to civilized men, by changing their complexion from sacred to secular or from secular to sacred again. Even as generous a mind as that of Plato at his best, uniting the sacred and the secular, perpetrates in a frenzy of friendliness this joint infamy. Not only was he willing to prescribe a "little gentle violence" for the dissenter's own good, but he was also willing to liquidate those who dared to differ from him on sacred matters of secular metaphysics.

Indeed, we may borrow from Plato the rule stick of overdevotion to the same. It was his conviction that proper objects of thought validate methods of inquiry rather than the methods of inquiry validating objects of belief. In that antithesis we have made conspicuous the logical watershed as between the ancient and the modern civilized world. I say "civilized" world advisedly, for those among us who give way to the undertow toward the same are the barbarians of our time. They have the outlook which Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes once described as perfectly natural, which, of course, it is. Natural also is sadism; so, too, are murder and rape. Natural they all are, but not civilized. Said the great Justice: "Persecution for the expression of opinion seems perfectly logical. If you have no doubt of your premises or of your power and want a certain result with all your heart you * * * naturally sweep away all opposition." This same civilized man, though professing full devotion to truth, admitted that he was not God and, indeed, that he did not know "the truth of truth." Nor do those know more who do not admit it. Affirmation cannot conjure sameness where it does not exist, though it summon it ever so loudly through the metaphysics of power or even through the power of metaphysics.

Unity, however, which cannot be coerced or even metaphysically cajoled may yet be permitted through forbearance or nurtured in strategy. Indeed, without any attention whatsoever, the same, we may now guess, grows more prolific than is requisite for the best balanced social life. As a mere matter of strategy, then, the first emphasis of educational statesmen should be elsewhere; should, in fact, be upon preserving and cultivating the different.

II. ON EDUCATING FOR THE DIFFERENT

It is precisely because being alike is both so natural and so easy to us gregarious animals that it becomes imperative for us to prize more the equally precious, that wherein we are different. Otherwise, returning too ardently to the folds of each other's warmth, we will stagnate in a veritable cesspool of similarity. Art, stifling spontaneity, will be degraded into more and more of the same. Science, inattentive to negative instances, will lose itself in dogma ever repeated so. Religion, ceasing to affirm divine creativeness through human hands, will become sordid superstition exploited in the name of bogus control. All in all, men can easily nuzzle themselves back to savagery in luscious enjoyment all the while of human sameness. That indeed is the direction toward which education as indoctrination points, as, of course, it is the illusive road being blazed for their peoples by all totalitarian tyrants. Beware, too, the scholarly forerunners of fascism who tell you that Gemeinschaft is to be preferred to Geselischaft, that is, that societies that rest upon unconscious sociality are better than those that raise civic relations to a conscious art and celebrate similarity by that legal meeting of minds called contract.

The nurture of the different goes on at two levels. There is the level of tolerance tinged as it is with negativity, and then there is the summit of growth marked by positive embracement of variety as the greatest good. Now it is enough for ordinary social purposes that we maintain the level of tolerance, though individual fulfillment requires more. Tolerance means a hands-off policy with reference to those who disagree with us, giving the young thereby a chance to breathe the air of ideological choice. That much assured, society can grow in the interstices of many a "no man's land." Even this negative virtue is so hard to achieve, however, that it is perhaps all we politicians have a right to ask of educators, or they to demand of us, especially during these days hazardous to any form of sociality save antipathy. The danger is indeed that we politicians at least shall be driven to limit even tolerance to those who are themselves tolerant.

This much, however, is absolutely indispensable to the maintenance of moderate civilization. Think concretely what sustained intolerance would mean to that civilized form of demeanor known as religion. Suppose there was only Judaism in the world, or but Roman Catholicism, or even united Protestanism alone. If you can entertain with pleasure the thought of any such monopoly, then you love provincialism rather than life and light; for life has given birth to all religious "isms" and each of them has shed and does shed some light upon our common path. Civilization could more easily do without all of them than it could do with either of them alone. With either alone piety would sink to superstition, whereas divested of them all our fecund Mother Nature would again produce their counterparts in forms gallantly pluralistic as before.

What I say of religion you will say with equal truth of politics. You know what braying ass the Democratic Party would become, prizing only its provender and kicking at all comers, were it not for the Republican Party to keep alive another order of civic pulchritude, elephantine in proportions. And I know equally well how poor a thing the Republican Party would become, did become, without a strong Democratic Party to keep it circumspect. It is a linguistic token of the pluralistic nature of political virtue that from the beginning in America we have on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday called our country a republic, and on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday called it a democracy. Sunday we have long reserved for moral relaxation in the hinterland of theocracy.

When Communists learn the A B C's of American manners they too may join us Democrats and Republicans at the table of power without grabbing all the food above and kicking all the shins below the linen of civil decency. Surely if Communists can sleep with Fascists, they ought to be able to eat civilly with capitalists. Indeed, having stomached the very dregs of tolerance, Communists as Stalinists might now, it would seem, meet Communists as Trotskyites without spitting at each other in streets as clean as Brooklyn's under LaGuardia. It is but infantile obstreperousness to live on dung and to spit poison when the pantry of power is groaning with viands. With "comrades" and "kamerads" now walking together, let every "Tommy Gallager's Crusade" relax a little toward tolerance and later widen into generosity. For—

"* * * the world is wondrous large,—seven seas from marge to marge—
And it holds a vast of various kinds of man;
And the wildest dreams of Kew are the facts of Khatmandhu,
And the crimes of Clapham chaste in Martaban.

"Here's my wisdom for your use, as I learned it when the moose
And the reindeer roared where Paris roars to-night:—
'There are nine and sixty ways of constructing tribal lays,
And—every—single—one—of—them—is—right!'"

—Rudyard Kipling.

III. ON EDUCATIONAL STATESMANSHIP FOR BOTH THE SAME AND THE DIFFERENT

If educational statesmanship could present to America a generation nerved to see how much of the different can be allowed rather than how much of the same must be exacted, we should at last have entered culturally upon our long heritage of political freedom. The common bond between freemen is surely not to be assumed more tenuous or less precious than the social bond between the unfree. There is a law of compensation which holds that those who lose their unity through freedom shall find it, and those who find their sociality through coercion shall lose it. The message of the college to its students then should but repeat in terms curricular the moral of the poet's age-old wisdom:

Only this gift I beg of you—
Let me be
Swift wings to bear you on your skyward journey—
A sword to cleave your bonds and set you free!
Then, though you drop both out-worn sword and pinions,
I shall not care,
Knowing I gave you wider skies to wander,
And of my love made freedom—not a snare!

—Jamie Sexton Holme.

Or in language less lofty, educational statesmanship will conspire to further what science and democracy unite to illustrate. That is a method the same for all scrupulous minds. Science does not start with objects or beliefs given as sacred, but it starts with a method which, when honestly applied, yields sameness of belief as the reward of effort.

"That that I ask of you," said the great Pasteur to his admirers, "is what you again in your turn demand of the disciples who gather round you; and for the investigator it is the hardest ordeal he can be asked to face—to believe that he has discovered a great scientific truth, to be possessed with a feverish desire to make it known, and yet to impose silence on himself for days, for weeks, sometimes for years, whilst striving to destroy those very conclusions, and only permitting himself to proclaim his discovery when all the adverse hypotheses have been exhausted. Yes; that is a difficult task. But when, after many trials, you have at length succeeded in dissipating every doubt, the human soul experiences one of the greatest joys of which it is capable."

Such is the method of science which constitutes all the sameness that honest and bold minds require until through it they can create more in the name of truth. Such is the virtuosity of science which renders it one of the humanities of our age. One but only one, prerequisite for the humane life. Truth indeed is not the only value which our culture enshrines and which educational statesmanship seeks to perpetuate. The other humanities remain, too, of indispensable importance for the life of mind which colleges serve. Beyond truth lie both goodness and beauty. What of sameness survives in these fields to save their freedom from the bedlam of cultivated differences? In these vaguer regions the spirit of democracy must obtain, as the spirit of science prevails in the realm of stricter logic. The social technique of forbearance saves beauty from bedlam, and the political method of compromise, as practiced by us politicians, prevents good men from destroying good men in the name of goodness itself. Democracy is not a dogma any more than science is prescribed canon. Democracy is whatever can be arrived at democratically, and not another thing. Like science, then, it is a method of our getting ahead without leaving any of us behind. I commend to the "essentialists" in education these two essentials—science and democracy—for conserving the same and for enlarging the different.

In this gallant enterprise of weaving democracy and science into a way of life, you have now a leader, today officially inaugurated, who I think will not fail you in exploiting to the full the cultural potencies of Brooklyn. Indeed, I count on his building many a Brooklyn Bridge from here to connect with every section of our great country. His prospects I envy from an experience of my own.

When I stood for the Illinois Senate some years ago from the Hyde Park district in Chicago, I did so in part because of the extraordinary complexity of the population. Differences that were the raw stuff of community richness were being wasted through suspicion and conflict. My constituency was, speaking generally, half white and half Negro; one-third Jewish, one-third Catholic, one-third Protestant; it was one-half rich, one-half poor; it was half sophisticated, with the proud University of Chicago at its center, and half underprivileged, educationally speaking. What a chance to begin with the negative virtue of tolerance and to drive toward the positive goal of appreciation of variety as the chief ingredient of the best life of man.

The Borough of Brooklyn offers something like the same challenge educationally, I fancy, which Hyde Park offered politically. You have just the man to do this job. You might have searched the world over, as perhaps you did, and not found a person better equipped, temperamentally and philosophically, to shame provincialism into tolerance and to educate tolerance into magnanimity. If I know Gideonse—and we have been together through personal thick and ideological thin—this challenge is probably the chief reason he was willing to leave the rich life of scholarship to undertake this fuller life of educational administration.

Gideonse comes to Brooklyn under hardships that favor preeminent success. The conflict abroad sharpens this problem of the same and the different at home. He brings to the task a free hand. Nobody told me so; but I know Gideonse. There has been no politics in his appointment, and there will be no favoritism in his administration. Nobody told me so; but I know Gideonse—and, incidentally, I know the educational record of LaGuardia, your mayor; and, less incidentally, I know the capacity and sagacity of Ordway Tead, the chairman of your progressive board. Gideonse is not here because he shares the politics now prevailing in either New York City or in Washington. I remark it sadly. I have certainly done my own best, privately and publicly, to set him right; and he and I will shortly be debating publicly again. But he remains independent, treating politics as he treats education, a nonpartisan opportunity to make social life more fruitful and personal life more happy and wholesome.

President Gideonse approaches his task here not only independently but confidently. The world has given him a problem, which he prizes; your board has given him a commission, which he respects; and experience has provided him already with wise cues for fruitfully beginning his task, the task of creating finer human hungers at a time when elemental fear and suspicion threaten to return us all to the level of the pack. As much as any man I know, President Gideonse has the proper slant upon this supreme task of educational statesmanship. I say so because he has right convictions upon the sacredness of the same, sound appreciations of the significance of the different, and the strategy of courage required to interthread the two like the warp and the woof, which they are, of social life.

All of this is but to say that Gideonse has a scientific mind yoked to a very democratic heart. The democratic heart insures against the intellectual conceit which in others ripens into cynicism. It promises that at Brooklyn College, students will be junior partners, faculty members, colleagues in leadership, and citizens the custodians of this community enterprise which he leads. The scientific mind is insurance against every type of provincialism and against one peculiar form of self-deceit. Such a mind does not submit to the impulsion to believe merely because others must dogmatize. Its holder, it so sensitizes to the different, that he knows that all ideas as ideas are equally good. Only those that can be proved true are any better. Since appreciation of ideas does not depend upon their being true—for there remain goodness and beauty as independent bases of appreciation—proof of truth becomes but the burden of science, as tolerance of variety remains the guerdon of the democratic spirit. What cannot be proved to the satisfaction of all trained minds is no matter of truth to be urged by any, but a matter of free appreciation to be tolerated by all and to be enjoyed by such as enjoy it.

Such a mind, I repeat, we induct today into the presidency of this magnificent municipal institution of learning. He will carry forward with considerate courage the honest work of others which he inherits. In doing so, he must be bold for without it the past will peter out in the present. He must be reverent, for without it he will undo all the past and have nothing left on which to build for the future. In this spirit of reverent boldness may Gideonse for many a year become and be the master builder for the Borough of Brooklyn. As earnest of proper orientation, I bequeath to him now this poetic testament of beauty and wisdom—

"THE PALACE

"When I was a King and a Mason—a Master proven and skilled—
I cleared me ground for a Palace such as a King should build.
I decreed and dug down to my levels. Presently, under the silt,
I came on the wreck of a Palace such as a King had built.

"There was no worth in the fashion—there was no wit in the plan—
Hither and thither, aimless, the ruined footings ran—
Masonry, brute, mishandled, but carven on every stone:
'After me cometh a Builder. Tell him, I too have known.'

"Swift to my use in my trenches, where my well-panned groundworks grew,
I tumbled his quoins and his ashlars, and cut and reset them anew.
Lime I milled of his marbles; burned it, slacked it, and spread;
Taking and leaving at pleasure the gifts of the humble dead.

"Yet I despised not nor gloried; yet, as we wrenched them apart,
I read in the razed foundations the heart of that builder's heart.
As he had risen and pleaded, so did I understand
The form of the dream he had followed in the face of the thing he had planned.

"When I was a King and a Mason—in the open noon of my pride,
They sent me a Word from the Darkness—They whispered and called me aside.
They said—'The end is forbidden.' They said—'Thy use is fulfilled.
Thy Palace shall stand as that other's—the spoil of a King who shall build.'

"I called my men from my trenches, my quarries, my wharves, and my sheers.
All I had wrought I abandoned to the faith of the faithless years.
Only I cut on the timber—only I carved on the stone:
'After me cometh a Builder. Tell him, I too have known.'"

—Rudyard Kipling.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, the world will soon realize that Congress in repealing the arms embargo has taken the first step toward the destruction of civilization. In this capitulation to the international financiers and ammunition makers, Congress has not given due consideration to the people who must die because of its act. Congress, in allowing the free sale of ammunition, war materials, and extension of credit by Government corporations, opened the door for a war in Europe that may lead to the destruction of millions of innocent lives.

It is selfish to look at this issue purely from our own viewpoint. A Canadian citizen came into my office a week ago, and said that he hoped we would continue in session for 6 weeks more, so as to give the people now at odds in Europe an opportunity to adjust their differences. This gentleman said that there would be no war in Europe if we retained the arms embargo, and even if we held off our decision for a month or more he believed all the troops would be withdrawn from the battle fronts. He further said that the Canadian people and the British people did not want to fight this war, and that the French soldiers were beginning to realize that this war was for Great Britain, to the last Frenchman.

Mr. Speaker, that is what we should have done, instead of standing on the floor shouting war threats to build up hatreds, and start young men marching to their deaths. The talks given on the floor yesterday were about the most unneutral, unreasonable, and unjust remarks that I have ever heard, and with as little consideration for the consequences as had England, when she banished her own people to penal colonies in the Bay of Bengal and the Pacific Ocean. Little consideration was given to the farmers in the United States, and to the small-business man and to the common people when Congress voted credit for the contemplated war to the same powers that grabbed all the colonies, upset the peace of Europe, and did not even have the honor to pay their honest debts to us. The Members in Congress who voted against the embargo and for this credit did not help the English people but instead helped the internationalists or the invisible government of Europe and the United States to make more money, to enhance their world control, which is ultimately to rule the United States by a dictator chosen from their own ranks.

As further evidence how the people feel about this war in Canada, I shall quote one of the letters which I have received:

DEAR SIR: This line is to thank you for copy of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD covering your speeches, September 25 to October 5, 1939, inclusive, which was sent to me in answer to a letter of mine to you.

I read every word of it—would that there were more like you in Congress.

My first letter was written because of my profound distrust of F. D. Roosevelt, first; and secondly, it is needless to say that anything in the war line the U. S. A. does affects us profoundly here. For instance, the U. S. A. at war would mean immediate conscription in the U. S. A. We here would follow suit just as soon.

The Quebec elections of October 25, hailed far and wide as endorsement of Canada's war efforts, was in part a vote against conscription because every one of the Ottawa ministers who came here to work for the Liberal cause used the slogan, "We are your rampart and bulwark against conscription." "A vote for us Liberals is a vote against conscription," etc., and anyone who knows French Canada, who feels Canada is their only land, home, and interest, and who have no interest in empire, knows their reaction to conscription of their boys of 19 to 21 for England's imperial wars.

The fact is that if this war lasts a few years, this country will be as poor as Panama, and the sooner the U. S. A. takes us and protects us from perpetual British exploitation the better; the better for us anyway.

This is one of several letters I have received from Canada and is similar to the many, many other letters which I have received from our own people. Nobody wants war, and no one has any more desire to see foreign children killed with our ammunition than they have to jeopardize the lives of their own children.

It is for that reason I voted for the arms embargo, and against extension of credit from any source whatsoever to nations now marking time on the battle fronts of Europe, waiting for a green light from us to go ahead.

I am not so afraid of our becoming involved in war, because I do not believe Congress will vote for war, if the Members listen to the wishes of the people they represent.

However, the bill is now passed, and we are not operating under international law, but we are instead operating under an act which is not, as the name implies, a neutrality act but is instead a most vicious and dangerous piece of legislation.

We are in a sad plight indeed, and I am not writing this into the RECORD to reform Congress or to change the Federal Government. I am instead writing it into the RECORD to warn the American people that they are going to lose their Government and be led into another war if they fail to express themselves in a very forcible manner.

I shall ask the people who read this act to study it very carefully. It is printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under the caption "Bill as Passed the Senate," pages 642 to 652. May I first call your attention to the heavy penalties in subsection (b) that may be levied against anyone that innocently or otherwise fails to understand the provisions of this act. When I say, "fails to understand," I mean just that, because it is worded in such manner as to deceive a casual reader.

Subsection (c), after "Transfer of Title," makes it impossible for any citizen of the United States to present a claim for merchandise through the Government of the United States. Now what is the purpose of this? If it is a cash transaction, no transfer of title is needed. But for credit, transfer is necessary. Any business firm, to consummate sale of merchandise, will be forced to operate subject to regulation applied by the Presidential appointees.

Subsection (d) makes it impossible for a United States citizen who insures a ship or cargo in a foreign company to collect such claim by forwarding it to the Government of the United States. Both of these subsections are for the protection of Great Britain, instead of our own business people, for our own merchants can neither collect for merchandise sold to foreign governments, or for insurance if underwritten in foreign companies, by forwarding their claims through the Government of the United States. Everyone must therefore sell for cash alone, and insure in American companies, in order to be protected. The idea is fine, but when this begins to operate, the merchants will also discover that there will be no cash at hand.

Subsection (f) makes it possible for American vessels to carry contraband to foreign nations.

Subsection (g) makes it possible for our ships to carry contraband from longitude 66 west, to the Caribbean Sea, or the east coast of Africa, and as far south as the Tasman Sea, which lies between New Zealand and Australia. There are many other provisions in this act that we cannot enforce, or if we attempt to enforce, which can only lead us into war with such powers as insist on their international rights.

Now let us see what is going to happen. Our ships will leave with contraband cargo to neutral ports, consigned to firms now on the British blacklist. These ships will be hailed and diverted by the English navy to British ports, and cargoes confiscated. This was done during the World War, and it will happen again in this war. During the World War, British cruisers even came within the territorial waters—our 3-mile limit. For further evidence, I refer you to the RECORD of November 1, page 1274.

Other American ships bound to the ports of nations at war, or their territories, will be hailed by German submarines, which they have a perfect right to do, outside of the 3-mile limit. If such ships are loaded with contraband cargo, the German war vessels, not having access to their own ports because of the British blockade, will, to prevent deliveries of such contraband cargo, sink such ships in retaliation to the British blockade of German ports. As long as our merchant ships are not armed, and are distinctly marked, it is my opinion that they will be hailed and the crew transferred or allowed to leave the ship. However, should we decide to arm our merchant ships, they will be considered war craft and sunk without warning. It was such unrestricted submarine warfare that was used during the World War to aline us with Great Britain, and the same attempt will be made in this war when our merchant ships suffer from undersea attack.

The question now arises: Who is responsible for this? And the answer is Congress, for enacting legislation that is clearly unconstitutional, and for allowing the President to enforce such laws as no other nation in the world would attempt to enforce.

Those who have read the papers can readily see what is in the President's mind. He now speaks of the safety band, set aside at the Panama Conference as our territorial waters, when nothing could be more difficult to enforce. Great Britain herself said, shortly after this conference, that if the United States Navy attempted to enforce safety to shipping in these 300-mile zones, it would mean war for the United States, and nothing else. Please understand that this statement was made by officers in the British Admiralty.

Will it be worth while for us to insist on these rights, which have no sanction under international law, outside of our own 3-mile limit, at the expense of loss of ship, cargo, and maybe lives? I think not; but that is what we may expect if we attempt to enforce the present Neutrality Act.

There are many other features in this legislation which will be disputed by all neutral nations. For instance, we have no right to investigate neutral ships, or to inquire into or investigate the source and disposition of their cargoes after they have been cleared from our ports. We are not the world policemen, and if we assume that position, the ultimate outcome can readily be visualized by anyone who understands these problems.

What did the Congress of the United States do in the repeal of the Neutrality Act? The Congress enacted into legislation, as I have said before, a most unneutral act which is for no other purpose except to give the President and his appointees, under the sanction of law, the power to involve this country in war. He did not want the embargo clause, for if our ships were sunk, under this clause responsibility would fall upon the Federal Government for violation of the law, or clearing such ships to nations at war. As it is now responsibility falls entirely upon Congress, so the President is still in the position in which he has always been in relation to Congress: It is heads he wins, and tails Congress loses. The President's attitude toward Congress is better expressed by himself, when he accepted an invitation to go to Chicago in April. He said he would accept the invitation "if Congress will behave."

The majority in Congress did behave on November 2, because the majority stood stanchly by the President, and equally solidly against the wishes of the American public. So the President should have no complaint on that score, in spite of the fact that he said he would leave the legislation alone. President Roosevelt has never left any legislation alone, but has instead used every resource to chisel more and more power from the supine Members of Congress who have forgotten their obligation to the people.

Congress, in voting for this act, committed the youth of Australia, Canada, England, France, Germany, and other nations that will become involved in this war to a slaughterhouse on the battlefields of Europe. The people in none of these countries wanted war. They did not want to become involved in this conflict, for all of them realize that it is for no other purpose but to satisfy the desire of the internationalists so that they may, true to their stripe, vent their hatred upon a nation that has selected to get along without them. If it were in my power, I would see that this crowd of international exploiters were all represented in the first shock unit to enter this fray. It would be a blessing to civilization if we could get rid of them now and forever. If that were possible, the world could again enjoy peace and harmony.

Let us now visualize what may happen—and I insert these remarks in the RECORD with the hope that they may be distributed among the people of the United States, so that they will not again be fooled when the war mongers begin to loosen their barrage of propaganda. Under this act the President may, with little or no restriction, send American ships, not only loaded with contraband but with war material as well, to nations in war zones and also to nations at war. What will this mean? It will mean nothing else except that American merchant ships will be hailed by enemy craft, examined, and if they are found to carry contraband cargo, or any cargo to nations at war, they will be sunk. The American people must now realize that it is strictly within the rights of belligerent powers to sink such ships, whether they belong to us or any other neutral nation. Other neutral nations realize this and make no complaint when such misfortune befalls them. Such ships are, of course, running the blockade of enemy powers and must, therefore, take the consequences.

President Roosevelt is not going to accept such losses without wailing to high heaven that his mandate has been violated. He does not know that the jurisdiction of the United States ends at the 3-mile limit. The zones which Congress has set aside are in direct conflict with international law, and the President's proclamation is not recognized by belligerents or any neutral nation.

I hope that Members of Congress will realize, as I have said in previous remarks, that the dangerous part of this legislation was in the act itself and not alone in the arms-embargo clause. This action of Congress may have a very far-reaching effect, but whatever happens it is an injustice to everyone who will be compelled to put on a uniform and die in an attempt to place world powers under domination of the international money barons. It will not be long until we will begin to sustain losses, and when such losses are registered in our daily papers, I want the fathers and mothers in these United States to remember that the majority that voted for this act, the majority that sustained the wishes of the administration, is solely responsible for such losses. When the reports begin to come in, the people should demand that Congress repeal the powers given to the President by repealing the present so-called Neutrality Act. The people should also demand that the Executive Department be shorn of all unconstitutional power that has been granted over a number of years, until that Department comes strictly within Article II of the Constitution of the United States. It is only in that manner that this country can be saved for future generations. I dislike to make such statements as these, but I feel it my duty, as a citizen, as a Member of Congress, and a Representative of my people in Montana, as well as of the United States, to adhere to my obligations to preserve, to protect, and defend the Republic of the United States against all enemies.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, undeniably, the French and the English and even Americans who cherish a democratic form of government, who look upon their independence, freedom of speech, and the right of worship as they choose as something indeed precious and worthy of every endeavor to preserve, are here publicizing the cause of the Allies. Americans do this because they believe in a democracy and its fine institutions, which permit them to speak openly, as they do without fear or undue favor. They have in great numbers placed themselves strongly and unreservedly on record as favoring a revision of the present so-called neutrality law. Now, there are also those who call this propaganda, and it may, perhaps, be properly designated as propaganda. But I cannot bring myself to find fault with this type of honest and informative propaganda, because it is in the last analysis born of true Americanism and carries no tinge of malevolent alien philosophies.

There is another type of propaganda for which I have not the slightest sympathy. I refer to the propaganda that springs, not from Americanism, but from ties with foreign countries that do not share our beliefs in freedom and equal opportunity for righteous development. It comes from sources that unmistakably place the interests of alien peoples above our own. Some of this homicidal extravaganza clearly comes from sources readily identified as inimically foreign. I mean, for example, the recent putrid emissions of the Russian, Molotov, emissions given wings on the eve of an important vote in this Congress and plainly calculated to influence our action. That type of propaganda must be criticized as coming from the selfish; and even more open to justifiable criticism is the inane drivel disseminated, many times for cash, by individuals and organizations that cloak their real identity with duty and patriotism, and while emphasizing that they are American citizens indeed attack and attempt to destroy all that we true Americans hold dear.

I would not expect one of European birth to forever forget his native land, even after he acquired American citizenship; but I do expect, and this country has the right to demand, that he take seriously the oath of allegiance he swears to this country, and place its interests above the interests of any other country whatsoever.

I cannot too strongly condemn the man who freely becomes a citizen of the United States, accepts all the benefits thereof, and then gives time and effort to conduct that falls little short of treason. In saying this I refer specifically to the conduct of such men as Ten Ecks and Walter Silge, both former German Army officers who served in the World War, and who are now American citizens. These men have the colossal audacity to accept citizenship in this great country, in which every citizen is a sovereign, but in which no one cares to wear a crown, and they join hands with others in the diffusion of misinformation and poison tending to encourage insidious machinations looking to causing this very Congress to take action detrimental to the national welfare.

Some of these men I have in mind, who are citizens of the United States by suffrance only, do not content themselves with an appeal to reason and logic, they do not stop at patent and befogging contradictions, they do not stop at cajolery and flattery, but they go the limit and threaten and try to intimidate the Members of this Congress in the conscientious discharge of a serious duty to be performed here. These notorious, national rascals have received an answer from the Members of Congress. The vote on the pending legislation puts them in a most unenviable position, especially with their own dupes.

Let me read a letter I have received from the Deutsch-Amerikanisch Einheitsfront—translated it becomes the German-American National Alliance, Inc. Its address is post-office box 492, Chicago, Ill. The letter says:

SEPTEMBER 1939.

HON. ADOLPH SABATH,
United States Representative from Illinois,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We attach hereto a list recording the voting of the Members of the House of Representatives in matters of the Bloom fake neutrality bill. We have tried to correctly set forth therein the vote of each Member and would appreciate to have you check the list concerning your vote. If an error or omission has taken place, kindly so advise us, so that we may change the list accordingly before we give it national publicity through the various channels open to us.

In the event of a special session of Congress and further voting on the matter of neutrality by the House of Representatives, we shall revise the list according to the vote then given before giving it wide circulation.

Permit us to state that we are aiming to pledge all of our members and members of all organizations which are or may become affiliated with us to assist in preventing by lawful means any person from ever again holding a public office who votes for the enactment of legislation or termination of existing laws as a result whereof the sale of arms, munitions, and implements of war would be permitted in the matter of the present European conflict.

We are convinced that such action on part of Congress would lead us into the present European war, which is of no concern to our country.

Very truly yours,

GERMAN-AMERICAN NATIONAL ALLIANCE,
PAUL F. WARNHOLITZ,
Chairman of Committee on Public Affairs.

This is one of the most arrogant pieces of propaganda that has ever tried to insult my intelligence. This character of the individual and this organization he represents has no place in the public life of a true democracy. The letter just read shows clearly that its author and those he represents believe in intimidation and force, as practiced by the Nazis they ape, rather than the orderly democratic processes of our Government and society.

From Chris Claussen, secretary of the German-American Citizens' League, Chicago, Ill., one who is very active in the bund, I have the following letter under date of October 31, 1939:

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The German-American Citizens' League at its regular delegate meeting on October 30, passed a resolution instructing the secretary to write our Representatives in Congress requesting them to cast their vote against any change in the present Neutrality Act, and any attempt to repeal the arms embargo, thereby keeping our country out of any future war.

Very truly yours,

CHRIS CLAUSSEN, Secretary.

Again, from the National Federation of American Citizens of Germanic Descent, Chicago, Ill., I have this telegram, which is equally as insulting as the communication of the German-American National Alliance, dated October 31, 1939:

Don't join warmongers, "pork barrel" beneficiaries, munitions makers, and Benedict Arnolds in betraying American youth in gambling their lives to fight British wars. Defeat the counterfeit neutrality bill; keep arms embargo and keep America out of war.

Mr. Speaker, I deplore this to a greater extent than the intimidation and insinuations of voluble Father Coughlin and the Nazi leaders, with their cascades of lies, because I consider it potentially dangerous to our democratic institutions, and sooner or later may create fundamental disturbances, seriously undermine confidence in our form of government and in its institutions. As history shows, people are easily misled or deceived. With such dangerous discussion, I fear it may become necessary that a firm stand be taken against all offenders against our peace and tranquillity.

As I stated on the floor a few days ago, a majority of those opposed to the repeal of the Embargo Act do not take this position because to do so may lead us in war but that it may aid the democratic nations. As Senator GLASS and others have stated, and as the Gallup poll shows, about 98 percent of the American people condemned Hitler when he shamefully deprived the Austrians of their country, when the brave, peace-loving and liberty-loving Czechoslovaks were forced under Nazi domination, and when he without justifiable reason or remorse brutally destroyed the Polish Republic and robbed all of the peoples of those countries not only of their liberty of action but also their right to worship according to their dictates. Do the Nazi-Communist leaders believe they can continue their nefarious activities to bring discord in our land? If they do, they are overestimating the tolerance of the American people for their subversive activities.

Mr. Speaker, many Americans of German descent have expressed to me their displeasure for such communications as I have read to you. They are the kind of naturalized citizens that take the allegiance they swore to this Nation seriously. They are unselfishly interested in our country because it is their country, too. I know that the majority of naturalized Germans in this country are loyal to their oaths of allegiance and our form of government. I speak not against them, because I know them to be the finest type of citizens. I know their sterling worth, their patriotism, honesty, and integrity, and I am proud that many of them are my good friends. Of the other class, the unpatriotic fomenters of discord, the Nazi-Fascist-led goose-steppers and their mouthpieces, the bellowing and bristling rhetoricians who continually emit for cash reward immeasurable platform and press sewage, I can speak only with contempt. Their unredeeming disgrace is that they publicly exhibit their unworthiness to be called citizens of the United States, whose flag is loved while many other flags are feared.

Mr. Speaker, as between the late Cardinal Mundelein, bishop of the Catholic diocese of Chicago, and hundreds of outstanding clergymen of our country, among whom are Rt. Rev. Benjamin D. Dagwell, bishop of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of Oregon; Rev. J. Stanley Durkee, Plymouth Congregational Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Rev. Frederick B. Harris, Foundry Methodist Church, Washington, D. C.; Rev. Harold C. Phillips, First Baptist Church, Cleveland, Ohio; Dr. George W. Richards, president, Theological Seminary of Reformed Churches in United States, Lancaster, Pa.; Dr. Minot Simons, All Souls Unitarian Church, New York City; Dr. Joseph A. Vance, First Presbyterian Church, Detroit, Mich.; Dr. Stephen Wise, rabbi, Free Synagogue, New York City; Dr. Morris S. Lazaron, rabbi, Baltimore Hebrew Congregation, Baltimore, Md.; and the Nazi-inspired fulminations, I chose to follow the pleas for repeal of the embargo law by these eminent churchmen, in that revision will insure safeguards best calculated to keep us out of war. Further, I was strengthened in my decision to vote for the lifting of the embargo by consideration of the appeals of hundreds of patriotic American organizations on the one hand and the threat of the bund and the German-American National Alliance on the other. It has been easy for me and everybody else to line up with the proper force. As between those who fear that the neutrality bill may aid the democratic countries against pagan Germany, they thereby showing a greater interest in the Hitler regime, and the thousands of letters coming from real Americans who have the interest of our country at heart first, last, and all the time, I feel it is our duty to follow the latter, who reflect in undimmed splendor the desires and policies of our great leader, the President of the United States.

I am making this statement for the following reasons: Since Monday I have received a large number of letters inspired, I am sure, by Father Coughlin and the German-American National Alliance. Some of these communications carry what I consider outrageous threats, and I shall read a few of the intimidations.

Hitler-Nazi representatives here, such as Fritz Kuhn, with the ululations of the congenital liar he is; Father Coughlin, with his phantasmagoria of pulpit oratory; and many others, even though they were not here during the World War, have unworthily charged, simply to try to shape opinion against this administration on the subject of neutrality, that President Wilson promised the country at the time of his campaign for reelection to keep us out of war and within a very short time thereafter he unjustifiably plunged us into war. The inference is, of course, that President Roosevelt, although promising to keep us out of war, will by the new Neutrality Act force us into war.

To those who make that charge against that great American, Wilson, I answer that it is absolutely false, and I ought to know, because I am the only sitting Member of this House who was during the World War a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Those who lived as adults at that time and scholars will remember that during 2 years preceding our entering the World War the press generally and a large sector of our citizens under the leadership of Theodore Roosevelt urged that we enter the war. Sentiments and passions ever ran high in some quarters after the sinking of the Lusitania on May 7, 1915, with loss of 1,134 lives, including 144 Americans. Fortunately, though, President Wilson, great historian that he was, remained adamant in the presence of a white-heat pressure that was not easy to withstand in the face of the German submarine campaign and many and multiplying depredations against our domestic property under the planning of those arch-plotters Von Bernstorff and Dumba and execution of their understraps, Von Papen and Boy-ed.

At this time I will make part of the RECORD an article by Parke Brown in the Chicago Tribune of October 1, 1939, the very organ that now so viciously and unwarrantably attacks the President, showing the results of these conspiracies. It says:

REIGN OF TERROR IN PRE-WAR ARMS DEALS RECALLED—NATION RAVAGED BY PLOTTERS IN 1914–16 ERA

(By Parke Brown)

The experience of the United States in manufacturing munitions for belligerents while attempting to maintain its own neutrality was recalled yesterday by an examination of newspaper files covering the period of the World War prior to the entrance of this country into the hostilities.

During that period of approximately 20 months there were scores of explosions in munition plants, incendiary fires were frequent, attempts to dynamite railroad trains and bridges were common, spy plots were directed at ships carrying war supplies, and there were some attempts at assassination. An effort to start a Mexican war was made.

TOLL NEVER COMPUTED

As far as is known, there never has been an accurate, official counting up of the cost in lives and property.

In spite of the secrecy with which all of these forms of violence was surrounded, Federal agents repeatedly traced crimes to representatives of belligerent nations. Official representatives of those nations were recalled upon demands from President Wilson. Some of the unofficial representatives were convicted and sent to prison.

The extreme nature of some of the disturbances was illustrated in the newspaper files by the actions of one man—Frank Holt, alias Erich Muenter, formerly a teacher in a Chicago private school. On July 2, 1915, he attempted to blow up the Capitol Building in Washington, D. C., and the following day tried to kill J. Pierpont Morgan in his home in Glen Cove, Long Island. He said his motive was to stop the exportation of munitions.

BOMB PLACED IN OFFICE

Holt, or Muenter, placed his Washington bomb in the reception room of Vice President Marshall, adjoining the Senate Chamber. The explosion occurred at 11:40 p. m., when that part of the building was unoccupied except for a guard, who was thrown off his chair. The damage was limited to walls, windows, and furniture.

When Holt went to the Morgan home he forced an entrance by pointing two revolvers at a butler. He found Morgan on the second floor and fired two shots at him, both of which struck his victim in the hip. The wounds were not serious.

Examination of the newspaper files was limited to crimes within the borders of the United States, all mention of violations of international law at sea or in other countries being ignored. Developments in the diplomatic situation which ended in war also were disregarded.

DISTURBANCES ARE REVIEWED

The files showed, as strictly domestic disturbances due to the sale of munitions to belligerents, the following events:

1914

August 29: Pompton, N. J., Du Pont powder storehouse blown up; one killed.

December 23: Picatinny, N. J., Government arsenal mixing house set on fire.

1915

January 18: Trenton, N. J., plant of John A. Roebling Co., making chains for French Army, destroyed by fire believed caused by bomb; damage, $1,500,000.

February 12: Haskell, N. J., explosion in Du Pont plant; three injured.

March 6: Haskell, N. J., explosion in Du Pont plant; five killed.

April 1: Alton, Ill., explosion in Equitable Powder Co. plant; five killed.

April 30: Carneys Point, N. J., Du Pont plant mixing house destroyed by explosion; six injured.

May 12: Wellington, N. J., Anderson Chemical Co. guncotton storehouse wrecked; three killed.

May 15: Carneys Point, N. J., Du Pont Co. stillhouse destroyed by two explosions.

June 26: Wayne, N. J., Du Pont mill demolished by explosion.

July 13.—Jefferstontown, Ky., United Safety Powder Co. mixing building wrecked by explosion, three killed; Carneys Point, N. J., two Du Pont Co. buildings wrecked by explosion; one killed, three injured.

August 3: Philadelphia, explosion in Frankford Arsenal; three killed.

August 16: Simamahoning, Pa., explosion in plant of Aetna Explosives Co.; five killed.

August 25: South Bethlehem, Pa., shell explosion in Bethlehem Steel Works; two killed.

August 30: Baltimore, Md., E. J. Dodd shrapnel plant burned.

August 30: Official letter from Constantin T. Dumba, Ambassador of Austria-Hungary to United States, seized and disclosed he planned to "disorganize and hold up for months, if not entirely prevent, manufacture of munitions in Bethlehem, Pa., and Middle West, which, in opinion of German attaché, is of great importance and amply outweighs expenditure of money involved."

September 10: Ambassador Dumba's recall demanded by President Wilson.

October 12: Pompton, N. J., explosion in Du Pont powder plant; seven injured.

October 16: Kane, Pa., explosion in Aetna powder mills; three Germans arrested.

November 10: South Bethlehem, Pa., machine shop of Bethlehem Steel Co. burned; loss, $5,000,000.

November 12: Trenton, N. J., munitions plant of Roebling & Sons destroyed by incendiary fire; loss, $1,500,000.

December 1: Wilmington, Del., explosion in Du Pont powder mills; 31 killed.

December 3: United States asked Germany to recall Captain Boy-ed, military attaché, and Captain von Papen for "improper activities in military and naval matters."

December 10: Hopewell, Pa., entire town destroyed and Du Pont powder plant burned with loss of $2,000,000.

1916

February 15: Brooklyn, N. Y., two British ships burned at docks; loss, $1,000,000.

March 31: Horst von der Goltz disclosed plot to invade Canada, blow up Welland Canal, and admitted enlisting Germans in Baltimore.

April 19: Government seized papers of Wolf von Igel, former secretary to Captain von Papen, in New York "advertising office." State Department later said they disclosed maintenance of a spy system, financing a bureau to stir up labor troubles in munitions plants, "the bomb industry and other related activities," financing of propaganda and subornation of American writers and lecturers.

July 30: Black Tom, N. J., ammunition trains blown up; four killed; loss, $45,000,000.

1917

January 11: Franz Bopp, German consul general in San Francisco, and Baron George W. von Brincken convicted of conspiracy to injure American shipping, railroad trains, bridges, and munitions plants, and sentenced to 2 years' imprisonment.

January 12: Kingsland, N. J., munitions plant of Canadian Car & Foundry Co. destroyed by explosion; loss, $16,000,000; Haskell, N. J., explosion in Du Pont powder plant blows up 400,000 pounds of powder, shaking four States.

February 21: United States published note from German Foreign Secretary Zimmermann proposing alliance with Mexico, for which Mexico would be paid by annexation of Southwestern American States; New Britain, Conn., set afire by incendiary bombs in 20 places; loss, $300,000.

March 22. Capt. Franz von Rintelen, of German Navy, and two others convicted in New York of conspiracy to interfere with shipment of munitions.

April 2: Six Germans convicted in New York of conspiracy to destroy munitions ships by bombs; attempt made to burn naval training station at Great Lakes, Ill.

On April 2, 1917, Congress met in special session. On April 4 the Senate passed the war resolution. The House passed the resolution April 6, and it was signed the same day by President Wilson. The formal declaration of war against Germany was issued immediately.

Only a few days ago, after 20 years' investigation, the United States-German Claims Commission awarded the United States $50,000,000 on account of the Black Tom, N. J., ammunition explosion of July 30, 1916, caused by German sabotage within our borders.

Here are the historical facts: On February 3, 1917, President Wilson laid before the Congress the extraordinary announcement of the Imperial German Government that on and after February 1, 1917, it was its purpose to put aside all restraints of law or of humanity and use its submarines to sink every vessel that sought to approach either the ports of Great Britain and Ireland or the western coasts of Europe or any of the ports controlled by the enemies of Germany within the Mediterranean. That had seemed to be the object of the German submarine warfare earlier in the war, but since April 1916 the Imperial German Government had somewhat restrained the commanders of its undersea craft in conformity with its promise to us that passenger boats should not be sunk and that due warning would be given to all other vessels which its submarines might seek to destroy when no resistance was offered or escape attempted, and care taken that their crews were given at least a fair chance to save their lives in their open boats.

That new policy swept every restraint aside. Vessels of every kind, whatever their flag, whatever their character, their cargo, their destination, their errand, were ruthlessly sent to the bottom without warning and without thought of help or mercy for those on board—the vessels of friendly neutrals along with those of belligerents. Even hospital ships and ships carrying relief to the sorely bereaved and stricken people of Belgium, although the latter were provided with safe conduct through the prescribed area by the German Government itself and were distinguished by unmistakable marks of identity, were sunk with the same reckless lack of compassion or of principle. In short, the German Government promised us that her submarines would operate according to international law and humane principles, and she then broke that promise, which led to our entering the war.

Again, that Germany during the World War meant to stir up enemies against us at our very doors, the intercepted note of the German Foreign Minister, Zimmerman, to the Government of Mexico is positive evidence. In that matter, you will recall, the Germans promised to partition the southwestern part of the United States between Mexico and Japan if they would join her in warring on us.

These are the circumstances under which we entered the World War. We entered that war only after there had been very many serious offenses committed by the Central Powers, any one of which offenses was sufficient to cause war.

I wish to point out that it was not the kind of cargo our vessels carried that brought us into the World War; it was not what they had on board. As I have pointed out, what brought us into the World War was the unrestricted submarine warfare, when German announced she would sink all kinds of vessels carrying on commerce with her enemies. Our neutral ships were going about their own lawful business out on the high seas, where they had a right to be. They were on the high seas under the sanction of international law, under the sanction of law which had been venerated and observed by the nations for hundreds of years, and American citizens on those ships were murdered and sent to the deep. Those American ships, not carrying arms, not carrying ammunition, but carrying general cargoes, were sunk. That is why we voted a war—because of the murder of American seamen and other American citizens and the destruction of our property, while they were in the pursuit of their lawful business upon the peaceful highways of the sea.

I give a list of American vessels and their cargoes sunk by German submarines. First is the William P. Frye, sunk by a German raider on January 28, 1915. It carried a cargo of wheat.

The Cushing, on April 28, 1915, was attacked by a German airship. It carried a cargo of petroleum, no arms, no ammunition. Of course, it may be said that petroleum is used in warfare, and that is true. Wheat is also used in warfare, just as I have been saying. What leads to the sinking of the ships is not that they carry arms and ammunition; it is the fact that they carry anything useful in war, and in modern warfare nearly everything is useful. The ships will be sunk with the Embargo Act on the statute books just as they sank them during the World War.

The Nebraska, on May 1, 1915, was torpedoed by a German submarine. She was in ballast. The Nebraska carried no arms, carried no munitions, carried no implements of war. It carried no war supplies at all. It carried only water, water in ballast, and yet the Germans sank that ship.

The Gulflight, on May 20, 1915, was torpedoed by a German submarine. It carried a cargo of oil. It carried no munitions, no implements of war. Yet it was sunk. Such a ship can be and would be sunk under the present embargo law because there is no limit on these things.

The Leelanaw was sunk by torpedo and shell fire, July 25, 1915. It carried a cargo of flax. Again I wish to invite the attention to the fact that the Leelanaw carried flax. It carried no arms, no munitions, and no cannon, but carried a little bit of flax. The Germans sank that ship just as they will sink ships carrying flax in the present war. Unless we repeal the embargo law and put a real neutrality law on the books, the Germans can sink American vessels carrying flax to warring nations.

The Oswego, on August 14, 1915, was fired on 10 times, but made port. Well, she was lucky.

The Petrolite, on December 5, 1915, was fired on by the Austrian submarine repeatedly after vessel had stopped. The vessel carried a cargo of oil.

The Seaconnet, on June 18, 1915, was damaged by mine or torpedo. It carried a cargo of timber. Timber! It carried no arms, no munitions, no implements of war, but carried some timber, possibly from Oregon or Washington. But someone may say, "The enemy might make clubs from that timber and fight with the clubs." The Germans did not ask whether or not that would be done. They said, "This ship carries a cargo of timber. We are going to sink her. The enemy might make fortifications out of the timber."

I do not want to burden the House with reading the long list of ships which were sunk during the World War. I have not been able to examine the cases in detail, but, so far as I have examined them, not a single one of those ships carried arms, munitions, or implements of war; yet they were sunk.

During the World War and prior to the United States entering that war Germany sank or attacked the following steamships:

William P. Frye, January 28, 1915. Sunk by German raider Prinz Eitel Friedrich. Crew taken off. Carried a cargo of wheat (American Journal of International Law, vol. 9, 1915, special supplement Diplomatic Correspondence Between the United States and Belligerent Governments Relating to Neutral Rights and Commerce, p. 180).

Cushing, April 28, 1915. Attacked by German airship. Carried cargo of petroleum. (New York Times, May 1, 1915, p. 1, column 7.)

Nebraska, May 1, 1915. Torpedoed by German submarine. In ballast. (New York Times, May 27, 1915, p. 1, columns 4, 5.)

Gulflight, May 20(2?), 1915. Torpedoed by German submarine. Proceeded. Carried cargo of oil. (New York Times, May 3, 1915, p. 1, column 8.)

Leelanaw, July 25, 1915. Sunk by torpedo and shell fire. Carried cargo of flax. (New York Times, July 27, 1915, p. 1, column 8.)

Oswego, August 14, 1915. Fired on 10 times, but made port.

Petrolite, December 5, 1915. Fired on by Austrian submarine repeatedly after vessel had stopped. Carried cargo of oil. (New York Times, December 8, 1915, p. 2, column 1; December 9, 1915, p. 3, column 2.)

Seaconnet, June 18, 1915 (1916). Damaged by mine or torpedo. Carried cargo of timber. (New York Times, June 21, 1916, p. 6, column 3.)

Kansan, October —, 1916. Fired on by U–53, leaving United States. Struck mine after reaching other side. Six men injured in mine explosion. Carried cargo of war supplies and horses. (New York Times, October 15, 1916, sec. 1, p. 2, columns 4–6.)

Lanao (Philippine), October 28, 1916. Destroyed by German submarine. Carried cargo of rice. (New York Times, November 7, 1916, column 4, p. 1.)

Columbian, November 7, 1916. Sunk by German submarine.

Chemung, November 26, 1916. Sunk by Austrian submarine. Carried a general cargo, including 5,760 plates of spelter, 854 tons pig iron, 300 coils of copper wire, 36 barrels of copper, 200 bales of cotton, 153 cases of iron wire, and quantities of provisions; no ammunition or powder on her manifest. (New York Times, November 29, 1916, p. 1, column 1.)

St. Helens, December 10, 1916. Attacked by German submarine.

Rebecca Palmer, December 14, 1916. Fired on by German submarine. Damage light.

Galena, December 15, 1916. Fired on by German submarine.

Sacramento, January 9, 1917. Fired on by German submarine.

Westwego, January 21, 1917. Stopped by German submarine, but allowed to proceed.

Housatonic, February 3, 1917. Sunk by German submarine. Carried a cargo of contraband. (New York Times, February 4, 1917, sec. 1, p. 1, column 5.)

Lyman M. Law, February 13, 1917. Burned by submarine.

Communipaw, December 3, 1915. Fired on, but proceeded. Carried cargo of oil. (New York Times, December 8, 1915, p. 1, column 8.)

Algonquin, March 12, 1917. Sunk by German submarine. Carried cargo of foodstuffs. (New York Times, March 15, 1917, p. 1, column 8.)

City of Memphis, March 18, 1917. Sunk by gunfire. In ballast. (New York Times, March 19, 1917, p. 2, column 8.)

Illinois, March 18, 1917. Sunk by submarine. In ballast. (New York Times, March 19, 1917, p. 2, column 1.)

Vigilancia, March 18, 1917. Sunk by submarine. Carried general cargo. (New York Times, March 19, 1917, p. 2, column 3.)

Evelyn, sunk by mine outside war-zone limits. Carried cargo of cotton. (February 22, 1915, p. 1, column 8.)

Carib, sunk by mine off German coast. (February 24, 1915, p. 1 columns 5, 8.)

The Congressional Library compiled this information with respect to American Merchant ships sunk or attacked prior to the United States' entry into the World War.

Several weeks ago it was asserted in responsible quarters that millions of dollars had been deposited in this and other countries to the credit of Hitler, Goebbels, and other high German officials. I have positive information that these moneys have been deposited in America for propaganda purposes.

The Task of the People in Maintaining Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, the Congress of the United States has spoken on our neutrality legislation and on our foreign policy. I fervently hope and pray that it will turn out for the best. I want the United States to remain at peace, and not be dragged through the devastating experience of another war. I do not find it necessary to reiterate the horrors of modern warfare or the unsound economic situation that will follow.

The foreign policy of the United States is now fixed. I believe that it is the prayer of every American that America will be successful in steering clear of war, and that those in charge of executing that policy will be guided by a spirit of strict neutrality and absolute impartiality.

There is a task for the people. The people are the authors of public opinion. If we are to have peace, the people must not let up on their determination to stay out of the present conflict in Europe.

Mr. Speaker, may I submit for the consideration of the Nation a few suggestions for the people to follow in doing their part to maintain neutrality in the United States?

First. We should be tolerant and give due respect to the opinions of our fellow Americans. The throttling of free speech and of truth are steps toward war and not toward peace.

Second. We should turn our attention to the unsolved problems of our Nation. Give the farmer the American market. Give employment to our unemployed. We should loosen the bonds that strangle business and begin to reduce our national debt.

Third. We should be neutral in our attitude, our conversation, and our actions. Whenever any citizen undertakes to condemn any foreign government, they are playing with the lives of American boys.

Fourth. We should resist all the propaganda that arouses the passions of hatred and war that comes to us in the newspapers, over the radio, or in the theater. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." If we are to have peace we should be peace loving and not inflame the passions of hatred and savagery.

Fifth. We should keep in mind that no nation wants the United States in this war as their enemy. If we are dragged into this war it may be by the trickery, false propaganda, and lies of those nations who would desire to have us as their ally. Again I say, no nation wants the United States as their enemy, for it would mean sure defeat to them. A deluge of "isms" will follow in the wake of the war in all countries participating.

Sixth. Under any plan of neutrality there may be the loss of American lives and property. If we are to be a neutral, we must pay the price. The worth-while things in life cost something. We should prepare ourselves now for the shock of such losses and keep in mind that war does not settle anything. In view of the firm determination of the American people to stay out of this war, all of our citizens traveling abroad are now proceeding at their own risk.

Seventh. The American people should pray as they never have prayed before that the God of peace will guide and direct the minds and hearts of those in whose hands the destiny of America lies. With God, nothing is impossible. He alone can melt the hearts of the warmongers.

Mr. Speaker, again I repeat I am opposed to the United States policing the world, and I do not want the life of one American boy sacrificed on the battlefields of Europe.

When the Game Is Power Control by Captains of Munitions, Mere Men Only Fight and Die for Barbarism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE OREGON SUNDAY JOURNAL

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which was printed in the Oregon Sunday Journal of October 29:

[From the Oregon Sunday Journal of October 29, 1939]

WHEN THE GAME IS POWER CONTROL BY CAPTAINS OF MUNITIONS, MERE MEN ONLY FIGHT AND DIE FOR BARBARISM

"Steadily the conviction strengthens that in this great war, political leaders and captains of industry, more than at any time in history, have plucked the actual control from the generals. The command to advance, or order for an air raid, or lack of such command, is apparently determined far from the front line, more than ever before. Strictly military decisions are weighed on scales of diplomacy and economics." (John O'Donnell, discussing in the New York News the military quiet on the western front.)

The comment is in line with events of the intricate game for power control now going on in Europe. One shrinks from accepting the notion that diplomats, carrying out the long-range plans of industrialists and financiers, could and would be willing to permit the sacrifice of the Polish people, could and would permit the death of French and British soldiers and sailors running into thousands, to further a perfectly cold-blooded scheme to "help business"—and that they could and would use the human impulses of patriotism, of Christianity, and reverence for human dignity and human freedom, as the devices under which these elaborate sacrifices to Mammon should be made.

Nevertheless, the suspicion is there. The suspicion grows and finds itself uttered by an increasing chorus of commentators and observers and common folk in the street.

Back in 1934 the world was given the inside story of the Briey Basin deal early in the World War.

Briey Basin, with its mines and smelters, fell into the hands of the Germans early in the war, and during the second battle of Verdun these mines and smelters were turning out tons of material to be used in killing French soldiers.

Upon the records is the testimony of Pierre Flandin, later minister of finance under Tardieu, and the affirmation of Deputy Barthé, in the Chamber of Deputies in 1919.

Flandin testified that French artillery was forbidden to bombard Briey Basin when the chance existed and when such bombardment would have broken Germany's army and brought the war to an end nearly 2 years sooner.

Barthé spoke even more pointedly:

"I affirm that, either by the fact of the solidarity of the great metallurgy companies, or in order to safeguard private business interests, our military chiefs were forbidden to bombard the establishments of the Briey Basin which were being exploited by the enemy during the war. I affirm that our aviation service received instructions to respect the blast furnaces in which enemy steel was being made, and that a general who wished to bombard them was reprimanded."

French industrialists eventually got back Briey undamaged.

Chesterton, in his bitter and tragic poem, The Secret People, which tells of the heart of England as few others' poems do, put into words the suspicion that grows in the heart of the military man, and the man on the street:

They have given us into the hands
Of new, unhappy lords,
Lords without anger, or honor,
Who dare not carry their swords.
They fight with shuffling papers,
They have bright, dead, alien eyes,
And they look on our love and laughter
As a tired man looks on flies.

Effects of Repeal of the Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CARLSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ARTICLE BY HENRY T. GORRELL

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend by remarks, I am including an article taken from the Washington Times-Herald under date of Friday, November 3, 1939. This article was written by Mr. Henry T. Gorrell, United Press correspondent in London, under date of November 2, 1939:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of November 3, 1939]

BLOW TO UNITED STATES EXPORTS SEEN IN ARMS VOTE—SHARP CUT IN BRITISH IMPORTS EXPECTED TO ALLOW UNLIMITED FLOW OF MUNITIONS ABROAD

(By Henry T. Gorrell)

LONDON, November 2.—Revision of the United States arms-embargo law, while opening the way for large British arms and munitions purchases, was expected tonight to lead to a drastic curtailment of British imports from the United States, such as industrial and agricultural products.

One authoritative source estimated that British imports of certain American industrial products and foodstuffs would fall off as much as $150,000,000 a year.

DRASTICALLY REDUCED

Importers of American products said Britain's anticipated heavy purchases of war supplies from the United States would be offset to a substantial degree by curtailing imports of nonessential industrial and agricultural products.

These so-called nonessentials in normal years yield scores of millions of dollars to American exporters.

The curtailment will be necessary, it was explained, to protect exchange and permit unlimited purchases of arms and munitions from the United States.

The importation of many American commodities, including tobacco, automobiles, women's apparel, shoes, hosiery, dried fruits, and California barley already has been reduced drastically since the outbreak of the war.

HITS FILM INDUSTRY

The effect of the reduction of imports from the United States undoubtedly will be felt keenly over widespread areas of New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Michigan, the Grain Belts of the Middle West, the tobacco districts of the South, and the fruit zones of Florida and California.

Hollywood's film producers also inevitably will be affected, and it is indicated that the sale of American-made motion pictures in Britain will be reduced by many millions of dollars annually.

The estimated income of the American film industry from the European market, it was understood, is being reduced by about $30,000,000 a year as a result of the war, and a large part of this loss is in Britain.

COTTON UNAFFECTED

Imports of American automobiles, usually amounting to about $12,000,000 a year, virtually have ceased.

Likewise, British agents are reported to have ceased attending tobacco auctions in the United States. The United States' annual tobacco business with Britain has been approximately $85,000,000.

It is believed cotton imports will not be affected to any great extent, but canned vegetables and fruits already have been restricted, and grapes no longer are arriving from the United States.

Importers indicated American fresh fruits soon would be restricted.

BLOW TO BARLEY BELT

Imports of office machinery from the United States also have been curtailed to a considerable extent, and hardly any American grains with the exception of small amounts of feed are coming in.

The British have reduced American imports of hops, lard, and cereals.

It was believed in trade circles that the Pacific Coast Barley Belt, whose shipments to Britain last year were roughly $6,000,000, would be hard hit.

Common Sense Wins

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from today's issue of the Washington Post:

[From the Washington Post of November 3, 1939]

COMMON SENSE WINS

Those who wished to see the arms embargo retained set great store by the House vote. In spite of the smashing Senate verdict for repeal they were optimistic right up to the balloting yesterday afternoon. It was argued that the House, subject to complete replacement every 2 years, would be more responsive to propaganda than the Senate. And nobody knows the strength of the propaganda against repeal better than those who were made its victims.

The large majorities by which the bill was yesterday hastened to final passage therefore possess a significance even greater than that of the legislation now happily on the verge of enactment. They show that the House is no less a deliberative body than the Senate. They show that Congress as a body cannot be stampeded by feverishly whipped-up pressures. Those ballots yesterday show, in short, that the American system of representative government is still functioning. Our democracy has not yet degenerated into mob rule.

Unquestionably the great majority of those who opposed embargo repeal did so with perfect sincerity. But the arguments used by this side were for the most part emotional rather than rational. Without a scintilla of effective evidence it was asserted that repeal is of itself likely to involve the United States, to prolong the war, to "put the blood of millions on our heads," as a group of self-styled "peace organizations" asserted no later than yesterday. This sort of outcry is virtually hysteria.

What the legislation actually does has been almost lost to sight amid the shrieks and shouts, the groans and moans, with which it has been enveloped. Actually the United States is about to put into effect a sweeping self-denying ordinance, scrapping the doctrine of the freedom of the seas, abandoning traditional and unquestionable neutral rights, all for the sake of strengthening the safeguards against war. As a small offset to this wholesale surrender the administration is mildly reasserting the right of American nationals to sell munitions, provided they are bought for cash and shipped in foreign bottoms.

Because there is a point at which the country does not propose to surrender its sovereignty in behalf of belligerents, a furious and wholly emotional storm has been whipped up by organizations whose antecedents are, in some case, of dubious character. The pacifist propaganda is understandable. There are some people, and they are wholly honest, who would rather see the United States destroyed than take arms to defend it. The complete isolationist viewpoint is also understandable. But these and other honorable groups alone did not account for all the sound and fury of the embargo advocates.

Included in the strange line-up against repeal were all the Communists, all the bund adherents, all the quasi-Fascist groups, all the professional Anglophobes. Together they made a formidable, if chaotic assortment, sufficiently numerous to bring to their side many of the disillusioned, the ignorant, the credulous, and the self-seeking. Not by reasoning, but merely from its own momentum, the embargo movement gained many adherents who could not have advanced a single cogent argument against repeal.

Like "ham and eggs" in California, a movement of this sort, partly emotional, partly wishful, and partly self-seeking, can easily become a serious problem for a democracy. The effective arguments—legal, moral, patriotic, and economic—always favored repeal. But it almost seemed for a time that common sense might be overwhelmed and the vital congressional function of analysis subordinated to an essentially ridiculous mass emotionalism.

That danger has happily been averted. But it was more threatening to the United States than any of the bogies conjured up by the opponents of repeal.

The Pressure Boys

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

BOOK REVIEW BY W. F. SHELTON

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, since I suggested to my colleagues the other day that all Members read Pressure Boys, so many have asked me to tell them what it is about that I have decided to have printed in the RECORD a review of that book.

The San Francisco Chronicle carries the following under date of October 22. The review is by W. F. Shelton. It appears along with other book reviews on the page entitled "Books and Their Writers." The review follows:

[From the San Francisco Chronicle of October 22, 1939]

THE PRESSURE BOYS

(By Kenneth G. Crawford. Reviewed by W. F. Shelton)

This book, subtitled "The Inside Story of Lobbying in America," pretends to be neither calm nor unbiased. Its author openly admits that he is working off his repressions as a Washington correspondent; he is writing footnotes to the news, footnotes which are not revealed until after the news itself has become stale.

Certainly The Pressure Boys is sensational stuff. It names names, dates, and places with an offhandedness which is more effective than the loudest shouting; it deals with events so recent that our interest in them must be a good deal more than historical. As might be expected, many of Mr. Crawford's sources of information remain undisclosed; but, on the other hand, a considerable part of his evidence is drawn from such open records as those of the Black, La Follette, and Nye investigations. And the disturbing thing is that even if only a part of what he claims is true, its going to be pretty hard to deny the justice of his bitter irony.

An astonishing amount of material has been packed into the book. No important pressure group which has been active during the past quarter of a century escapes Mr. Crawford's eye and pen. There are chapters devoted to the 1913 exposé of the tariff lobby, and to the course of profiteering during the first World War—but they are merely interludes in the main story, which concerns the contemporary lobbying activities of utilities, drug manufacturers, the movies, steel, shipping, sugar, railroads, insurance companies, farmers, and labor. The scope and persistence of these activities, as Mr. Crawford sees them, are almost beyond belief. His thesis is that lobbying today is fundamentally the same as ever, although its technique has become more involved; nowadays, for example, it involves appealing direct to the electorate as well as putting pressure of one kind or another on legislators. He also says that lobbying has been immensely stimulated by the New Deal—with which he is broadly in sympathy—since all sorts of interests have been seeking to protect themselves during the creation of new legislation.

As a matter of fact, it is the inside stories of recent national issues which make the most sensational reading. There is much new or hitherto ignored material concerning the lobbying and propaganda by utilities in 1935 against the Holding Company "Death Sentence" Act; the fight led by Girdler against labor's attempt to organize Little Steel, which culminated in the 1937 Memorial Day incident at Chicago; the terrific pother about the President's first Government reorganization bill; the ingenious means used by railroads to oppose the growth of trucking; and the ghost-raising activities of the Dies committee.

A relatively mild sample of the book's contents would include the information that among the "pressure boys" are such figures as Homer Cummings, Donald Richberg, Pat Hurley (President Hoover's Secretary of War), and Joe Tumulty (secretary to President Wilson). We are told that the Liberty League, in addition to being one of the most ineffectual of lobbies, is unique in that it has been completely honest about its purpose from the start. It is said that Will Hays is only very incidentally the "czar" of the movie industry; his real job is maintaining a supercolossal lobby. It is charged that when the drug and liquor price-fixing law was pushed through in 1937, the law firm of its sponsor, Senator TYDINGS, was being retained by a national druggists' organization and a large distilling company.

The threads of the story, moreover, are quite long enough to span the continent. There is more than one reference to the Associated Farmers, principally in connection with the Dies committee; we are reminded of the famous check sent unsolicited to Representative GEARHART, of California, during the reorganization battle, and mention is made of the former Dollar Line in the chapter on shipping subsidies.

The Pressure Boys is not a soothing story; it will find very few readers from either left or right whose confidence in some organization or another will emerge unscathed. Mr. CRAWFORD believes that democratic government will remain ineffective so long as special groups can exercise a power out of proportion to their numbers and he spares no blows in driving his point home.

The book has been written in bitterness and anger, and no doubt allowance should be made for that fact in any evaluation of its accuracy—but there is still more than enough undeniable truth in the picture to make anyone wince. It may not be the whole truth, but it is a part which cannot forever be ignored.

Fred S. Purnell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, on October 21, 1939, Hon. Fred S. Purnell, a distinguished former Member of Congress, passed away.

For 16 years he represented the old Ninth District, a part of which, including Fountain County, his home county, is now in the Sixth Congressional District, which I have the honor to represent at this time.

Mr. Purnell had a most interesting career. He was born in Fountain County, Ind., near Veedersburg; was educated in the schools of that county, where he became firmly imbued with the great Hoosier philosophy of life, and at Indiana University, where he graduated with the degree of LL. B. in 1904, he was an excellent student, an eloquent and forceful speaker, and developed a great aptitude for leadership. After completing his college education he entered the practice of law, locating in Attica, Ind., where he served as city attorney for 4 years. He was elected to Congress in 1916 and served his district faithfully and well for eight terms. His sterling qualities, his outstanding ability as a statesman and a leader were soon recognized by the Members of Congress. He served on the important Committee on Agriculture, Committee on Rules, and on the steering committee—he was ranking member on the Agriculture Committee.

He was vitally interested in and understood the problems of agriculture and through his efforts much legislation beneficial to agriculture was enacted into law.

He was an able legislator, taking a leading part in debate and in other activities of Congress. His fine personality, his keen sense of humor, his tireless diligence, his sterling character, his fearlessness in the cause of right, his ability for clear thinking, and his industry will always be remembered by those who knew him.

He had a great career, a life full of action in things worth while. His friends numbered all who knew him. He accepted the responsibilities of his office and of life itself and performed his duties in a most energetic and righteous manner. He was a true public servant, always laboring in the interest of his district and of his Nation.

Mr. Purnell was a devoted Republican, believing firmly in the fundamental principles and policies of the Republican Party, but was always fair and honorable in politics as well as in business, and his excellent public record will be a monument to him as long as time lasts. His life was a record of service, and he brought great honor and distinction to himself, his home county, and his district.

It was my privilege to serve with him as a Member of Congress for three terms. He took a kindly interest in new Members of Congress who sought his advice and counsel, which he was always happy to give in his efforts to assist them, and he never missed an opportunity to uproot a thorn and plant a flower along life's road.

Surviving him are his devoted wife, Elizabeth S. Purnell, and two sons, Samuel and Frederic. In his passing, his wife and children have lost a devoted husband and father, the community a great citizen, the Nation a great leader, and I have lost a friend.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I wrote to several distinguished jurists in international law, men of outstanding renown and prestige in their profession, on the question of the repeal of the embargo.

I have asked unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks and include therein their answers. The first is from the distinguished doyen of international authorities in this country, a man in fact of international reputation, the Honorable John Bassett Moore:

DEAR MR. SHANLEY: Your letter of October 27 in relation to the question of the repeal of the arms embargo has just been received, and I herewith enclose a copy of a statement which I am on the point of sending to News Week for publication tomorrow. By the terms of their request it appears that they have solicited expressions of opinion from a number of persons, and the responses may be mixed as well as abundant. I have tried precisely to define the aspect of the question as it appears to me. I would not go so far as to say that a government may not change its neutrality legislation during war. Our first neutrality statute was passed during the wars between Great Britain and various other powers on the one hand, and France on the other hand, growing out of the French Revolution. In this conflict, as you know, President Washington proclaimed our neutrality, and legislation was subsequently adopted for the purpose of making our neutrality effective. Later, in 1818, the legislation then existing was superseded by the comprehensive statute of 1818, which was passed during the wars between Spain and her revolted American colonies, which had declared their independence. With all this you no doubt are familiar, and I rehearse it only as a clarification of the situation with which we are now confronted. The propensities of our people are not so peaceful as they imagine, and in this they share the general, and perhaps inevitable, fate of humanity. On one point, however, I am clear, and that is that we shall not advance our own interests or contribute to peace and good will on earth by taking up arms for the enforcement of our judgment as regards the merits of all foreign quarrels.

Believe me to be, with best regards,

Sincerely yours,

J. B. MOORE.

[Enclosure]

STATEMENT OF JOHN BASSETT MOORE ON OCTOBER 28, 1939

Neutrality involves considerations both of law and of fact. International law, while not forbidding the export of arms to warring countries, authorizes the latter, by visit and search on the high seas, to prevent them from reaching the enemy; and, as this opens the door to misunderstandings and disputes, some governments have, when neutral, prohibited such export. The United States, by recent legislation, adopted this policy, and, by reversing it in time of war, would invite suspicion to its motives and enhance the perils of the traffic. A neutral country cannot possibly equalize as between belligerents the benefits or the disadvantages of what it exports, and the attempt to do so would savor of jugglery.

Everyone who pursues the study of international law has the profoundest admiration and respect for this great scholar. I add a lifetime of the fullest usefulness far beyond the Biblical three score and ten.

His life—

Moore, John Bassett, lawyer; b. Smyrna, Del., Dec. 3, 1860; grad. U. of Va., 1880; LL.D., Columbian, 1899, Delaware Coll., 1900, Yale, 1901, U. of Chile, 1910, Brown U. 1914, McGill U., 1921, U. of State of N. Y., 1923, Univ. of Pennsylvania, 1924, Columbia Univ., 1927; Washington Coll., Chestertown, Md., 1932; Law clerk Dept. of State, 1885–86; 3d asst. sec. of state, 1886–91; prof. internat. law and diplomacy, Columbia, 1891–1924, also chmn. administrative bd. Legislative Drafting Fund, 1911–15. Asst. sec. of state, Apr.–Sept., 1898; sec. and counsel Spanish-Am. Peace Commn., Paris, 1898; agt. of U. S. before U. S. and Dominican Arbitration Tribunal, 1904; U. S. del. 4th Internat. Am. Conf., Buenos Aires, 1910; spl. plenipotentiary to Chilean Centenary, 1910; mem. Internat. Comm. of Jurists, 1912–22; counselor Dept. of State, with power to sign as secretary of State, 1913–14. Mem. Permanent Court of Arbitration, The Hague, 1912–38; judge Permanent Court of International Justice, 1921–28 (resigned); del. Pan-Am. Financial Congress, 1915, and vice-chmn. Internat. High Commn. then organized; ambassador extraordinary, U. S. del. and pres., Internat. Conf., The Hague, 1922–23, on Rules for Artcraft and Radio in Times of War. Director and mem. exec. com., Equitable Life Assurance Soc., New York. Hon. mem. Institut de Droit International; member Institut Colonial International, American Philos. Soc. Pan-Am. Soc. of U. S. (hon. pres.), Hispanic Soc. America (vice pres.); hon. mem. Coll. of Lawyers of Costa Rica; corr. mem. Mass. Historical Soc., Royal Academy History of Spain, Instituto de Ordem des Advogados Brazileiros; member Royal Acad. Sciences of Netherlands; corresponding member Instituto Saumartiniano; pres. of Am. Polit. Science Assn., 1913–14, Mohonk Conf. on Internat. Arbitration, 1914, 15; mem. Pa. Hist. Soc.; fellow Am. Acad. Arts and Sciences; incorporated Am. Nat. Red Cross; mem. Central Com. and exec. com. N. Y. Co. Chapter, 1914–20. Awarded Roosevelt Distinguished Service Medal, 1927. Clubs: Century, Bar Association (New York); Cosmos, Metropolitan (Washington, D. C.); Authors' (London, England). Author: Report on Extraterritorial Crime, 1887; Report on Extradition, 1890; Extradition and Interstate Rendition (2 volumes), 1891; American Notes on the Conflict of Laws, 1896; History and Digest of International Arbitrations (6 volumes), 1898; American Diplomacy, Its Spirit and Achievements, 1905; Digest of International Law (8 volumes), 1906; Four Phases of American Development—Federalism, Democracy, Imperialism, Expansion, 1912; Principles of American Diplomacy, 1918; Internat. Law and Some Current Illusions and Other Essays, 1924; Pending Neutrality Proposals, their False Conceptions and Misunderstandings, 1936. Editor: The Works of James Buchanan (12 volumes), 1908; International Adjudications, Ancient and Modern, together with mediatorial repts., advisory opinions and the decisions of domestic commns. on internat. claims, with hist. and legal commentaries (8 vols.), 1937, and more to follow. Address: care Chase Nat. Bank, 11 Broad Street, New York, N. Y.

The opinion of Professor Edwin M. Borchard of Yale is probably as well known as that of any other man in the country but to complete the record I take advantage of my unanimous consent to insert it.

Surely it cannot be designed to insure the protection of American neutrality, for the obvious purpose is to help the Allies obtain arms, ammunition, and implements of war. If that is the motive—and the motive in these matters is all-important—then the lifting of the embargo is an act of war and intervention, and it should be debated as such. The assumption that a neutral can change his law so as to help one side beat the other and yet escape the consequences of war is hazardous. The gamble may be successful, but it is very speculative, for success depends on the inability or unwillingness of the disfavored belligerent to exert the reprisals which he would naturally wish to, and which he is privileged to exert. There may be good reasons why many Americans would like to help the Allies win this European war, but the public should not delude itself into the belief that a hostile act is a contribution to American neutrality. The suggestion that the present act is unneutral and hence must be corrected because Great Britain cannot legally obtain the arms which Germany could not physically get is inaccurate and unsound. It would be more true to say that the naval position of the belligerents enables the United States to supply one side only with everything but arms. There is a practical embargo on Germany. This ought to satisfy the craving for discrimination, and it probably can be defended as legal. The lifting of the arms embargo, I fear, cannot be so defended.

It is proper to say that there are many arguments against an arms embargo. International law does not require a neutral to impose an arms embargo, although many neutrals in the course of history have done so. They have done it to safeguard their own neutrality. In the abstract, on historic evidence of their effects, I have been opposed to embargoes and boycotts in any form. When applied discriminatorily, however, as to many Americans have been taught to believe was justified, they constitute one of the most disturbing political instruments of an age that has been extraordinarily fertile in inventing new devices for provoking conflicts among people.

The peculiar defect in the present requested change, however, is that it is proposed to lift the embargo during a foreign war with the knowledge, if not indeed the intention, that it would help one set of belligerents only. This seems to me a clear violation of international law. I shall read a passage from a commentary on a recent draft code on neutrality prepared under the auspices of the specialists of this country, Prof. Philip C. Jessup, of Columbia, being the reporter. That commentary states:

"The task confronting the neutral state—in changing its rules during war—is to make certain to itself and clear to other states that the motive inducing the adoption of a new rule or regulation during the course of a war, is the product of its concern to act strictly in accordance with the law of neutrality, and not the result of a desire to aid one or the other belligerent."

It is not true to say that a neutral may not change the rules of law during war. It is during war that most of the rules of neutrality were made. But the rules may only be changed in the direction of insuring and tightening neutral duties, and not in the direction of relaxing them for the benefit of one set of belligerents. This is a hostile act and an act of war, and its consequences must be carefully weighed. It is inconsistent with that neutrality which official groups profess to wish to maintain. In support of the change, it is only fair to say, the argument is advanced that the legislation was under consideration long before September 3, 1939, that a belligerent ought not to prevent the adoption of an American statute and that it is proposed in the interests of the United States. It is a matter of regret to me that these arguments leave me unconvinced.

It may very well be that the Neutrality Act should be changed in certain respects. I should find nothing unneutral in the application of the cash-and-carry principle to commodities other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war, though I have always been skeptical as to the practical operation of this plan. Only "carry" is important, including transfer of title to the buyer, for Americans are not likely to extend much credit now. Nor do I like the idea of taking American shipping out of the European trade, although under present circumstances possibly it may have justification. Moreover, I see no reason why the United States should not permit the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to neutral countries "for transshipment to a belligerent." Why such excessive zeal? The administrative difficulty of enforcing such a rule should alone have condemned it. But in addition there is no reason why a neutral should enforce the doctrine of continuous voyage or transport. American citizens need not be prohibited from traveling or serving on belligerent ships if the statute and the country are clear on the point that they have always traveled or served there at their own risk and that under no circumstances can the country be involved when they travel under the protection of a foreign flag. Nor should the act apply to civil wars or promise discrimination in Latin American wars. These changes would not relax American neutrality to the advantage of one and the handicap of another actual belligerent. For that reason such changes are permissible. Other changes are not, if the country professes neutrality.

To sum up, acts intended to aid one belligerent only should be understood to be hostile, not neutral acts. No reasons have been given as to why the supply of arms to the Allies, much as this may be desired, would promote American peace or neutrality. On the other hand, it is not unreasonable to suppose that such shipments will, under existing circumstances, be construed as a form of intervention. If they are so construed, the possibility of America's remaining at peace and out of the war may have passed to alien decision. The measure therefore requires the utmost deliberation. Let us hope that a sound conclusion will be reached.

Professor Borchard's collaborator, William P. Lage, in his provocative and challenging Neutrality for the United States, writes and insists that—I have no hesitation in condemning the present proposal to repeal the arms embargo.

The embargo was on the statute books before the present war started; it was invoked by the President, and is at this moment in force. To weaken this law now, for the purpose of helping one side, is a participation in the war; for when changes in a neutral's laws are made during war, the purpose of the changes is all-important. That is why the addition of cash and carry for general commodities would not constitute intervention, for its purpose is solely and obviously to help preserve our neutrality.

This legal position cannot be seriously questioned. As a result, the advocates of repeal of the embargo have been forced to adopt a series of specious contentions whose purpose can only be to becloud the issue in the minds of the general public.

Foremost among these has been the contention that it is unneutral to keep the present embargo. That is just not so. When Congress passed the act in 1935 we put the world on notice that we wouldn't supply arms during future wars. We had an undoubted right to pass the act at that time and we would have an undoubted right to repeal it today if the world were still at peace. But war has broken out, and we have not the right to pose as a neutral, claiming to be treated as a neutral, and at the same time weaken our present law in order to help one side defeat its enemy. To do this is to commit an act of hostility which the injured nation has every right to treat as an abandonment of neutrality and an act of war.

Moreover, one of the cardinal principles of international law is that a neutral government, as such, shall not take any action designed to influence the outcome of the war. This rule is particularly involved at the present time with respect to repeal because it will require affirmative action by our Government to effect that purpose. It is not merely a question of allowing private citizens to trade in munitions; it is a question of the American Government, as such, taking positive action to change its laws in order to assist one belligerent to overcome its enemy, thus causing our participation in the war.

But it is said: "Germany wouldn't dare declare war on America because of repeal." Perhaps so; but why indulge in speculations as to what Germany might do? When we knowingly and willfully commit such an act of hostility we leave to Hitler the decision as to whether that act will mean peace or war for this country.

Now that is a sorry position for America to put itself in. Far better, if this country feels it necessary to commit hostilities, to put the question of joining the war squarely up to our Congress, not leave it to the whim of some foreign government.

On the other hand, if we want to stay out, then we should stay out completely. There is no half in and half out in this game; no place for hostile "measures short of war." The minute we commit acts of hostility we open ourselves to—we even invite—reprisals which will inflame public opinion to the point of demanding war.

Two other distinguished scholars have answered and I have taken extracts from their illuminating letters:

EARLHAM COLLEGE,
Richmond, Ind., October 30, 1939.

The Honorable JAMES A. SHANLEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SHANLEY: I have your letter of October 28, in which you do me the honor of asking for an expression of my views in the matter of the repeal of the arms embargo. I greatly appreciate the opportunity to answer your question to the best of my ability in the limited time which is available to me today since in this matter time is of the essense.

I am opposed to the repeal of the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war, first, because I believe that repeal at this time, while a war is in progress, would be an unneutral act—a violation of the duty of the United States under international law; and, second, because I believe that repeal would be the first step on the road to war, and that the United States for every reason, unselfish as well as selfish, ought to avoid involvement in the present European war.

First, as to the matter of neutrality. The President of the United States and his official supporters advocate repeal on the ground that it is in the interest of "real American neutrality," while Senator AUSTIN, Senator BURKE, and the ordinary repealer who is not charged with official responsibility, advocate it on precisely the opposite grounds, namely, because it is unneutral. As Senator BURKE puts it, "Repeal of the arms embargo will not operate equally. * * * It checks the belligerents that I want checked. It favors the belligerents that I want favored." I submit that, all technicalities aside, as a matter of common sense, Senators AUSTIN and BURKE and the unofficial repealers are right. Technicalities aside, who would seriously advocate that the way for a nation to stay neutral in a war is suddenly to commence to sell arms to one side only, which is practically what repeal means, as we all know. I submit that this is one of the times—and they occur far more frequently than the critics of the law are willing to admit—when law follows the dictates of common sense.

The rule of international law was stated with substantial accuracy when this very situation arose with "reverse English" in 1914–15. At that time the Great War was on and our citizens were selling arms in large quantities to the Allies, as they had a perfect right to do under international law and under our municipal law as it then stood. A number of people, some pro-German and some anti-British, but a great many of them fine American citizens who were shocked at the enormous trade in the implements of death which was developing, appeared before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives asking for legislation to embargo arms and munitions of war. (Hearings before Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, 63d Cong., 3d sess., on H. J. Res. 377 and 378, December 30 and 31, 1914.) The German and British Governments both interested themselves in the legislation. Under date of April 4, 1915, the German Ambassador transmitted a memorandum of his Government requesting action on our part to correct the existing situation, which, it was claimed, was not in accordance "with the spirit of true neutrality." Secretary Bryan replied on April 21, 1915, saying, among other things, "This Government holds, as I believe Your Excellency is aware, and as it is constrained to hold in view of the present indisputable doctrines of accepted international law, that any change in its own laws of neutrality during the progress of a war which would affect unequally the relations of the United States with the nations at war would be an unjustifiable departure from the principle of strict neutrality by which it has consistently sought to direct its actions. * * * The placing of an embargo on the trade in arms at the present time would be such a change and be a direct violation of the neutrality of the United States. It will, I feel assured, be clear to Your Excellency that, holding this view and considering itself in honor bound by it, it is out of the question for this Government to consider such a course." (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915 Supp., p. 160 at p. 162.)

* * * * * * *

Second, repeal as a road to war. It does not need any citation of authorities to prove what the reaction to repeal is likely to be in England and Germany, respectively, but the returns are already coming in. Here are a few excerpts from the London papers, reported in special cables to the New York Times on October 28 and 29:

"The United States to sell arms to the Allies."—The Express.

"Allied victory in the United States."—The Daily Mirror.

"Thus the aggressors are penalized, and that is the policy President Roosevelt has been aiming at. By this amendment he is able to give material help to the Allies as a means of avoiding giving them military help—and, indeed, such aid as this is worth far more than regiments of soldiers. Britain and France propose to spend no less than £90,000,000 sterling on aircraft in the United States, and even now scores of planes are waiting to be shipped across the Atlantic."—The Sketch.

"Arms from the United States will shorten the war."—The News.

"Germany must interpret this decision as another defeat for her cause."—Lord Beaverbrook's Evening Standard.

"Better than a battle."—The Star, a liberal evening paper.

No wonder that the Sunday Times, "The Thunderer," said, "Passage by the American Senate of the bill to repeal the arms embargo was the most important event of last week." No wonder, also, that "sources close to the Wilhelmstrasse" are quoted by the United Press as saying, "This might cause us to hurry up."

It might help us to gage Germany's feelings in this matter to recall our own feelings during the Civil War when the English were selling arms to the Confederates, which they had a perfect right to do (the belligerency of the Confederacy had been recognized), and Lowell's Hosea Bigelow was singing,

You wonder why we're hot, John,
Your mark was on the gun,
The neutral guns that shot, John,
Our brothers and our sons.

The reaction in Great Britain and Germany to an unneutral act cannot be expected to be favorable to neutrality. But after the psychological effect we must consider the economic effect—first, war profits—"fool's gold"—then as cash gives out pressure for credits to the Allies in the interest of American prosperity and in the name of democracy and morality. I do not say, of course, that repeal of the embargo will necessarily mean that we shall be dragged into the war. I say it is the first step and a step which will make every subsequent step much easier. Once it is taken the position of those who oppose our involvement in hostilities will be much more unfavorable than it is today, although a resolute will to peace on the part of our people and our Government, a will to peace such as George Washington showed in 1794, can keep us out of war, embargo or no embargo.

* * * * * * *

Needless to say, all this does not involve the slightest condonation of Hitlerism at home or abroad. It simply involves distrust in American intervention in European wars as a remedy for anything and a specific disbelief in its efficacy as an instrument of peace and democracy.

* * * * * * *

Thanking you for doing me the honor to request an expression of my views on this subject and with appreciation for the stand you are taking, and all personal good wishes, I am,

Very respectfully yours,

WILLIAM C. DENNIS.

P. S.—You may make such use of this letter as you see fit.

YALE UNIVERSITY, INSTITUTE OF INTERNATIONAL STUDIES,
NEW HAVEN, CONN., November 1, 1939.

Hon. JAMES A. SHANLEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: On the whole I agree with your opinion in regard to the repeal of the arms embargo. It would be hard to say anything on the subject at this date that you have not already heard many times before, and hence I shall not set forth in detail the reasons for my views.

Obviously, the question divides itself up into two parts, the first, what action would be more likely to keep us out of the war, and second, what action would be in accord with our duties as a neutral under international law?

In regard to the first question, the arguments in favor of repeal seem to turn on the assumption that it will aid the Allies to win the war gainst Germany. If this is so, it is certain that the German Government will resent the action very strongly and will take desperate steps to break up the resulting trade in arms with the Allies, possibly including acts of sabotage in this country. It seems quite likely that such action would provoke strong feelings in this country and increase our chances of being involved in the war. If, on the other hand, the repeal of the embargo would not make the difference between defeat and victory for the Allies, then there does not seem to be very much of an argument in support of it.

In regard to the second question, I think there would be a possibility that if our action in repealing the embargo should come before an international tribunal at the close of the war it would be held to be a violation of our legal duties as a neutral. If it could be shown that the sole motive for lifting the embargo was to aid the Allies, that would not seem to be in accord with the duty of impartiality required of neutrals by international law. It could be argued, of course, that the main purpose of repeal was to enable this country to stay out of the war and not to help the Allies. If that could be shown, then I think that repeal would be justified under international law, even though the result was to enable the Allies to defeat Germany. However, it seems fairly clear that the sentiment in favor of repeal is directly associated with the desire to aid the Allies in winning the war.

Sincerely yours,

FREDERICK S. DUNN.

A distinguished practicing attorney and recognized authority on international law, Mr. Henry S. Fraser, of Syracuse, N. Y., says:

There is no doubt that under international law a neutral state may, during the course of a war, adopt new measures or alter old measures, provided that the motive for such action is not to assist one belligerent against another. Hence it would be justifiable for a neutral state, after the outbreak of war, to pass a new law forbidding all belligerent warships to enter its territorial waters, where it was found that belligerent warships had engaged in hostilities within its coastal waters. Obviously, such new law would be for the purpose of better safeguarding the neutral's rights or of better enabling it to fulfill its duties as a neutral.

* * * * * * *

As recently as the Second Hague Peace Conference in 1907, when the thirteenth convention, concerning the rights and duties of neutral powers in naval war, was under discussion, the British declared that an instance where neutrality would be served by the relaxation of a neutral's legislation after the outbreak of war was "inconceivable." At that meeting Sir Ernest Satow, the British delegate, requested that specific mention be made of the fact "that, in his opinion, it is inconceivable that a neutral state would ever be obliged to adopt less stringent measures in the course of a war in order to protect its rights, but that English doctrine has always recognized the fact that neutrals have the right to enact stricter measures for this purpose."

We must not forget that however our sympathies may be aroused by the unhappy struggle abroad, our intellects should warn us of the danger of involvement if those sympathies are translated into political action. We must not forget that the repeal of the arms embargo requires an act of Congress. This affirmative action of government, taken for the purpose of enabling private individuals to sell arms to the belligerents, becomes a Government act to aid that belligerent which controls the sea, namely, Great Britain. By repealing the embargo the United States Government would in law make itself a party to the contemplated sale of arms by its citizens. The sale of arms by a neutral government to a belligerent is universally condemned as constituting participation in the hostilities. The sale of arms by a citizen of a neutral country, which sale could not take place except for an explicit enabling statute enacted by government, is the exact equivalent of a sale of arms sponsored by government itself.

The converse of the present situation arose during the World War when, in December 1914, after the outbreak of war, bills were introduced in Congress to place an embargo on the exportation of munitions. Sir Edward Grey thereupon indicated to our Government that he considered the adoption of such a law would be "special legislation passed while war is in progress" and therefore would constitute "an unneutral act toward the belligerents that can profit by it."

The pending bill to lift the arms embargo is a self-evident proposal to relax our legislation after the outbreak of war. That the purpose of the executive branch, as well as of the administration supporters in the legislative branch, is assistance to the predominant sea power engaged in the war, does not admit of successful contradiction.

Genuine Neutrality With Cash and Carry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, it is my solemn and earnest conviction that America should remain out of the present European war. I am in complete agreement with the President of the United States when he says that we should and that we can remain at peace. My vote as a Member of this Congress will, as the occasion arises, always be cast for peace.

The temper of this Congress, and the temper of the American people are such that war will never be declared unless an attack is made upon our sovereignty. Of this the American people may be assured, this Congress will not involve our Nation in Europe's quarrels. Our present problem it seems to me is: How and what can we do to make certain that this determination of the American people to remain at peace shall not be frustrated?

Our experiences of 25 years ago taught us a lesson that we ought now to have clearly stamped in the forefront of our minds. America was brought into the World War by the sinking of American ships which were carrying through the war zones merchandise intended for one or the other of the combatants. Our ships were attacked without regard to the character of their cargoes. Ships carrying wheat and other foodstuffs were subject to attack the same as ships carrying munitions.

Another cause of our entry into that war was the stirring of the emotions of the American people by the attacks made upon, and the sinking of foreign ships upon which Americans were permitted under our then existing laws to become passengers.

Still another cause of our involvement in the World War was the financial interest that so many of our citizens had in the success of the Allies. We permitted foreign governments to borrow great sums of money from our banks and our investing public with which these foreign governments purchased the products of our farms, our factories, and our mines. Certain of the foreign governments became heavily involved in debt to the American people and American business. Unless the governments that were in our debt won the war, those Americans who had made the advancements stood to lose their money. All this created a sort of vested interest here in America in favor of the Allies. We permitted our citizens to have a stake in the European war.

The natural tendency, the inevitable result of the course we pursued 25 years ago was to drag us into war. Let us profit by that experience.

The Senate of the United States, after extended debate, after the most careful consideration by a vote of 2 to 1, has passed on to this House an amended neutrality bill. Let us examine it in the light of the conditions that brought us into the last war.

The bill, as it comes from the Senate, proposes that any foreign nation may come to our shores and purchase any goods that any of our citizens desire to sell. The foreigner comes with his own ships; he sails away with the goods in his own ships, at his own risk; he must pay with cash for them before they leave our shores. It is a strict cash-and-carry program.

The Senate amendment further provides that no American shall, for the period of the war, travel in the ship of a warring nation; it further provides that no American ship shall travel in the war zones. The Senate amendment, in line with its cash-and-carry provision, precludes Americans from furnishing goods to warring nations on credit. In a few words, we Americans may do business with all foreigners who desire to do business with us, but whatever business is done must be done at the foreigner's risk, and with no risk to Americans.

A calm, dispassionate analysis of the Senate amendment discloses that it provides against just those conditions and circumstances that led to our involvement in the World War.

Now, one word on the subject of our right to ship arms and munitions. If it is morally wrong to ship arms and munitions to a warring nation, it is equally immoral to ship them to a nation at peace, for the nation at peace can only be purchasing them against the day when it will be at war.

If the Senate amendment is defeated and the law remains as at present, we are in this position: France cannot purchase an airplane in America, but Russia is completely free to stock up with guns, airplanes, and munitions. Japan has been for several years purchasing war material in vast quantities from us. She may still continue to stock up. If a year hence she determines to join in the war against France, she may use what she is now buying in America against France; but France, under our present law, cannot now buy a single airplane in America, though she is ready to pay for it in cash and take it away in her own ships at her own risk.

I submit this is not neutrality. Genuine neutrality consists in treating all foreign nations alike. If the one is the better able to do business with us because it has the cash and the other has not the cash, or because it has control of the seas and the other has not, this is not a situation of our creation.

To deny to the democracies the right to trade with America, because the dictator nations are not in a position to send their ships here, is in my judgment taking sides against the democracies and in favor of the dictators.

As the European situation stands today, we have on the one side the democracies, on the other side Hitler and Stalin. I need not say that I make a distinction between Hitler and the German people. This war is not a war of the German people; they want it no more than you and I. It is the German people who are the real sufferers; it is to them that our sympathies go.

It is understandable enough that there can be no peace in Europe unless the nations of that continent have some faith and confidence in one another. It is easy to understand that Poland could not stand by and meekly submit to Hitler's crushing it. The Poles are a great people; they have a glorious history; they are as attached to their Poland as you and I are attached to America. Yet Hitler, notwithstanding his sworn pledge of security given to Poland, ruthlessly destroyed it. But Poland will rise again.

The Czechs are a peace-loving people; they had their right to their place in the sun. Nothing that they had done justified the attack which was made on Czechoslovakia. They, too, had been assured against aggression. European civilization is much in debt to the great Czech people. They have made a glorious contribution to the advancement of our civilization. Yet, today, we see the heel of the aggressor on the heart of Czechoslovakia.

Finland, small that it is, has its right to live. It, too, is threatened by Hitler's ally, Stalin, as he threatened Lithuania and Estonia.

Where will the aggression end? What will satisfy the greed and avarice of these two mad dictators? Everything that we hold dear—religion, liberty, peace, security—they brutally destroy.

Why then should America, made up as it is of people who trace their ancestry back to all the nations of Europe, take sides against the democracies and in favor of the dictatorships? A neutrality bill that enables Russia to have our airplanes and denys them to France is a delusion and a snare. Communism, with all that it means in the destruction of religion, morality, and civilization, stands to profit by our present unneutral law, which allows Russia to buy and ship munitions in American ships, while denying to the democracies now under attack by Russia's ally, the right to trade with us for munitions even though carried in their own ships.

Let us profit, I repeat, by our experiences of World War days. Let us do the things that will keep us out of war. Let us at least be as fair to the democracies as we are to the dictators. Let us say to all nations alike—we will sell any goods to any and all nations who have the cash, and who will carry them away in their own boats at their own risk. If this principle may work to the present advantage of the democracies, this certainly can be no reason for our interfering against them.

This is what the Senate amendment provides, and for this reason I will vote for it.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, each Member of the House on this day was called upon to make a decision that may have far-reaching effect upon the future of this country. It was argued that the repeal of the embargo on the sale of arms, ammunitions, and implements of war would cause us to enter into war, or cause us to remain at peace with the world. Personally, I could not agree with either statement. As I said while the question was up for debate in the House, I do not believe that we can write a law that will, of itself, keep the United States at peace. Every Member of Congress who voted upon this measure performed his duty conscientiously, courageously, and patriotically with but one purpose in mind, namely, to keep this Nation out of war. We disagreed, however, as to the methods to be employed.

It is my own view that the people of the country can do more to keep our Nation out of European embroilments and to remain at peace with the world than any other force, if in spirit as well as in fact they will remain neutral, hold their heads, and attend more to our internal problems. As I said upon the floor of the House, when the subject was under debate, I cannot help but feel our real problems remain within the United States, namely: A staggering national debt of $45,000,000,000 and the specter of millions of men out of work with enemies of our form of government boring from within.

These conditions, my colleagues, in my judgment, are far more dangerous to the future of the democracy of this country than any condition affecting European nations removed from us 3,000 miles.

I desire to assure the Members of this House that it was with the most profound regret that I found myself in disagreement with the leaders of my party upon the questions before the House. To say the least, the decision I reached to vote to retain the embargo on the selling for profits the agencies of death was not easy, nor a pleasant one.

My conscience alone decided my course.

I trust that I may with propriety quote from the message of the President of the United States to the Congress when he called us here in extraordinary session to consider revision of the Neutrality Act:

> Let no man or group in any walk of life assume exclusive protectorate over the future well-being of America, because I conceive that regardless of party or section the mantle of peace and of patriotism is wide enough to cover us all. Let no group assume the exclusive label of the peace bloc.

Again let me quote from the concluding paragraph in the President's message:

> In a period when it is sometimes said that free discussion is no longer compatible with national safety, may you by your deeds show the world that we of the United States are one people, of one mind, one spirit, one clear resolution, walking before God in the light of the living.

Let us remember the President's words.

Now that the Neutrality Act will be revised, let us all work with unanimity of purpose to keep this Nation at peace. Let us tighten our belts and stand firmly against insidious propaganda from all sources to eventually have this country take the steps that may in the end cause our boys who have had no voice in the matter to again make the supreme sacrifice.

I wish to say, before the curtains drop, that I regret more than any other one thing in connection with the entire presentation to see political cleavage in the vote. I construed the President's message to mean that there were no partisan politics involved, but a question of honest-to-God Americanism.

I repeat now, in conclusion, what I have said before, that I will fight to the last ditch any future action on the part of any agency to ease the way for this country to enter this insane war. I also wish to state that I am firmly of the opinion that our President, in the exercise of almost plenary power in external matters, will steer this Nation clear of the shoals of war.

Upon the people themselves and upon the shoulders of the President now rests the selection of our course.

Legislation ultimately represents a composition of the many and divergent views of the representatives of the people. The proposed legislation is not to my liking. God grant that it may serve its purpose is my one and only wish. I, for one, shall do my utmost, now that Congress has spoken, to make the measure work toward peace.

Congress, in the proposed legislation, has placed large discretionary powers in the hands of the President. His responsibility is great and the burden of it all will rest heavily upon him. Let us all pray that God may give him strength to bear it all.

The War and American Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR., OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. OSMERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me on September 25, 1939, at the American Small Business Day, New York World's Fair:

Because of the fact that "big business," those great ponderous units actually so few in number, receive such vast attention in the public eye, it is easy to forget that "small business is America." At least the mills, factories, farms, and stores that are controlled either individually or by small groups constitute the backbone of our economy.

As a small-business man myself it has always been difficult to bring the viewpoint of our great group to the various official bodies in which I have served. It is, therefore, heartening to see so many leaders of the small-business groups throughout the United States gathered here in a spirit of friendly cooperation, attempting to solve the problems of today and those of the world of tomorrow.

When this meeting was conceived, we were concerned primarily with one aspect of the national welfare—taxes. Now our prime concern is taxes' partner—death.

In the brief months that have passed since last spring, the desperate international situation has passed from crisis to chaos. To believe that we can placidly ignore it is witless. Every shell fired in Europe echoes in the United States.

For this reason all businessmen in our country are asking themselves these questions: Will the war abroad help them or hurt them? Will America enter the war, if so, when? How long will it last? Should we trade with belligerents? Is cash and carry right or wrong? Should we keep the arms embargo? Are prices going up or down? Should long-term commitments be made or canceled? These, and a thousand like questions, have for the moment relegated the subjects of taxes, social security, balanced Federal budgets, wage and hour regulations, and other domestic measures to minor roles.

In all the confusion, one great truth transcends all else. American manhood, womanhood, American progress and prosperity, labor and capital, American business can only suffer as a result of our participation in any European war. We must stay out of war. Who can forget the fool's paradise of our wartime prosperity and who will ever forget the deflation that followed the inflation as inevitably as the night follows the day. Think of the failures, bankruptcies, unemployment, and even starvation that were ours as a result of the last war.

Ladies and gentlemen, we are still suffering from the cancer of the first World War. Mad Europe, unable to pay off its debts of the last war, plunges merrily into this one with the same self-righteous insanity. Many of you have rightfully viewed our growing national debt with alarm, but our present debts and deficits will be but the proverbial drop in the bucket in comparison with those in wartime.

A small but persistent minority is trying in every way to instill in the minds of America the insidious thought that great good and prosperity will be ours as a result of the European war. Our neutrality and peaceful future are threatened more by this group than any other. It is truly an invasion from within.

There are several things that we must remember as businessmen during these troubled times. We must build a dam against the endless flood of propaganda that threatens to engulf us from abroad. Each contending government and group will attempt to justify its case in the eyes of America and thereby gain our support for its own selfish objectives. Second, pressing domestic problems must receive full attention toward their solution. Politicians who have failed should not be allowed to use the war crisis to mask their failure. Certainly the European war is not the answer to our pressing fiscal and labor problems.

It would seem that America should be emergency proof after our experience of the last few years, when we have had them in great profusion and confusion. But again I seem to detect the creation of a national state of nervousness as a result of almost daily pronouncements, bulletins, and rulings that come out of Washington. We want no politics in our foreign affairs. The reply to the appeal of Alfred M. Landon, who has asked the President to make clear his position on a third term, will determine whether there will be. We want no repetition in 1940 of the 1916 slogan, "He kept us out of war."

We will inevitably hear appeals for national unity to present a solid front in dealing with our European problems. The importance of united action at such a time cannot be understated. But we must beware of the loss of individual thought, independent opinions, and the right to decide for ourselves lest we be stampeded into disaster.

Why Should We Be Neutral?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR., OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. OSMERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me over the radio yesterday:

As I came to the studio tonight through the streets of New York with their brilliant lights, traffic, gaiety, and good cheer, I was naturally struck with a comparison that one must inevitably draw between our own great cities and the dark, sad capitals of Europe. I saw no human rat-hole air-defense shelters, no anti-aircraft guns, no gas masks, no splendid buildings piled in ruins, no homes gutted, no wounded limping back from the front, I saw no row of pine boxes at the railroad station containing the pitiful remains of some mother's hopes. There were no tears on the faces of those I saw, no sad goodbyes at the train platform, but here and there we have signs that once we had been at war. Not signs that the harried pedestrian sees very often, but those that occupy much time for us in Government. We have our veterans' hospitals with our living dead, we have our orphans and cripples. We have our war cemeteries. If only all of you would walk through a veterans' hospital just once a year there would be less glib talk about the synthetic need of our entering another European war. An amazingly large group of us for reasons that defy ordinary intelligence seem to be resigned to the fact that sooner or later we must again plunge ourselves headlong into the ancient and hungry greeds and hatreds of Europe.

I speak to you tonight as a Member of Congress to try in some way to stop this hypnotic drift toward war which has apparently drugged the thought and intelligence of so many of us. Without question the Treaty of Versailles is at the bottom of much of the present difficulty in Europe. It was a European prostitution of American idealism. It should forever stand as an example to the American people of the final end of their good intentions.

We all remember the slogans: "Make the world safe for democracy," "the war to end wars," and "peace without victory." What happened to them at Versailles? As a result of that treaty we have had victory without peace and not peace without victory. Yet many patriotic Americans would take our high-school and college boys, our sons, brothers, and fathers, and have them pour their blood on Europe's battlefields to win the same hollow victory. Once more would the American taxpayers be required to pay not only our own full cost of the war but a substantial portion of the cost of other belligerents as well. The defaulted war debts of our former Allies and the defaulted private credits of post-war Germany are your bills and mine. Once again we would lay a firm foundation for the next great depression. It would be a greater one than the one in which we now find ourselves and which has nearly broken our economic back.

The time has come when Americans must decide whether their hate for European imperialism and totalitarianism is greater than their love for American democracy. The great common interest between European nations and ourselves has for some mysterious reason never been demonstrated by anything more tangible than words or anything more profitable than bad debts.

America must stay out of war and mind its own business. And it needs a lot of minding. Partisanship must stop at the water's edge. But clear, fair thought on our own domestic problems knows no frontier. Our internal economy has broken down. Our business, industry, and agriculture are unable to afford 10,000,000 of our citizens the employment they seek and need to support their families. Let me say here and now that statesmen whose only cure for these economic ills is the fool's gold of swollen war profits are not the men needed by America in her present emergency.

At noon today one of the most momentous debates in American history began on the floor of the United States Senate. It will be long and bitter and its final outcome is, of course, in doubt. It is not my purpose tonight to discuss either side of the highly controversial question now before the Senate. There are many in the country who would have this Nation return to the so-called established code of international law. I believe that such a step would be a national calamity and would assure our quick entrance into the European war. It was under international law that our Nation was slowly sucked into the last war. To return to that code would be deliberate folly. International law rests principally upon the freedom of the seas for neutrals, and it was the violation of this code by British search and seizure of our ships in 1915 and 1916 that brought us to the brink of war with Great Britain. Unrestricted German submarine warfare starting in February 1917 drove us almost immediately into the war. Therefore it seems to me imperative that this Nation place mandatory restrictions upon its commerce and upon its citizens to prevent a repetition of the fatal events of 1914 and 1917. Petty desires of a few willful citizens who wish to travel in war areas, the craze for profits by a small fraction of our industry should never again be allowed to plunge a nation of 130,000,000 free citizens into a war definitely not of their own choosing or making. As important as the debate on neutrality legislation will be, the final decision on peace must be made by the citizens of our country and not by its political leaders. It is therefore with a profound sense of patriotic duty that I urge upon you to curb your emotions and control your minds for the best of your country. The future salvation of America, its democratic form of government, its wealth, its resources, its youth, and all its people lies solely in the peaceful pursuit of its destiny. It is the last great stronghold of human rights on the face of the earth.

Let us remember it is impossible to win a modern war. The loser often gains more than the winner, and in any event both sides are bled white, bankrupted financially, decimated physically, and disillusioned spiritually. The boom that comes with war is a mirage. While some businesses may prosper temporarily, all business ultimately suffers if it does not collapse.

I am no pacifist. I would fight to defend the United States from attack or invasion. But I am a realist. I know that the United States would win any war in Europe, but we can never dictate a just peace, so our help means simply the death of our men, the suffering of our women, the collapse of our industry, and the impairing of our finances, while Europe lays the groundwork for the next war at the conference table.

Modern war is complete. The terrorizing and the starving of women and children constitute an important element of victory. Did you see the pictures of childless London in yesterday's newspapers, with its empty playgrounds. Millions of children will never know the taste of milk for the years of the war. They will become the rickety, sickly generation known as "war babies." In fact we can call the youth of any war period truly a lost generation.

We all remember the debauchery, crime, and atheism that followed the last war and can only imagine what will follow the next. When millions of humans are concerned only with the starvation, destruction, and death of other humans, God's influence is very low in the world. Even some churches plead passionately for the annihilation of the foe. What a mockery of the peace and brotherly love that forms the background of all religion. But that is war. Why did our forefathers come here? They wanted to be rid of the never-ending feuds and brutalities of the Old World. And yet there are those among us so light-hearted and light-headed that they would destroy this priceless peace and security. Upon the declaration of any war we would immediately lose all our precious rights and liberties. Our men would be ripped from their homes and loved ones, wrapped in a uniform, and shipped off to Europe to do or to die. Is that why our forefathers came here? No.

I think it is fair to divide Americans into three classes. First, a small selfish group who see in any war an opportunity for huge personal profit and power. They might be called the blood-money brigade. Second, also a small group, we have our world savers. They are brave crusaders who are determined to build a new world, generally with someone else's blood. And third, we have the vast majority of our people who want peace and security, law and order, liberty and freedom, a home and a family. This third group, though not organized, constitutes the backbone of our country. Should they stand firm against the blood-money brigade and the world savers, peace for America is assured.

But can our people stand firm against the never-ceasing flood of words and pictures emanating from at home and abroad, the sole purpose of which is to soften our resolve for neutrality?

What was known a few years ago as lies today passes as propaganda, the backbone of terroristic government, the cloak for official and governmental libel, and the product of a highly specialized, intricate business. Propaganda today is as important to winning a war as food and guns.

Sometimes propaganda, for all the care and deviltry used in its preparation, is so obvious that even we in the United States, inclined to be credulous and naive, see through it. For instance, a British air force attacks a German naval base, and Mr. Churchill says many direct hits were scored and no losses suffered. But Mr. Goebbels has another version. No ships were hit, but four British planes were shot down.

It is not that sort of obviously false report of which we must beware. Propaganda, to be good propaganda, must be insidious. It should not and generally is not recognized as propaganda, and we with our free press and open discussion, are perfect targets for it.

I cannot impress upon you too strongly the need to believe nothing you read and nothing you hear. Be patient. Even the most interesting dispatch in 48 hours will generally be found false. But even that is not enough. Like the carriers of some diseases, we ourselves are often carriers of propaganda, and like those same carriers of disease, would shudder and vehemently deny it.

The repetition of unfounded rumor, the word-of-mouth dissemination of what someone else's cousin heard from his boss's secretary, back-fence gossip, the careless charge, the hasty conclusion, make us all tools of the propagandist.

Let us not be fooled again.

In all this talk of pressure, dictation, might and right, democracy and aggressor, and in all the horror of the conflict now raging in Europe, strive to remember this one thing: There is only one power in the United States that can declare war, and that is the Congress of the United States.

Months ago, when the peace of Europe hung in the balance, I made a pledge to the people of my own community. It was this: That I shall never vote to send American troops to foreign soil even if I am the only Member of Congress to vote against it.

If you would exact that pledge from your Member of Congress and if a majority of the Members of Congress would make such a pledge, the particular form of neutrality legislation would be of secondary importance.

So I want to leave this one message with you. Ask your Congressman to give you this solemn pledge: "I will never vote to send American troops into any conflict on foreign soil."

The men who have died to make this Nation free and great look to us, the living, to carry on in peace.

Theodore Roosevelt-Navy Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VITO MARCANTONIO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, on October 27, throughout the country, all patriotic Americans celebrated Theodore Roosevelt-Navy Day. I notice that several people have been trying to usurp the credit for the founding of this patriotic occasion. I feel duty bound to set the record straight, and hereby establish that the suggestion came from an ex-service man and one of my constituents, Mr. Joseph J. Bruno.

Navy Day was actually inaugurated by the Navy League in Washington sometime in 1922. At that time the newspapers carried the headline "No date set for Navy Day." Whereupon, Mr. Joseph J. Bruno, who had faithfully served our country in the Navy during the World War, wrote a letter sometime in September 1922 to the then Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Col. Theodore Roosevelt, suggesting that the celebration of Navy Day take place on October 27, as this date marked the anniversary of the birth of President Theodore Roosevelt.

It will be remembered that President Theodore Roosevelt had devoted himself to the establishing of a sound naval policy for the United States of America. Mr. Bruno pointed out that President Theodore Roosevelt had written a naval history of the War of 1812, a work of such great merit that it was incorporated into Clowe's Royal Navy, a monumental history of the British sea service.

Mr. Bruno also pointed out that as Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and finally as President, Theodore Roosevelt strenuously impressed upon the American people the necessity for an adequate navy, and sought through his leadership to realize that ideal. October is also the month in which the American Navy was founded in 1775 by the Continental Congress.

The following letters received by Mr. Bruno from Col. Theodore Roosevelt attest to the fact that it was Joseph J. Bruno who actually and originally did make the suggestion that Navy Day fall on October 27, which is the date of the anniversary of President Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. Speaker, I do hope the proof submitted herein will establish once and for all that the idea of celebrating Navy Day on October 27, the date which marks the anniversary of the birth of Theodore Roosevelt, was originally suggested by my constituent, the good, patriotic American, Joseph J. Bruno.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
ASSISTANT SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, November 11, 1922.

Mr. JOSEPH J. BRUNO,
American Legion, 2127 First Avenue, New York City.

MY DEAR MR. BRUNO: Many thanks for your letter. Indeed, I showed your original suggestion to everyone concerned in Washington.

With best wishes,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
ASSISTANT SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, September 19, 1922.

Mr. JOSEPH J. BRUNO,
2127 First Avenue, New York City.

MY DEAR MR. BRUNO: Thank you for your letter. Navy Day will be October 27, and there has been some talk about having it made identical with the celebration of my father's birthday. However, you can see that this matter must rest entirely with the Navy League. It would not be practical for me to make any suggestions thereon.

I hope you are going to be at Syracuse this week. If you are, be sure to come and speak to me.

With best wishes,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAM C. MASSINGALE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, the House has under consideration House Joint Resolution 306, containing the Senate amendments to the neutrality bill. There is a great deal of misunderstanding about what neutrality is and just the effect of the proposed changes in the law, and here I call attention to the essential differences between the several neutrality acts and the proposed Neutrality Act.

ESSENTIAL DIFFERENCES IN THE SEVERAL NEUTRALITY ACTS

The present Neutrality Act passed in 1935, as amended in May 1937, forbids the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war from any place in the United States to any belligerent state or to any neutral state for transshipment to or for use of a belligerent state; and further provides that no articles or materials whatever shall be shipped from the United States to any neutral state for transshipment to a belligerent state unless the title to such goods shall first be transferred to some foreign government or agency thereof.

The bill as passed by the House of Representatives in June 1939 was substantially the same as the amended act of 1937 in respect to the shipment of goods. The present House Joint Resolution 306 as amended by the Senate, in broad language makes it unlawful for any American vessel to carry passengers, or articles, or materials to any belligerent state, and there is no exception to this except the general exception that is in the law as amended in May 1937, and the proposed law passed by the House in June 1939, which makes the laws inapplicable to such countries as Canada and Mexico.

The main difference between the two laws is that under the existing law as amended in May 1937, an American ship may transport to a neutral country materials other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war; while under the Senate amendment House Joint Resolution 306, no American ship is allowed to carry such articles or any materials to any belligerent state.

The law as amended in May 1937 is specific in forbidding exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a belligerent state; whereas the House Joint Resolution 306 as amended by the Senate is general in its terms and prohibits shipment of any kind of articles or materials to a belligerent state. Under the amended law of 1937, anything may be shipped from the United States to a belligerent state or for a belligerent state other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war; while the House Joint Resolution 306 makes it unlawful for an American ship to carry such articles and materials to any belligerent state but leaves open the right of foreign ships to transport from an American port any articles or materials to a belligerent state and does not include or forbid the carrying from an American port of arms, ammunition, or implements of war by other than American ships to a belligerent state.

CASH AND CARRY

There is nothing magic in the term "cash and carry" and it is not new in the neutrality legislation of this Congress. The law of 1935, as amended in May 1937, provided for cash and carry. See section 2 (b).

The bill as passed by the House of Representatives in June 1939 also carried the same provision with reference to so-called cash and carry, except it provides for 90 days' credit, if authorized by the President. See section 4 (d).

House Joint Resolution 306, with Senate amendments, likewise carries the same provisions with reference to cash and carry.

I mention this simply for the reason that the newspapers and many of the speakers on the Neutrality Act and the proposal to repeal or modify it urge as a reason therefor that House Joint Resolution 306, as amended by the Senate, is pioneering in the cash-and-carry thought. In addition to the fact that the proposed Senate amendment is not a pioneer thought on cash and carry, it is wholly compatible with the President's wish to have cash and carry in the bill with reference to everything except shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war. I am sure from the President's statements and from what I know of him that his sincere desire is to so conduct the foreign policy of this Government as to save the people of America from the unpredictable consequences of another World War. He does not want it, and I do not believe any Member of Congress wants it.

I want to see put back into the law a prohibition against the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war because it is my belief that if such amendment should carry, and no arms, ammunition, or implements of war should be sold by this country to any one of the warring powers, there would be less danger of our involvement than there will be if we set up an arsenal in the United States to ship such destructive agencies to any one of the warring powers. Therefore, I am going to vote for what is known as the Shanley amendment. That amendment is to the effect that the Senate amendments shall be amended by prohibiting the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war from any place in the United States to any belligerent state or to any neutral state for transshipment to or for the use of any belligerent state. It further provides that the President shall from time to time by proclamation definitely enumerate the arms, ammunition, and implements of war, the export of which is prohibited by this amendment. The arms, ammunition, and implements of war so enumerated shall include bombs, torpedoes, poison gas, flame throwers, and other articles heretofore enumerated, but shall not include raw materials. The exclusion would take into consideration such items as cotton, wheat, and goods necessary for the protection of human life and comfort. The thought is unbearable to me that a great Nation and powerful Government like this should be manufacturing and sending abroad to any of the warring powers such destructive and abominable agencies of death as poison gas, flame throwers, and the like.

I do not want my Government to be in that kind of business, and largely for that reason I am going to support the Shanley amendment. I do not believe that any Member of the House would willingly prefer to see his Government ship that kind of death-dealing machinery to England or France or elsewhere to enable those countries in this war to more speedily kill and destroy old men, women, and children, even if they are citizens of Germany or elsewhere. I should like to go along with the President on this bill, for I have gone along with him on practically everything that he has asked since I have been a Member of Congress. But I cannot do it without first doing my best to include an embargo against arms shipments; and as between the choice of doing what I would like to do and doing what I have to do to satisfy my conscience, I am going to choose the latter course.

Much has been said about the neutrality or the unneutrality of the laws of 1937 as compared with the proposed House Joint Resolution 306 as amended by the Senate. I think a frank statement would require a person to say that both the laws of 1937 and the proposed House Joint Resolution 306 as amended by the Senate are wholly and patently unneutral. I do not see where there can be any question about this statement. For instance, throughout the law of 1937, and also in the Senate amendment to House Joint Resolution 306, there are specific exceptions to the territorial operation of the respective acts. Neither one proposes to interfere with the right to ship arms, ammunition, and implements of war to such countries as Canada and Mexico or republics of South America. With such provisions in a law or in a proposed law, it would be unneutral.

Personally, I do not believe that in any great world tragedy, such as the war raging in Europe today, the human mind is capable of being neutral. Whether we express it or not, each member here must feel his unneutrality, and I do not censure any man for his sentiment regarding the participants in that war. I do not take much stock in many of the speeches that have been made attacking England or France or Germany, for such argument, if it can be so dignified, is merely an expression of sympathy or hostility toward the particular people attacked. In our saner moments, I am sure each one of us realizes the tremendous debt of gratitude that we owe to the English people and to the French people; and I am sure that all of us, whether we are favorable to the French or English or not, are bound to concede that America owes as much to the great German people as it does to any other people of the earth. Sturdy stock has been transplanted into this country of ours from Germany, and it has contributed too much to the greatness of our Nation for us to try to learn the hymns of hate that others sing against them. The sins of Hitler are no more chargeable to the German people than are the sins of Al Capone to the American people. This is a period of great danger to the American people for it is a period of sentiment making. The best thing that America can do for its own protection just now is to endeavor to subdue the passion and prejudice resulting from what is taking place on the continent of Europe. I do not believe that that war is justified, and I think it is a cruel and unnecessary one, but why should we work ourselves into a lather by abuse and condemnation of one side or the other?

The tragedy is terrible enough if we let it alone. We can make it worse for ourselves if we are eternally saying mean things about those involved in it. It is a difficult thing for a Member of Congress to tell whether or not his vote for repeal of the present law is more dangerous to the people of America than continuing the present law would be. I am sure that everybody who is to cast a vote on this most important matter is endeavoring to cast such a vote as will in his judgment better prevent America's becoming involved in that European war. I voted for the arms embargo clause when this matter was for consideration in the House in 1939, and while I do not subscribe to those debaters who contend that we have no right to change a particular law when we discover that it is operating unfairly between others, I do believe that we ought to try to be as consistent and clear about it as it is possible for us to be. It would be of particular value to call to mind these statements from Washington's Farewell Address:

> A passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. * *· * It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied the others, and produces jealousy and ill will and a disposition to retaliate on the part of the one from whom equal privileges are withheld. * * *
>
> The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

We told the people of the world by the act of 1937 that we are not going to permit the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to any belligerent country or to any other country for transshipment to them. As stated, I believe we have a right to change that law when we find that it is operating unfairly, but I am just wondering if the admonition of George Washington is not potent enough to cause us to hesitate to change this law. In other words, where he advises us, "Here let us stop," is about the best advice that we can get. I believe

George Washington would say that the law of 1937 is an engagement that we made and it ought to be fulfilled with perfect good faith. I am inclined, therefore, to keep the embargo on the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war in the law as it has been since 1937. Speaking as an individual, I prefer a rigid and virile American foreign policy with regard to our merchant marine, but the devastating blight that would fall upon this Nation in the event of its involvement in this war is sufficient to overcome that feeling that I personally entertain. In matters of this magnitude, the gravity is such that I do not believe any Member of Congress ought to cast any vote unless he knows that he is speaking his own sentiments after having advised with his God about it. Surely no man should vote a contrary vote because he does not like the President of the United States; and no man should vote favorably just because he favors the President of the United States. Not many in this House are going to have the opportunity of rendering a more distinct service to the Government of the United States and to the people of the country than this occasion presents, if we cast our votes according to the very best consideration that we can give the bill. We ought to be careful that in this instance, at least, we do the thing that will accomplish what the American people most desire, and what civilization demands of us, and what God expects us to do. We ought to bear in mind that there is plenty of time to get into war, if it is war that we want. Once we get into it, the only way out is to fight our way out, and we know what the price will be, both in blood and in treasure.

I trust that the law will be amended by restoring the embargo against shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to any of the warring powers. Under the Senate amendment, America has retreated from the high seas insofar as its commerce is concerned. We are voluntarily giving up the use of ships that cost probably half a billion dollars, merchant marine ships, and putting them into drydock or running them into some haven and forgetting all about our commerce and trade, in order to avoid the danger of our involvement in this war. That is a great sacrifice, and very few nations would make it. If we can make that sacrifice in our trade and commerce, ought it not to be an easy thing to say that we will go further and do a thing which will not cost the Government of the United States a dime, by simply saying that we will not ship the death-dealing bombs, poison gas, flame throwers, and other agencies to murder people? The only ones who will reap any benefit out of such transactions will be those who make the devices mentioned. The only benefit, if any, that the Government of the United States will get out of the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war will be jobs that a few men will get in the factories that make them. We know this will be inconsequential. Our retreat from the high seas with our merchant ships will cost millions of dollars in loss of trade and will affect everybody in America that raises or manufactures anything that will be required for the people of Europe to live on, for we may expect that all American ports and warehouses and elevators will be choked with American-made goods, manufactured articles, and farm products because the ships will not be available to transport them. If we can forego that much, why is it not better to take another step and stop the shipment of arms and ammunition to the warring countries of Europe? We must not forget that our interest in European affairs must necessarily not be concerned with state boundaries in Europe or political power on that continent. True, we share and have a right to share, all the abhorrence of war; but this war is not ours. We did not make it. We did not contribute to it in the very remotest degree. I think it behooves us to stay at home, strengthen our domestic affairs, and make sure that we shall never be in any war unless some brute undertakes to come here to enforce his will upon us—and if such should happen, and I am sure it will not, I hope we are prepared to make a summary ending of it. I do not look for war, but there is always danger of our being involved as long as the world is inflicted with war.

After the War, Peace!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, 181 against to 243 for is the sad record of the roll-call vote this afternoon, November 2, 1939, in the House of Representatives on the question of repeal of the embargo against the sale of arms and munitions of war. My heart sinks when I realize the meaning of such a vote. I was never so forlorn or so filled with despair as I am tonight as I approach the thankless task of trying to pick up the wreckage after the storm, to use a descriptive phrase with which we are all familiar.

I know of no better time, however, than right now to start to build on the broken pedestal of hope for a real peace after the war which we cannot escape, I fear, after the action of the House today.

In a great majority of the hundreds of speeches I have made on many and varied occasions in the past 12 years I have stated that there is a way to a real and lasting peace, a way as yet untried, a way open to us after all else—all human experimentation—has failed—a sure way, because it is the way appointed by the Creator of Mankind.

I suggested it in my address in the House on February 22, last, entitled "Is Democracy in Guam," again on May 9, in my "The Only Road to Peace"; also in my neutrality address of June 28, and again yesterday, when I suggested in my remarks before the House that we should, as a corollary to our vote here today, demand the right to write the terms of the next treaty of peace when this war has finally burned itself out after years of destruction.

The future welfare of this Nation and of humanity in general greatly depends on how well we write that peace treaty, consequently, I want to cut the pattern for it now, to set out a formula. I want to have it ready for the great minds—if any be left then—who will sit around the peace table in that day and year after travail and shedding of blood have wrought the reform we need, and have burned the word "honesty" into our hearts and souls, which the oratory of the Congress could not do this year, even though supported by the voices and letters of thousands of our citizens begging us not to traffic in war materials.

WE GO TO WAR

Religious, racial, political, economic, and patriotic prejudices destroy peace and the edifice of humanity. As long as these prejudices prevail, humanity will not ever have rest. How can we best remove them? How? Did you ever ask yourself that question? If so, and if you found the answer, you are to be highly congratulated for you are one of God's noblemen.

For a period of 6,000 years history informs us about this world of ours. During these 6,000 years we have not been free from war, strife, murder, and bloodthirstiness. In every period war has been waged in one country or another and that war was due to business competition fought under a cloak of either religious prejudice, racial prejudice, political prejudice, or patriotic prejudice. Consequently the answer to the problem must be found in the removal of these prejudices as all are destructive of the human edifice. As long as these prejudices persist, the struggle for existence must remain dominant, and bloodthirstiness and rapacity continue.

Therefore, today, in this twentieth century, even as was the case in the past, the world of humanity cannot be saved from the darkness of nature and economic rivalry, and cannot attain illumination except through the abandonment of prejudices and by the acquisition of the morals of the kingdom as enunciated by Jesus Christ over nineteen hundred years ago.

Consider if there is prejudice and enmity on account of religion. Religion should be the cause of fellowship, otherwise it is fruitless. And if this prejudice be the prejudice of nationality, all mankind are of one nation; all have sprung from the tree of Adam. That tree is one and all these nations are only the branches, while the individuals of humanity are like leaves, blossoms, and fruits of the branches. Therefore it is ignorance and selfishness which sets one nation up against another in war.

As to the patriotic prejudice, this is also due to absolute ignorance, for the surface of the earth is everyone's native land. Everyone can live in any spot on this globe. All the world is man's birthplace. These boundaries, and the red and blue lines on the maps, are devised by selfish man. In the creation, such boundaries were not assigned. Europe is one continent; Asia is one continent; America, Africa, Australia are each one continent; but some, from personal motives and selfish interests, have divided each one of these continents and considered a certain part as their own country.

NO FRONTIER

God has set up no frontier between France and Germany; they are continuous; yet selfish souls for the promotion of their own interests fight over these imaginary lines on the maps. And this situation will continue indefinitely, if this conception of patriotism remains limited within a certain circle, and it will be a primary cause of the world's destruction. No, my friends, the terrestrial globe is the motherland of us all and not any restricted area, for is not man the son of God and is not God also the creator of the earth—therefore the property of each individual by right of inheritance. In fact it is not only ours to live on, but it is also in death our eternal tomb. Is it worth while that we should engage in bloodshed and stage war after war as we are now and always have, over this eternal tomb?

SIGNS OF IMPENDING CHAOS

Not only have we widespread war in progress, but never, indeed, have there been such widespread and basic upheavals, whether in the social, economic, or political spheres of human activity, as are now going on all over the world. Never have there been so many and varied sources of danger as those that now threaten the structure of society. How long will humanity persist in its waywardness? How long will injustice continue? How long is chaos and confusion to reign among men? How long will discord agitate the face of society? The signs of impending chaos and convulsions can now be discerned, inasmuch as the prevailing order appears to be lamentably defective.

The disquieting influence of over 30,000,000 souls in minorities living under precarious conditions in Europe; the vast and ever-swelling army of the unemployed here, with its crushing burden and demoralizing influence on governments and peoples; the wicked, unbridled race of armaments swallowing an ever-increasing share of the substance of already impoverished nations; the utter demoralization of the international financial markets; the onslaught of secularism invading what has hitherto been regarded as the impregnable strongholds of Christian orthodoxy—these stand out as some of the grave symptoms that bode ill for the future stability of the structure of modern civilization. Little wonder that one of Europe's preeminent thinkers, honored for his wisdom and restraint, should have been forced to make so bold an assertion: "The world is passing through the gravest crisis in the history of civilization." "We stand," writes another, "before either a world catastrophe, or perhaps before the dawn of a greater era of truth and wisdom." It is in such times that religions have perished and are born.

Might we not already discern, as we scan the political horizon, the alignment of those forces that are dividing afresh the continent of Europe into two camps of combatants, determined upon a contest that may mark, unlike the last war, the end of an epoch, a vast epoch, in the history of human evolution?

Are we, the privileged custodians of a priceless faith and a great principle of government, called upon to witness a cataclysmical change, politically as fundamental and spiritually as beneficent as that which precipitated the fall of the Roman Empire in the west? Might it not happen, perhaps, that out of this world eruption there may stream forces of such spiritual energy as shall recall, nay eclipse, the splendor of those signs and wonders that accompanied the establishment of the faith of Christianity? Might there not emerge out of the agony of a shaken world a religious revival of such scope and power as to even transcend the potency of those world-directing forces with which the religions of the past have, at fixed intervals and according to an inscrutable wisdom, revived the fortunes of declining ages and peoples? Might not the bankruptcy of this present, this highly vaunted materialistic civilization, in itself clear away the choking weeds that now hinder the unfoldment and perfection of God's struggling faith?

GUIDING PRINCIPLES OF A NEW WORLD ORDER

Shall we strive to attempt or venture to obtain a glimpse of the first streaks of the promised dawn that must, in the fullness of time, chase away the gloom that has encircled humanity? Let me point out in broad outline what appears to be the guiding principles underlying a new world order.

That the unrest and suffering afflicting the mass of mankind are in no small measure the direct consequences of the World War and attributable to the unwisdom and shortsightedness of the framers of the peace treaties only a biased mind can refuse to admit. It would be idle, however, to contend that the war, with all the losses it involved, the passions it aroused, and the grievances it left behind, has solely been responsible for the unprecedented confusion into which almost every section of the civilized world is plunged at present.

Is it not a fact—and this is one of the ideas I desire to bring out—that the fundamental cause of this world unrest is attributable, not so much to the consequences of what must sooner or later come to be regarded as a transitory dislocation in the affairs of a continually changing world, but rather to the failure of those into whose hands the immediate destinies of peoples and nations have been committed, to adjust their system of religious, economic, and political institutions to the imperative needs of a rapidly evolving age? Are not these intermittent crises that convulse present-day society due primarily to the lamentable inability of the world's recognized leaders and preachers to read aright the signs of the times, to rid themselves of their preconceived ideas and fettering creeds, and to reshape the machinery of their respective governments or positions according to a new standard—the standard that is implicit in the declaration of the oneness of mankind, the chief and distinguishing feature of the faith Christ proclaimed? Consider that question carefully and see if your answer is not the same as mine. Do you not recall that in every dispensation the light of divine guidance has been focused on one central theme? In this glorious century of ours the foundation of the faith of God and the distinguishing feature of His law are the evidences and the consciousness of the oneness of mankind.

How pathetic indeed are the efforts of all those leaders of human institutions who, in utter disregard of the spirit of the age, are striving to adjust national processes, suitable to the ancient days of self-contained nations, to an age which must either achieve the unity of the world or perish. At so critical an hour in the history of the world, great and small, whether in the east or in the west, whether victors or vanquished, whether aggressors or peacemakers, all must give heed to this clarion call and arise manfully to carry out in its entirety the one remedial scheme He, the Divine Physician, has prescribed for an ailing humanity. Let them discard, once for all, every preconceived idea, every national prejudice or human subterfuge, and give heed to this sublime counsel.

WE NEED A UNITED STATES OF THE WORLD

Here in America, I am convinced, we can best serve our country by striving in our capacity as a citizen to assist in the eventual application of the principle of federalism underlying our own Government, to the relationships now existing between all the peoples and nations of the world, so that we may have a United States of the World.

Such an ideal requires great leadership. True civilization will unfurl its banner in the midmost heart of the world whenever a certain number of its distinguished and high-minded leaders—the shining exemplars of devotion and determination—shall, for the good and happiness of all mankind, arise with firm resolve and clear vision to establish in this way the cause of real and universal peace—universal peace, and not the fake, nationalistic peace most of us have been pursuing without satisfactory results. The cause of peace must be made the object of general consultation, built on a union of the nations and peoples of the world. We must conclude a binding treaty and establish a covenant, the provisions of which shall be sound, inviolable, and definite. It must be proclaimed to all the world and obtain the sanction of all the human race. This supreme and noble undertaking—the real source of the peace and well-being of all the world—should be regarded as sacred by all that dwell on earth. All the forces of humanity must be mobilized to insure the stability and permanence of this great covenant, the world's great need. In such an all-embracing pact the rights and limitations of each and every people and nation should be clearly fixed, the principles underlying the relations of governments toward one another definitely laid down, and all international agreements and obligations ascertained and determined.

In like manner the size of the armaments of every government should be strictly limited, for if the preparations for war and the military forces of any nation should be allowed to increase they will arouse the suspicion of others. The fundamental principle underlying this solemn pact should be so fixed that if any government later violates any one of its provisions all the governments on earth should rise to reduce it to utter submission; nay, the human race as a whole should resolve, with every power at its disposal, to destroy that government. Should this greatest of all remedies be applied to the sick body of the world it will recover from its ills and will remain safe from war, without the least bit of doubt.

INDOMITABLE DETERMINATION REQUIRED

Some timid souls, unaware of the power latent in human endeavor, consider this suggestion as highly impracticable; nay, even beyond the scope of man's utmost efforts. Such is not the case, however. On the contrary, thanks to the unfailing grace of God, the loving kindness of His favored ones, and the unrivaled endeavors of wise and capable souls, nothing whatsoever can be regarded as unattainable. Endeavor, ceaseless endeavor, is required. Nothing short of an indomitable determination can possibly achieve it. Many a cause which past ages have regarded as purely visionary now in this day has become an accomplished fact. Why should this most great and lofty cause—the cornerstone of true civilization, of the advancement, the well-being, and the success of all humanity—be regarded as impossible of achievement?

THE LIGHTS OF UNITY

In cycles gone by, though harmony was established, yet, owing to the absence of means, the unity of all mankind could not have been achieved. Continents remained widely divided, so that, even among the peoples of one and the same continent, association and interchange of thought were well-nigh impossible. Consequently, understanding and unity amongst all the peoples and kindreds of the earth were unattainable.

In this day, however, means of communication have multiplied, and the five continents of the earth have virtually merged into one. In like manner all the members of the human family, whether peoples or governments, cities or villages, have become increasingly interdependent. For none is self-sufficiency any longer possible or desirable, inasmuch as political ties unite all peoples and nations, and the bonds of trade and industry, of agriculture and education are being strengthened every day. Time and space have virtually been eliminated as elements in world conditions. Hence, the unity of all mankind can in this day be achieved. Actually this is none other but one of the wonders of this wondrous age, this glorious century. Of this, past ages have been deprived. This century—the century of light—has been endowed with the miraculous unfolding of a fresh marvel every day, but none greater than that which I have just described, because it makes possible the true road to peace.

As foundation stones of that accomplishment there are seven elements of unity which will needs accompany it, if its benefits are to be permanently enjoyed. The first is unity in the political realm, early glimmerings of which have been discernible for some time. The second element is unity of thought in world undertakings, such as crime curing, temperance, and disease controls. The third is unity in freedom. The fourth is unity in religion. The fifth is the unity of nations, causing all the peoples of the world to regard themselves as citizens of one common government. The sixth is unity of races, and the seventh element is unity of language. Each and every one of these will inevitably come to pass inasmuch as the power of the Kingdom of God has, is, and will assist in their realization.

"But," I hear someone say, "there will be opposition." Yes; there is and will be, and yet are we not justified in deriving fresh encouragement when we observe that the very consideration of such proposals is in itself an evidence of their steady growth in the minds and hearts of men? In the organized attempts that are made to discredit so exalted a conception, are we not witnessing the repetition, on a large scale, of those stirring struggles and fierce controversies that preceded the birth, and assisted in the reconstruction, of our own present unified action in this country?

THE FEDERATION OF MANKIND

To pursue this illustration further, how confident were the assertions made in the days preceding the unification of the States of the North American Continent regarding the insuperable barriers that stood in the way of their ultimate federation! Was it not widely and emphatically declared that the conflicting interests, the mutual distrust, the differences of government and habit that divided the States were such as no force, whether spiritual or temporal, could ever hope to harmonize or control?

And yet, how different were the conditions prevailing a hundred and fifty years ago from those that characterize present-day society! It would indeed be no exaggeration to say that the absence of those facilities which modern scientific progress has placed at the service of humanity in our time made of the problem of welding the American States into a single federation, a task infinitely more complex than that which confronts a divided humanity in its efforts to achieve the unification of all mankind into a United States of the World.

Upon the consummation of this colossal and glorious enterprise will depend the fulfillment of the prophecies uttered by the prophets of old when swords shall be beaten into plowshares and the lion and the lamb lie down together. It alone can usher in the kingdom of the Heavenly Father as anticipated by the faith and by the prayer of Jesus Christ, whose main point in His philosophy proclaimed the oneness of mankind. Surely the world, contracted and transformed into a single highly complex organism by the marvelous progress achieved in the realm of physical science, by the world-wide expansion of commerce and industry, and struggling, under the pressure of world economic forces, amidst the pitfalls of a materialistic civilization, stands in dire need of a restatement of the truth of that philosophy.

Into such a period and condition, overshadowed by such moral and social gloom, we are now steadily and irresistibly moving whether we will it so or not. Amidst the shadows which are increasingly gathering about us we can faintly discern the glimmerings appearing fitfully on the horizon of history. To us, the generation of the half light, living at a time which may be designated as the period of the incubation of the world commonwealth, has been assigned a task whose high privilege we can never sufficiently appreciate and the arduousness of which we can as yet but dimly recognize. We may well believe, we who are called upon to experience the operation of the dark forces destined to unloose a flood of agonizing afflictions, that the darkest hour that must precede the dawn of the golden age of our faith has about struck.

UNIVERSAL FERMENT

If we view the world carefully, we cannot miss the clear evidence of that universal fermentation which, in every continent and in every department of human life, be it religious, social, economic, or political, is purging and reshaping humanity in anticipation of the day when the wholeness of the human race will have been recognized and its unity established.

A twofold process, however, can be distinguished, each tending in its own way and with an accelerated momentum, to bring to a climax the forces that are transforming the face of our planet. The first is essentially an integrating process, while the second is fundamentally disruptive. The former, as it steadily evolves, unfolds a system which may well serve as a pattern for that world polity toward which a strangely disordered world is continually advancing, while the latter, as its disintegrating influence deepens, tends to tear down, with increasing violence, the antiquated barriers that seek to block humanity's progress toward its destined goal. The constructive process stands associated with the faith of Jesus and is the harbinger of the new order which that faith must ere long establish. The destructive forces that characterize the other should be identified with a secular civilization that has refused to answer to the expectation of this new age and is consequently falling into chaos and decline.

A titanic struggle, unparalleled in its magnitude, yet unspeakably glorious in its final consequences, is being waged as a result of these very opposing tendencies. The hollow and outworn institutions, the obsolescent doctrines and beliefs, the effete and discredited traditions which these forces represent, have, in certain instances, been undermined by virtue of their senility, the loss of their cohesive power, and their own inherent corruption. The perversion of human nature, the degradation of human conduct, the corruption and dissolution of human institutions, reveal themselves, under such circumstances, in their worst and most revolting aspects. Human character is debased, confidence is shaken, the nerves of discipline are relaxed, the voice of human conscience is stilled, the sense of decency and shame is obscured, conception of duty in both high and low places, of solidarity, of reciprocity, and loyalty are distorted, and the very feeling of peacefulness, of joy, and of hope is gradually extinguished.

ELEMENTS OF A DECADENT SOCIETY

The reappearance of religious intolerance, of racial animosity, and of patriotic arrogance; the increasing evidences of selfishness, of suspicion, of fear, and of fraud; the spread of terrorism, of lawlessness, of drunkenness, and of crime; the unquenchable thirst for, and the feverish pursuit after, earthly vanities, riches, and pleasures; the weakening of family solidarity; the laxity in parental control; the lapse into luxurious indulgence; the degeneracy of art and music, the infection of literature, and the corruption of our press; the extension of the influence and activities of those "prophets of decadence" who refuse to regard the procreation of children as the sacred and primary purpose of marriage, who denounce religion as an opiate of the people, who would, if given free rein, lead back the human race to barbarism, chaos, and ultimate extinction—all these appear as the outstanding characteristics of a decadent society, a society that must be either reborn, or perish.

With this situation, compare and consider the character and philosophy of Christ. Instead of the recrudescence just described, He pushed every good trait of human character and condition of life to its utmost limit of perfection. His forgiveness was unbounded, His generosity was untiring, His patience was inexhaustible, His mercy was immeasurable, His courage was illimitable, His wisdom was unfathomable, His kindness was interminable, His faith removed mountains, His hope had no shadow in it, His love was infinite.

Of these two pictures of a pattern for life and for a basis for social, economic, political, and religious stability and success and peace, which do you choose as the ultimate winner? Does anyone doubt which philosophy of life will be the eventual winner? And then remember that the central feature in the real Christian philosophy points and leads to the unification of the whole of mankind.

Unity of family, of tribe, of city, State, and Nation have been successively attempted and fully established. World unity is now the final goal toward which a harassed humanity is slowly striving. Nation building seems to have come to a standstill, except perhaps temporarily and artificially by force of arms. The anarchy inherent in state sovereignty when carried to its ultimate is moving us all toward a climax. A world growing to maturity must abandon this fetish, in the interest of all our fellow men, recognizing the oneness and wholeness of human relationships, and establish once for all the machinery that can best incarnate this great fundamental principle of its life.

We blame the munitions makers, the international bankers, crooked diplomats, and unwise statesmen for war. But what, if they are the cause, are we going to do about it? After so placing the blame it seems to me that we have done absolutely nothing about it of a constructive nature. All corrective measures at least have failed. By the vote of this Congress we have even removed the restrictions against the sale of munitions. Is it not evident therefore that something new and untried must be the answer, rather than the false cures and remedies we have so unsuccessfully sought to apply?

How can we control international problems except with international machinery? Our mistake is that we have tried to do it with local or national laws. I suggest an international organization for peace and contend that the preordained unity of the human race implies the establishment of a world commonwealth in which all nations, races, creeds, and classes are closely and permanently united, and in which the autonomy of its state members and the personal freedom and initiative of the individuals that compose them are definitely and completely safeguarded as we have here in the United States.

This commonwealth must, so far as I can visualize it, consist of a world legislature, whose members will, as the trustees of the whole of mankind, ultimately control the resources of the component nations, and will enact such laws as shall be required to satisfy the needs and adjust the relationships of all races and peoples.

A world executive, backed by an international police force contributed on a proportional basis, will aid in preserving the peace of the world and in seeing that its international laws are obeyed and its organic unity is safeguarded. A world tribunal must adjudicate and deliver its compulsory and final verdict in all disputes arising between the various nations. That would be better than settling disputes by war, would it not? At least that is the way we settle disputes in this country between States and between people, so I assume it is a qualified method.

A world script, a world literature, a uniform and universal system of currency, of weights and measures, will simplify education, trade, and business problems and will produce a better, friendlier understanding among the nations and races of mankind. In such a world society, science and religion, the two greatest forces in human life, could be reconciled and would work together instead of out of harmony as they seem to be now as we practice the art of war.

If these words and thoughts which I have expressed are not true and if they are not in complete accord with the experience and wisdom of the ages; if they are not in accord with the eternal laws of the Creator, then they can but fail of realization. But if they are true, then is it not the duty of yourself and all of us to bring them into fruition and realization with every ounce of energy and talent at our command, and in the name of peace?

Monica Williams has penned a poem just fitted for this occasion. What more fitting conclusion can I append than this:

LOVE WILL NOT FAIL

There are no words with which to voice our grief
That war has come—no tears with which to weep,
For hearts in anguish a deep silence keep,
And minds are lulled to kindly unbelief.
It cannot be! There is no laurel wreath,
No joyous song of triumph that will leap
From muted throats; we know we can but reap,
The sorrow which all cruel wars bequeath.

And yet we wonder why such things must be;
Have we but built our house upon the sand,
Is there no good that evil shall prevail,
No God of Love to guide humanity?
Then let us look within and understand
That when we serve God first love will not fail.

Reciprocal-Trade Treaty With Uruguay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the announcement which has gone forth from the office of the Secretary of State that a reciprocal-trade treaty will be negotiated with Uruguay, I am in receipt of a letter today from a man in Oatman, Ariz., in which he says:

Relative to the enclosed clipping, am also enclosing label of one kind of imported canned beef for sale in this locality.

For several years there has been no American canned meats on sale in this section.

Before this administration the tax rolls for this county showed about 370,000 head of cattle, and there are about one-tenth as many now. Taxes have trebled. Tax delinquent property list has doubled and business and activities unprofitable, and one-third of the population on relief.

There was enclosed with the letter a label off of a can of corned beef stating "Fray Bentos Brand Compressed Cooked Corned Beef Made in Paraguay." It will be noted from the letter of my correspondent that, according to his figures, there were formerly about 370,000 head of cattle on the tax rolls in that county, whereas now there are only about one-tenth of that number, and that taxes have trebled and delinquent property tax lists doubled and business activities are unprofitable, and one-third of the people are on relief.

Arizona, like many of the other Western States, was formerly extensively engaged in stock raising. The same was true of my own State, Oregon, where the herds have diminished almost to the vanishing point in many localities. Notwithstanding this, we are importing increased amounts of meat products of all kinds from abroad, and particularly from South American points.

I most sincerely urge all of my colleagues, and particularly those from agricultural districts, to give serious consideration to this proposed trade treaty with Uruguay, as well as that with Argentina, upon which hearings were recently held. I have pending in the House, H. R. 7592, requiring all trade treaties hereafter to have Senate approval, as required by the Constitution. If the right to make treaties with respect to our foreign importations was again placed in the Senate, where it belongs under the Constitution, there would be an opportunity given to all of us as representatives of the several States to have a voice in determining what importations should be allowed, so that no agricultural products, particularly, should be permitted to be imported in direct competition with similar products produced here.

Cash and Carry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD D. COOLEY
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, on June 5, 1934, just after I was first nominated and before I was elected a Member of Congress, I received a letter from a very distinguished friend of mine, an eminent lawyer and a beloved citizen of my district, Mr. James H. Pou, Sr., of Raleigh, N. C., the brother of my very able predecessor, Hon. Edward W. Pou, who for 33 long years served with honor and distinction as a Member of this body, and was at the time of his death the dean of the House of Representatives and chairman of the Committee on Rules. The souls of both of these eminent and distinguished men have entered upon new careers in the regions of immortality but the tomb cannot enclose or retain the fine virtues of their lives. These brothers did much to enrich the lives of those who knew them and who felt the tolerance of their spirits and the kindness of their hearts, and their splendid contributions to the welfare and progress of their State and Nation will live long in our memory.

Mr. Speaker, sincere human affection inspires me to insert in the RECORD excerpts from the letter to which I have just referred as a tribute to the profound wisdom, foresight, and patriotism of the eminent lawyer, James H. Pou, late of the city of Raleigh:

RALEIGH, N. C., June 5, 1934.

Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY,
Nashville, N. C.

DEAR MR. COOLEY: I feel like suggesting to you a theme for your campaign speeches and for your activities in Congress, which I think well worth while as a service to the Government and as an introduction of you into national life. It is that you consider favoring congressional action which would authorize the President, in case of war breaking out between foreign countries, to issue embargoes regulating commerce with belligerents and with nations within the war zone by American citizens.

War in Europe and war in Asia are strong possibilities for the near future. We have no direct interest in either; and we can easily maintain our neutrality, if we do not undertake to trade in the war zone, either with the belligerents or with their close neighbors. If we undertake to enforce strict technical neutral rights (unless an effective blockade be maintained against that country, this is a recognized right), then I feel that we will almost inevitably be drawn into the next foreign war, even though we desire to maintain peace. If we place the enforcement of our trading rights as a neutral nation in the balance against our desire for peace, if we wait until war comes, we will find that the clamor for war will silence the prayers for peace; and we will be in the war without our wishes, as happened in 1812 and in 1917.

On the contrary, if we consent before the war begins to give the President the right to regulate commerce in the war zones, we can, without loss of prestige or pride, remain out. And I think that will be to our advantage—even our pecuniary advantage. Nine-tenths of our commerce is local; one-tenth is foreign. No war could destroy all of our foreign commerce. We could still do business with Canada, Mexico, and, in all probability, South America. If the war is European and not Asiatic, we can do additional business with China and Japan. Therefore an embargo could not cost us anything like all of our 10-percent foreign trade. It would probably cost us very little. Even if there were some net costs, that would be a mere trifle in expense and inconvenience in comparison with the cost of another war.

The conditions in which the world finds itself require a reexamination and a restatement of many of our old doctrines. One of these is the doctrine of neutral rights. I think a great self-contained nation like ours can well afford to say that, if our customers choose to fight among themselves, while it is a matter of great regret to us, in order that we may not be involved in the trouble we will forego trading with them except upon a cash-and-carry basis. If any of the belligerents wish to trade with us, will bring the money and come after our products, we will be glad to sell to them on this side; but we will not undertake delivery on the other side nor will we sell on a credit.

I think there is serious danger, within the next 2 or 3 years, of a foreign war; and, if we undertake to carry on commerce according to technical neutral rights, there is grave danger that we will become involved, no matter how much we desire to keep peace. It will be too late to vest this power in the President after war has begun. Too many of our people will see a profit. They will raise a patriotic cry and denounce everyone who favors embargo or staying out of war as a coward. The time to do it is before war begins; and I am strongly of the opinion that Congress could well afford to vest this power in the President. In fact, it is a power that cannot be practically exercised by Congress. It must be exercised, if at all, by the Executive. We had something like this during Jefferson's administration. After the rupture of the Treaty of Amiens in 1803, the embargo system was adopted. Our commerce suffered greatly because at that time our country was not nearly so well self-organized or self-contained as it is now. Suffering occurred, but Jefferson stayed out of the war. Gradually people adapted themselves to new conditions and manufacturing rapidly increased. While the inconvenience was serious, it was nothing like the inconvenience we suffered during the two and a half years after we went into war. In 1812, in the Presidential crisis, President Madison and Congress decided to declare war on Great Britain. Telegraphy was then unknown; and it is a tragic fact that the same week we declared war against Great Britain that country rescinded the ordinances against which we objected. We went to war and fought two and a half years about a grievance which had been removed. Had Congress delayed a month until the arrival of ships with the news we need not have gone through the War of 1812.

The embargo under Jefferson did not effectually stop trading. The people in New England carried on very actively commerce with Great Britain and with France; but they did so at their own risk and did not necessarily involve the United States in their troubles. They became rich under this contraband commerce without involving us in war. When war came and this commerce ended, they suffered greatly and showed a disposition to secede from the United States. I mention this to show that there will be compensations to persons who wish to trade at their own risk if an embargo were declared. In short, an embargo would simply be notice to the American people: "You must not trade with the countries at war or with the countries within the war zone."

If a war should break out between France and Germany, we could not trade with Holland, Denmark, Spain, or Portugal, because they would be supplying things to the belligerents, and immediately would be justified in sinking ships carrying contraband to these adjacent countries.

If you are interested in this, I would be glad to discuss it with you fully. I have been thinking about the subject a great deal. I foresee danger of a foreign war, and I am most earnest in the hope that we may stay out. I believe we can, provided we take appropriate action before the war begins.

(The remainder of the letter is more or less personal, is not pertinent, and is therefore not included.)

With much respect and best wishes, I am,

Your friend,

JAMES H. POU.

Within the next few hours Congress will enact legislation which will confer upon the President of the United States the right to regulate and to control and to prohibit commerce with belligerents. The legislation will authorize and empower the President to designate war zones, combat areas, and places of danger to our ships and our citizens. The legislation will provide for a cash-and-carry plan and will in all respects conform with the ideas and views expressed to me by Mr. James H. Pou in the letter which is dated June 5, 1934, and I indulge the hope entertained by my friend at that time that we will by staying out of the vestibule of war be able to avoid the vortex of war.

It will no doubt be recalled that I, together with others, in June before war was declared in Europe, sought to provide safeguards for the peace and security of our Nation which would prevent our citizens traveling in submarine-infested seas upon floating arsenals into war zones, combat areas, and belligerent ports. While I regret that the House was not willing at that time to provide such safeguards, I am happy in the thought that this body will within the next few hours approve a measure carrying a cash-and-carry plan which will enable us to maintain our strict neutrality and remain away from the conflict in which our Nation is not now immediately concerned.

Discussion on Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER PATRICK

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

THE AMERICAN FORUM OF THE AIR

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following program of the American Forum of the Air:

Announcer MCCORMICK. WOL, in cooperation with WOR presents the American Forum of the Air.

This is the fifth of this season's Sunday night broadcasts—emanating from the modern broadcasting studios of the new Department of the Interior Building in Washington, D. C. The facilities of these studios have been extended by the Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, in the interest of free speech, on assurances these educational broadcasts will present both sides of a national problem, temperately discussed by representatives of opposing schools of thought and conducted by a nonpartisan, nonpolitical organization.

Tonight's American Forum of the Air will be a departure from the routine generally followed on these widely listened to programs.

Under the direction of Theodore Granik, pioneer in educational radio discussion you will hear four outstanding American newspaper columnists first state their respective stands on the American neutrality policy. Following this formal presentation of viewpoints the issue will be taken up in extemporaneous discussion.

And now, our chairman, Mr. Granik.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Mr. McCormick.

On Friday night last, after 4 weeks of almost continuous debate, the United States Senate approved the administration's neutrality bill by a vote of 63 to 30. Among its important features, the bill—

Directs the President to put the act in effect when he, or Congress, finds that a state of war exists and the President determines that operation of the law is necessary to preserve the peace and security of the United States;

Repeals the present embargo and permits arms sales to belligerents for cash. Forbids American ships to carry arms to any belligerent port in any part of the world;

Bars American vessels from transporting supplies or passengers to belligerent ports, with certain exceptions;

Empowers the President to establish danger zones around either belligerent or neutral ports, including the areas exempted in the shipping sections, in which American ships could not go;

Prohibits the purchase, sale, or exchange in this country of bonds, securities, or obligations of belligerents; forbids United States citizens to make loans or extend credit to any belligerent state, or its agency; forbids solicitation of funds for belligerents, except for medical aid, food, and clothing to relieve suffering;

Authorizes the President to restrict the use of American ports by belligerents' submarines or armed merchant vessels;

Forbids Americans to travel on belligerent ships, with minor exceptions;

Makes it unlawful for an American merchant vessel to be armed, except with small arms.

The measure has been dispatched to the House of Representatives which will consider it on Tuesday. The Democratic leadership in the House hopes for final Congressional action by the end of this week.

Speaker BANKHEAD announced that the leadership would move to send the bill to a joint Senate-House conference committee to compose the wide differences between the measure approved by the Senate and that which passed the House last summer. The chief difference is that the House bill provides for a modified embargo. It would prohibit the shipment to belligerents of arms and munitions, but not such "implements of war" as airplanes.

After a conference with Majority Leader RAYBURN, Speaker BANKHEAD expressed confidence that the House would reverse its vote of June 30.

"I am confident now," said the Speaker, "that we have a majority in the House to sustain the major features of the Senate bill."

But Representative FISH, of New York, leading the fight for retention of the embargo, contests these claims, stating that a floor fight of major proportions appears assured when the House machinery gets under way.

And as the Nation awaits House action, the American Forum of the Air is pleased to present four distinguished columnists in a round-table discussion on America's neutrality policy. They are Dorothy Thompson, Ernest K. Lindley, Jay Franklin, and Boake Carter. Each will have a few minutes for prepared remarks, to be followed by an informal extemporaneous panel discussion. And to lead the panel discussion we have invited Congressman T. V. SMITH of Illinois, noted lecturer and writer, to act as guest chairman.

And now to open our program—Miss Dorothy Thompson.

ADDRESS BY DOROTHY THOMPSON

It seems I am the first to serve in this set of doubles. This neutrality debate has changed a lot of alinements. There's Mr. Boake Carter and Mr. Lindley, with whom I've often agreed, on the other side; and here's Mr. Jay Franklin, with whom I almost never agree, on the same side with me.

Now, for the Neutrality Act itself.

I think it is unfortunate from every point of view that the Neutrality Act had to come up for reconsideration after the conflict in Europe had started. For that, we certainly cannot blame the administration. The President and the State Department were extremely anxious to have the issue settled before the last Congress adjourned. You remember that the Congress, which was hot and tired from a long session, laid the measure aside, and certain Senators, among them Senator BORAH, ventured the opinion that there was nothing pressing about the matter, because no war was likely to break out during the summer or fall. That, by the way, was the opinion of numerous people, including most of the international bankers, who are usually thought to be extremely well informed, and whenever there is going to be a war to be in on the plot.

At any rate, the war did start, and the Congress has had to conduct its debate in the midst of strain, a great amount of natural popular anxiety, and under terrific pressure from organized groups, most of whom, if I can judge from my own mail and the petitions that have come into my office in shoals, were against lifting the embargo. I think it is a great testimonial to the cool-headedness, wisdom, and common sense of the United States Senate, that in spite of all the hullaballoo, and in spite of the charges wildly made from many sides that to lift the embargo was tantamount to a declaration of war, and that the next step would be that our boys would be slain on the fields of France, in spite of all this, the Senate has taken the administration's view of the matter and adopted the administration's measures, and lifted the embargo on arms. I have every confidence that the House will do the same thing.

Most of us who have been publicly opposing the Neutrality Act began to do so long ago, and on the ground that it was not a neutrality act at all, but a questionable piece of legislation that greatly limited neutral rights in time of war, set dangerous precedents for neutrals, and encouraged false expectations on the part of would-be aggressors. We argued that in time of war, it would militate against our best customers and rig things in favor of large land powers with high industrial capacity, and with most of their resources on their own soil, or transportable by land, against all small nations, and against nations that had to get most of their supplies by sea, and also against nations with limited industrial capacity. It was also an act bound to encourage programs of autocracy, or economic self-sufficiency, instead of stimulating and encouraging world commercial intercourse.

One has only got to think of the situation that would exist if every nation, and particularly every nation with large resources and industrial capacity, should pass the same kind of Neutrality Act and clamp an automatic embargo on arms the moment two nations were at war. Not a single small nation on earth could continue to keep its independence. Every one of them would be at the complete mercy of any aggressor.

My own stand on the Neutrality Act was taken nearly 3 years ago, a long time before this war began. I remember that I said then that if the act were on the books when a major war broke out, it would almost certainly be changed, and that the very act of changing it would be interpreted in some quarters as an unneutral gesture.

Actually, if the House backs up the vote of the Senate, we will be in a much firmer neutral position than we were at the outbreak of the war, and, incidentally, we shall be more in line with most of the other neutrals—Russia excepted—and that also seems to me a step in the right direction. This is certainly the opinion of most of the people in this country who, from a long study of foreign relations and international law, have the right to be considered as having a somewhat expert opinion. Personally, I am not unqualifiedly enthusiastic about the administration's bill, either. Under the Constitution, the conduct of foreign affairs is in the hands of the administration and the Senate, except for actual declaration of war. I dislike seeing this country tie its hands with legislation in a crisis which is quite unpredictable. I would rather have seen the Neutrality Act repealed, and a national defense council of both major parties appointed to consult with the President continually. I should like this country to have greater freedom of action—I also dislike seeing us retreat from our historic standpoint on the freedom of the seas. But the administration's bill seems to me infinitely preferable to the present legislation.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Miss Thompson. And now, Mr. Ernest K. Lindley.

ADDRESS BY ERNEST K. LINDLEY

The really fundamental question in this discussion is, Where does our national interest lie in this European war? To answer this we must put aside emotions, sweeping generalizations, and slogans, and try to make a cool appraisal.

Does our national interest require the restoration of Poland and, if you like, Czechoslovakia as independent states? The answer, I think, is "No." I am not in the least sure that the restoration of these states is required even by the national interests of Great Britain and France. Neither of them existed during Great Britain's century of supremacy following the Napoleonic wars.

Does our national interest require the destruction of Germany as a great state? The answer, I think, is "No." Here again I am not at all sure that the destruction of Germany as a great state would be to the advantage even of Great Britain and France. For the destruction of Germany would remove the main barrier to the westward expansion of Russia.

Does our national interest require the destruction of the Nazi regime? We can all agree that we don't like Hitler and that we are profoundly opposed to everything for which nazi-ism stands. But it does not follow that our interests require the destruction of nazi-ism in Germany or in Central Europe any more than it requires the destruction of the Communist regime in the great expanses of the Soviet Union.

Does our national interest require the preservation of the British Commonwealth, the British Empire, and British naval power? Here we get onto more debatable ground. My answer to the question is "No." We stand as a great power, probably the greatest power. Nearly every material thing we need for our well-being can be found within our borders or within those of our neighbors in the Western Hemisphere. From a military viewpoint we are impregnable or can be made so.

If we go about it intelligently and energetically we can build a fine civilization in this hemisphere, regardless of what happens in the remainder of the world.

Now, change the question slightly and ask: "Is it to our advantage to have British naval power and the British Commonwealth preserved?" The answer, I think, should be "Yes." It is preferable, but not necessary. Great Britain is a "satisfied" power harboring no ambitions inimical to our well-being. Its institutions and traditions are similar to ours. The downfall of British power would almost certainly bring the downfall also of the other highly civilized democratic nations on the western fringe of Europe. The ultimate consequences are unpredictable, but we would enter upon a long period of rapid changes in Asia, Europe, and Africa.

The sound policy for us is to give the British and their Allies the "breaks," but not in such a way as to commit us to their cause. We must not allow our hands to be tied or our minds to be fixed. We must preserve complete freedom of action. Most of all we should avoid any step which might later compel us to give active military aid to the Allies.

Once in this generation we have intervened in a European war. The cost was tremendous. And we now witness the result. If our economic and military power is again necessary to preserve the British and French Empires, it would be cheaper and wiser to let them go under, and take our stand in the Western Hemisphere.

We should avoid deep emotional entanglements in this war. We should do what we can to avoid incidents which will inflame our emotions. We should avoid building an economic stake in the war, and especially in the victory of one side. We should build up our own defenses in the Western Hemisphere and keep cool.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Mr. Lindley. And now we present Jay Franklin.

ADDRESS BY JAY FRANKLIN

Fellow Americans, it seems to me that most of the people who talk about President Roosevelt's program to keep war away from the Americas and to keep Americans away from the war—by revising the so-called neutrality law—are either trying to play President or to play Providence—or perhaps just to play politics with a highly emotional and very serious issue.

I can't argue with those who are trying to play politics with neutrality. It is part of the fair price we pay for democracy to expose our major national decisions to the play of narrow partisanship, selfish interest, personal ambition, meanness, spite, and revenge.

As for those who are trying to play Providence, to administer divine punishment to Hitler or Stalin or Chamberlain or Mussolini or even on Fritz Kuhn or Earl Browder—all I can say is that there is no man wise enough to say what is actually going to happen in this or any other war and that no man and no nation is in a position to pass moral judgment—even in the name of the loftiest idealism—on other men and other nations.

But playing President is perhaps the most dangerous of all political pastimes in this neutrality crisis. It is dangerous because those who play President are not actually in charge of this country's foreign policy, do not have access to the flow of continuous, confidential, and expert information on what is really happening, and have no direct public responsibility for the result of their hasty or emotional decisions.

In this crisis President Roosevelt is clearly entitled to our trust. Under the Constitution, he is responsible for our foreign policy. He commands the confidence and loyalty of great masses of our people, particularly of the poor, the inarticulate, and dispossessed, whose political trustee he has become, and he was right in warning of the dangers of a European war last summer when the Senate and congressional groups, which blocked action on neutrality last July, guessed wrong. Since these are the same groups which are now opposing amendment of the neutrality law and are telling the country that they must not trust Roosevelt in this crisis, I wonder if they realize that they are arguing that we ought to trust their mistakes rather than his correct estimate of the world situation.

Now, I submit that it is not only not easy to construct a completely war-proof policy for America in this crisis. It is impossible. For it takes only one side to make a war, even if it takes two to make a peace. And I agree with some of the critics of the neutrality bill that it ought to be called a national policy bill—or a national security bill—for it is an attempt to find the best and safest national policy for this country in the face of disturbing and dangerous political and military events in Europe. Even so, the neutrality bill is only part of our national policy in the war crisis.

In the bill we try to make our economic resources, including munitions, available to France and England, in order that they may make headway against Hitler. If these two great empires can't win or draw under these circumstances, it is certain that our active intervention could not save them in this war of blockades, machines, and pressures. So another A. E. F. seems to be definitely out. At the same time, we try to balance the books by a cash-and-carry program which is not in the interest of France and England and so far as it helps anyone, helps Hitler. We do this to avoid the risk of being accidentally drawn into the war by risking our ships, our goods, and our citizens in the combat zones. Then, entirely outside the bill, we are keeping our Navy in the Pacific and are having frank diplomatic talks in Tokyo, with a view to preventing the spread of war in the Far East. And finally through the declaration of Panama, we are trying to build up a pan-American bloc which will make the Western Hemisphere the world's official peace zone in this conflict.

Taken all together, these separate parts of the President's program add up to a total which seems to me, at any rate, the most prudent possible course we could take with any responsible view to our interests and safety.

There seems to be no completely safe and perfect course to follow. If we were really isolated—a hermit crab nation—we might stay clear. But we are not isolated. We have important interests—commercial, cultural, social and political—in Europe, Asia, and Latin America. But because we are no hermit crab, it does not follow that we should be a Peter the Hermit, preaching a crusade against the distant infidels and sending our men and our money on great emotional adventures. What we must do is to consider all things, the future as well as the present, the past as well as the future, and try to follow the course which will be best for us and our chi'dren in the long run.

That is my understanding of what President Roosevelt is trying to do. Certainly it is what he ought to do, and I think that the record of last summer—when he was right and the BORAHS and HIRAM JOHNSONS and HAM FISHES were wrong—entitles him to the benefit of the doubt and the trust of his fellow citizens in his leadership. Since he was right last summer and the isolationists were wrong, why should we trust them any further for leadership? We can respect, like, and even admire the isolationists but that does not mean that we can trust them to be wise in October when they were foolish in July.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Mr. Franklin. And concluding the first part of the program—Boake Carter.

ADDRESS BY BOAKE CARTER

I assume it is the desire of all of us to help keep America out of foreign wars. No one pretends we can produce, as a Nation, a 100-percent guaranty of neutrality. But it seems to me the best way to keep out is to remove as many causes as possible which involved us in past wars. It should be domestic legislation—American legislation designed to help primarily the United States. There is no proper place in such legislation for dangerous attempts or ideologies to insure peace throughout the world, to punish far-distant aggressors, or to equalize existing inequalities among nations. Unequal application of neutrality laws is plainly and simply intervention, or still further it is applications of sanctions—a method discarded even by the nations of Europe as useless and leading to war. My own view is the same as President Roosevelt's expressed in August 1936—peace, like charity, begins at home. We are not isolationists, except insofar as we seek to isolate ourselves completely from wars." I further believe that cash and carry should not be exchanged for the munitions embargo, but that cash and carry should be added to the embargo; that the loophole to prevent transshipment of munitions through neutral countries to belligerents should be plugged; that American citizens who enlist for service in foreign armies should have the right to do so as individuals; but, by law, be deprived of their American citizenship on the grounds that they are embarrassing the neutrality efforts of their Government; that United States ships be barred from war zones; that the Pacific be kept open for trade for our ships; that Congress encourage American ship operators to go after trade abandoned by belligerents in neutral countries by increasing their subsidies in the amount it costs American operators to compete with lower-paid and lower-cost neutral-flag ships; that our old merchant ships, owned by the Government be sold to South American nations, encourage them to build fleets to trade with the United States, and again make up the difference in operating costs to the United States shippers in increased subsidies, enough to provide profit incentive to continue operating; discretionary restriction of armed merchant ships to our ports. I still further believe that the United States should try to redouble its trade with all neutral nations, which should more than compensate for trade lost with belligerents; that the allied governments of France and British can quickly overcome Germany, if the United States Government makes it clear that they must do that job themselves and by themselves, without counting on United States support in money or men; that the popular story that if we "don't go over there to help now, the Allies will be defeated and it'll be our turn next," is so much bosh and propaganda, which, in my opinion, does not square with facts already on the record—to give Miss Dorothy Thompson's column a plug, but which gives my column a plug—thereby providing two plugs, which means taking a neutral position; instead, I believe that if we are to proceed on the principle of emotion, instead of facts, which appears to be the premise on which we are now traveling as a nation—the best help it can give toward saving democracy is to first make democracy safe for the world before attempting to make the rest of the world safe for democracy and abandoning it completely in order to enter this supposed war of ideology and holiness.

A Democrat who starts off to join somebody else's fight with a $45,000,000,000 national debt hanging round his neck, would indicate he will have to put his own people through the misery of inflation in order to pay for his Sir Galahad adventure, before he's through. And when I find Great Britain excusing Russia's entry into Poland first on the ground that since Germany started this habit of hi-jacking, Russia's grab was all piety and purity and on the second ground that the hi-jacking is quite proper and respectable because a British statesman had suggested the new Russian frontier 20 years ago at Versailles, then I humbly suggest we either be honest enough to declare openly we are not for redistribution of wealth outside in the world, though we say we are at home, and go to war on that basis, or cease talking about this being another crusade for us to preserve some ideology with a fancy name to it, and content ourselves with trying to solve our own domestic problems at home and confine our foreign playgrounds to this hemisphere—which at least is legitimate, I submit, reasonably intelligent and more likely to preserve free thought, free press, free religion than trying to play judge, jury, and executioner all over the map.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Mr. Carter. This is the American Forum of the Air. You have been listening to remarks by four of the Nation's distinguished columnists on America's Neutrality Policy—Miss Dorothy Thompson, Ernest K. Lindley, Jay Franklin, and Boake Carter. This concludes part I of tonight's presentation.

Announcer MCCORMICK. Immediately following station identification, we will continue with the extemporaneous discussion.

This is the Mutual Broadcasting System.

This is the American Forum of the Air, originating in the broadcasting studios of the New Department of the Interior Building in Washington, D. C., and presented over the Mutual network by WOL in cooperation with WOR.

We return you to the chairman of the program, Mr. Granik:

Chairman GRANIK. And now, as part II of our forum presentation, Miss Dorothy Thompson, Ernest K. Lindley, Jay Franklin, and Boake Carter return for an informal extemporaneous panel discussion. We have invited Congressman T. V. SMITH, of Illinois, noted lecturer and writer, to act as guest chairman. Congressman SMITH.

Congressman SMITH. Mr. Granik, fellow pugilists, my fellow countrymen, I am only an ignorant man and a Congressman, myself, but I welcome the chance to sit in on the wisdom of these "spinal" columnists of the American intelligentsia upon a question that is very pressing upon us politicians today. We have tonight a graceful, almost a Sabbath intermission between congressional talk and congressional talk. As I have been, myself, listening in person and by radio to some of the talk on the irresponsible fringe that has gone on before tonight, I may say, catching something of Mr. Boake Carter's closing mood, which I thought was a little facetious for so grand a subject, I must say that I sometimes think—

> I would rather crow and be a rooster
> Than to roost and be a crow,
> But I don't know.
> A rooster, he can roost also—as this unknown poet goes on—

> Which don't seem fair when crows can't crow,
> Which may help some; still I don't know.
>
> Crows should be glad of one thing, though,
> Nobody thinks of eating crow;
> While roosters, they are good enough
> For anyone unless they're tough.
>
> There are lots of tough old roosters, though,
> And anyway, a crow can't crow,
> So maybe roosters stand more show,
> It looks that way, but I don't know.

I think this facetious poem by some unknown poet expresses the attitude of more American citizens tonight than is expressed by any dogmatism about a subject that is a matter of life, and may well become a matter of death, to a great many American citizens.

Before turning back, I am giving these pugilists a moment for a breathing spell, as all fighters are entitled to. I may ask each one of them to take an assessment of himself in the light of a story that Mr. Charles A. Beard, who has been having his say on this neutrality matter, told me a week ago. It is the story of an ancient swordsman whose pride was in his sword and an ancient armor maker whose pride was in the strength of his armor. The swordsman said, "There isn't any armor under heaven I can't cut through with one blow of my sword." The armor maker said,

"I can make armor you can't cut through, and as evidence of my confidence in myself and my skill I will put myself inside my armor and let you whack at me."

Upon the appointed day he did, and the swordsman, spitting upon his hand, came down with a resounding whack. The armor maker said, "Hah! You didn't touch me."

And the swordsman said, "Shake yourself." He shook himself and fell in two.

I wonder if we are all intact here now.

Mr. CARTER. Congressman, may I break in?

Congressman SMITH. Certainly, sir; Mr. Carter, shake yourself.

Mr. CARTER. What I wanted to say is that you put me on the spot, shall I say?

Congressman SMITH. By imitating you.

Mr. CARTER. Oh, come; imitation is the sincerest form of flattery. Thank you. But you said I was facetious in the closing remarks I made, so I look back at them and I find that I said merely that the substance of my remarks were these, that we try and preserve some ideology that we have here and try to make the United States safe for democracy before trying to make democracy safe for the world, and I don't see why that necessarily should be called facetious, because may I say also that Professor Beard is a very good friend of mine, whom I revere extremely, and furthermore, I also went through the World War, part of it, as a flier, and I know exactly what war is, and I have felt all along as an ex-Englishman who became an American citizen, who went through that war, and having two children of my own, putting it purely on that partially emotional basis, that if this conflict abroad is for the preservation of democracy, as we are told so often, therefore it seems to me or to my opinion or my view, then, at any rate, that the best thing that the United States can do is to preserve this democracy that we have in this country, try and establish it as strong as we can on this hemisphere, so that after the people have finished destroying themselves in Europe, if that is what they are going to do, the people are going to be disillusioned, the people are going to be distressed and distraught and downtrodden and weary; they are going to want to know where to turn, and if we join that conflict and we lose by joining that conflict our own democracy as democracies so often do and put on a cloak of authoritarianism, surely we shall not be providing, shall I say, the light like a lighthouse for these people to cling to after they have got absolutely no illusions left whatsoever. Surely it is our duty, is it not, to preserve this democracy here so that these people can turn to somewhere and get an example after they finish fighting.

Congressman SMITH. Thank you, Mr. Carter. Miss Thompson, do you want to rise to a matter of personal privilege?

Miss THOMPSON. No; not personal privilege. Mr. Lindley and Mr. Carter both seem to me to be arguing that war is a bad thing. Now, I don't think there is any difference of opinion at this table on war being a bad thing. I am not enthusiastic about war. I am not enthusiastic about this war or any other war. Mr. Carter seems to go on the assumption, also, that the Allies are going to win. I notice that happens all the time: We don't need to help save democracy for the world because the Allies are going to win the war. Maybe they are; maybe they are not. We don't know yet. I would like to ask Mr. Carter whether he really thinks, honestly, that given the case—let's play with the idea—let's consider the possibility that Germany wins this war thumbs down, wins it and takes over the whole of western civilization on the European continent, takes over France the way she did Czechoslovakia (and believe me she would), and makes a totalitarian Europe; I want to ask him whether he really thinks we would keep democracy on this soil and what he thinks we would do with the Nazis in this country.

Suppose the Communists and the Nazis go together, as I think they are going to—maybe I am wrong, but I think they are going to go together—just suppose they set out dividing the world between them; I don't say they will; I say that what stands between their doing it is France and Great Britain. Suppose they do, I want to ask him whether he thinks we will have an awfully easy time preserving peace and democracy in the Western Hemisphere, preserving it, for instance, in South America where, dearly as I love and hope for peace in South America, I have never known it yet to be (let's tell the truth) an exact citadel of democracy and freedom. Not quite.

I think this is a very serious war indeed, and I think it is much more serious than a matter of whether Poland is going to be restored. In fact, I don't quite see how they are going to restore Poland since Russia has come into Europe and changed the whole complexion of things there. And I certainly don't think it is a question of the destruction of Germany. Certainly, I don't know any Englishman who wants to see anything except a strong Germany, and if Russia is coming into Europe, certainly they will have to have a strong Germany, but I think there are much more fundamental issues. I think this war is part of a world revolution which is going to decide how the human race is going to live on this planet before this war is over.

I think we are going to get ourselves into a very difficult position for our own democracy if we begin thinking that neutrality requires impartiality. We are getting to be very mealy-mouthed in this country, I must say. Three months ago we had a very clear opinion about totalitarianism. We thought it was a menace. We said so. We had even broken off diplomatic relations with Germany because of it, and all of a sudden we begin to be a little bit tender, and those of us who had exactly the same opinion which they had 3 months ago are considered a little bit dangerous and in fact called emotional. And I would like to say apropos of emotionalism, Mr. Lindley, that emotionalism is the way your opponent presents his facts.

Mr. CARTER. Dorothy—I am going to call you Dorothy because I read your column every day in order to get mad at myself—may I say this: You have asked about 10,000 questions and I am going to take the first one first, about Hitler and winning the war. Let us assume that he does. I don't assume that he will, on these grounds, that when the Allies won the World War, they, combined, were unable to keep one nation down for more than 20 years.

Miss THOMPSON. We were with them.

Mr. CARTER. Quite, but nevertheless that adds to the number who were unable to keep down the one nation. Now then, supposing, therefore, that one nation, we will say, gains the upper hand, I don't concede for one moment that one nation can keep down a great number of countries when those numbers of countries were unable to keep down that one nation.

Miss THOMPSON. Those nations, Mr. Carter—you are dealing with a quite different thing now. After all, the Treaty of Versailles was a great humane, liberal document compared with what has been done to Czechoslovakia and Poland. The Allies never made the attempt to keep down Germany in the sense that the totalitarian powers think of keeping it down. Never! They never went in and organized a permanent espionage system, for instance.

Mr. CARTER. No; that is true, but may I say that the English have all sorts of ways of skinning a cat, and they can do it in a very gentlemanly way, and we have done it—I use "we" because I used to be an Englishman, and because I once in a while lapse back into being one, but I escaped all that and came over here looking, God knows, into the future with hope. But they have various ways of skinning the cat, and they have various ways of covering their sins—and I accuse them of sin—by using such slogans as "bearing the white man's burden" and "saving the world for democracy."

Miss THOMPSON. That is a German slogan now.

Mr. CARTER. It is also a British slogan. That being the case, I cannot see that there is any difference in the kind of oppression that is being applied by force of arms to Czechoslovakia and to Austria and to Poland and the pressures applied by the power of economics and the power of finance to a country that has been defeated in war.

May I make this clear and very definite at this particular moment, having been accused of being Fascist, and goodness knows what else, because I have tried to present the other side of the story, that I haven't the slightest desire at the present moment or any time whatsoever to see Germany win any war whatsoever, insofar as the Allies are concerned; but we are not discussing Europe; we are discussing, to my view, not who is going to win the war in Europe, but what are the best possible chances of the United States keeping out of that war. That seems to me to be the issue we are discussing tonight, and I think we are liable to get off the track if we are going to try to find out who is going to win the war in Europe.

Congressman SMITH. Mr. Lindley, are you willing to comment on that?

Mr. LINDLEY. I would be delighted to get in a word. Let me say, in reply to Miss Thompson, that I did go on the assumption that the Allies might lose the war. I remember asking the question whether or not British naval power and the preservation of the British Commonwealth are necessary to us, and I answered that question in the negative. I think it is a wise policy always to proceed on the theory that the worst may happen.

Now, Miss Thompson believes that this movement of Germany and of Russia is a sort of fused world revolution. She may prove to be right; but, so far as events have demonstrated, the behavior of both nations is completely in accord with the well-established rules of power politics as recognized over a long period in Europe; and the Russians, far from being in close collaboration with the Germans so far, seem to me to have been taking advantage of the situation in which Germany takes the risk and Russia gets the benefits.

I should certainly not be foolhardy enough to predict what may come out of that, but so far as events so far have occurred, there has been no fusion.

While I am on that theme, may I refer to one thing that Jay Franklin said that has been said in Washington so many times that I have become very weary of it: That is, that the Executive and our experts in the executive branch of the Government, having access to continuous confidential information, are in a far better position to decide what American policy should be than a great many other people. I am sure Jay Franklin has had the same experience that I have had with the people who have this continuous supposedly confidential information. You go into the State Department and consult with one expert and he tells you all they have on that is what they are getting through the press dispatches. A week later he gets a little bit of confidential information. You get his opinion of what the Russian policy may be, say, in southeastern Europe. You go down the hall a few feet and talk to another expert and he has a completely different theory on what has happened, and I am sure, from a personal experience, that that has happened with respect to every important move in Europe over a period of several years. The experts with their access to the information are in continual disagreement, just as we here are in continual disagreement.

Congressman SMITH. Mr. Franklin, I think that makes it your turn.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I would like to comment on that because I have worked for the State Department. I have been one of those experts, and journalistically speaking, that is generally right but administratively speaking it is quite wrong, because it is the synthesis of information, the combination of factors, which is a function not performed in many editorial offices, certainly in very few Washington press bureaus, and is possibly confined to the State Department and some of the congressional committees, an attempt to get the whole picture and see how the parts fit together, and, of course, the President has other sources of information besides the State Department. Among other things, he has direct access to the ambassadors of foreign countries who can come in and inform him directly and confidentially of certain aspects of their national policy which bear on American interests.

Coming back to the main track, however——

Congressman SMITH (interposing). What is the main track, Franklin?

Mr. FRANKLIN. The main track seems to be Miss Thompson thinks that we have a relation to the rest of the world which is endangered by the war in Europe, particularly by Hitler and the combination of the Nazis and the Communists. I agree with that. I think Mr. Carter is inclined to be a little cavalier about making the world safe for democracy, etc., making democracy safe for the world. I think our job is to try to make the world safe for America in any way we can. Now, that is the point I understood we were discussing, not whether and how we are going to keep out of the war. We assume if we pursue a prudent course we can keep out of it, if the war develops along certain lines. I personally think that if——

Mr. CARTER (interposing). But, if I may interrupt, who is threatening America so we have to make the world safe for America?

Mr. FRANKLIN. The world is what we have been living in. What we have been living in is changing. We don't know whether those changes will be compatible with our interest and our safety. You don't know. Certainly you don't know.

Mr. CARTER. I don't know any more than you do.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I don't pretend to know.

Congressman SMITH. Some may know. Some of the columnists may know.

Miss THOMPSON. Mr. Carter always stimulates me. I am not nearly so interested in this war as I am interested in finding some way to get world peace. I don't believe we or anybody else can go on living indefinitely as we have lived for 20 years in a world which is given over to war, revolution, and anarchy.

Mr. CARTER. Dorothy, we have done that for 2,000 years.

Miss THOMPSON. No, we haven't done it for 2,000 years. We didn't do it from the year 1812 to the year 1914.

Mr. CARTER. Oh, may I differ!

Miss THOMPSON. There hasn't been for 20 years a single stable money in the world, there hasn't been a single bit of freedom of movement for anybody in this world, and this war is a result of our failure in 1918 to make a peace. Now, I am going to rise up and say a very unpopular thing, and that is, when people say, once in this generation, as you said, Mr. Lindley, we intervened and it cost us a lot, and now look at the result, that makes me sick. That is self-righteousness. We intervened and then got out. We had a responsibility for sticking through and seeing that something decent came out of that sacrifice of life, and instead we rushed home and got behind our borders and said, "We are isolated and it is none of our business and we will have nothing to do with those dreadful Europeans."

Mr. CARTER. With that I totally agree.

Miss THOMPSON. All right, here we are 21 years later with another war. I hate to think what kind of a world we will have to live in if that continues. I don't believe we can have little scraps of democracy and little scraps of civil liberties and little scraps of countries. I agree with the Pope who made a very, very great speech, a very great encyclical, when he said there has got to be a limitation to national sovereignty; nations have not got the right to commit crimes just because they are sovereign nations.

It is my answer to Mr. Lindley. Can we live in the same world with nazi-ism? My answer is if there is enough of it, we can't. We can live with a little.

Mr. CARTER. Dorothy, you are going on at a great rate. Let us get a word in. May I ask this question: Do you think the British Empire was established by the aid of love and kisses?

Miss THOMPSON. I certainly don't. But look here, Mr. Hitler said when he was defending himself, "When the British Empire was young it was cruel and avaricious, now it is old and virtuous." The answer is, I prefer the old and virtuous to the young and avaricious, and I think the world ought to learn something from imperialism. After all, we ought to be able to learn something.

Mr. CARTER. Then I agree with you a hundred percent on this ground. You at least, may I say, are one of the few people who write who are consistent, because you are consistent in that you do not agree with Mr. Roosevelt's principle of redistribution of wealth within the United States. Neither do you agree with it outside the United States.

Miss THOMPSON. No; that is not true. Yes; it is true. Wait a minute. I don't believe what you think I believe. I do not believe you can redistribute the wealth of the world, and I think that is the issue in this war. The Germans say you can. I do believe that you can organize the wealth of this world so that everybody can use it, and if we don't do that we are going to have war indefinitely.

Mr. CARTER. Therefore, "I have the whole swag. I am going to keep it."

Miss THOMPSON. I don't think that is true. I don't think that is the dominant British opinion.

Mr. CARTER. Dorothy, you weren't a Britisher. I was.

Miss THOMPSON. I read the British newspapers.

Congressman SMITH. Mr. Franklin, I think you had better bring us back to fundamentals.

Mr. CARTER. I need some help.

Mr. FRANKLIN. At this point it might be interesting to turn the direction of the debate slightly into what is going to happen about the neutrality bill, which, after all, is not yet passed. You are a Congressman. How about the official moderator stepping down and saying what he thinks is going to happen to this neutrality measure, highly imperfect as it seems to be, in the House of Representatives?

Congressman SMITH. Rather than make prediction, I think when in the presence of columnar omniscience we ought to avail ourselves of the full time there. What do you think we could do in the House to improve the bill? Let's put a remedial question here.

Mr. FRANKLIN. The single greatest improvement would be to repeal the whole measure in toto.

Miss THOMPSON. Hurray!

Congressman SMITH. And go back to what, international law?

Mr. FRANKLIN. Go back to the essence of international law and get away from the idea that you can pass a law about a world crisis or that you can swallow a little legislative pill which will work while the public goes to sleep.

Congressman SMITH. Mr. Lindley, what do you advise us to do about it in the House?

Mr. LINDLEY. I think the neutrality bill ought to be strengthened in several respects. The present bill seems to me to serve, as well probably as any piece of legislation can, one of the purposes of the whole series of neutrality acts that we have had in recent years: To avoid the incidents which led to, or at least were the occasion for, our entry into the World War in 1917, the incidents arising from interference with our maritime commerce with Europe and with the travel of American citizens to Europe, on belligerent ships, and secondarily on our own ships.

Another purpose of the Neutrality Act as originally conceived seems to me to have been lost sight of, and that is to avoid the growth of an economic stake in this war, and also to prevent our economy from being thoroughly distorted by this war. Whether the arms embargo is retained or not does not seem to me to be so important as whether we limit our exports to Europe. Whether the arms embargo is repealed or retained, we will continue to be a source of supplies for this war, at least for the British and French. To avoid building up a temporary war boom which might eventually have to be kept going with credits, if the war should develop into a full-fledged war and should be kept going over a long period, and a boom which would give us a headache when the war ends; I think we should limit by quotas our exports to belligerents to the normal peacetime amounts, at least in the major categories of our exports.

Congressman SMITH. That is not for the sake of keeping us out of danger abroad but keeping us out of danger at home.

Mr. LINDLEY. Yes.

Miss THOMPSON. I agree with Mr. Lindley, for once, that we ought to be careful about overexpansion in this war, but one of the things which we learned in the last war is very present in the minds of most businessmen, and that is, nobody ain't going to have no economic stake in this war. Nobody believes today, certainly not Great Britain or France, that this war is going to help the capitalistic system. They firmly believe it is going to be the beginning of socialism all over Europe in one form or another, so there is not going to be nearly the impulse on the part of businessmen to get an economic stake in this war because I think they are going to be very skeptical as to just how sound that economic investment will be. I think they are going to be much more skeptical than they were in the last war.

Congressman SMITH. Mr. Carter, do you want to add your word of comment to Congress itself on the bill in the House?

Mr. CARTER. I think Mr. Lindley has covered it very well. I would like you good gentlemen to try and see if you can do something toward plugging this continuous voyage and ultimate destination that has not been touched in the Senate yet. So far, shippers can go ahead and ship various kinds of products to a nation and transship them and there has been no question or discussion so far as that is concerned in the Senate, as far as I can see, and there has been little safeguard as far as I can see, again, toward the prevention of private trade with belligerent nations.

Congressman SMITH. You know, don't you, why it has not been plugged? Nobody knows how to do it. It is out of our province.

Mr. CARTER. There are all sorts of various ideas, Congressman, but I don't know that it has been discussed to a great extent in the Senate.

Congressman SMITH. Now, if this is our joint wisdom for the House, would you think it worth while commenting for a moment on advice to the American people to whom we are speaking tonight? Miss Thompson, what is the greatest illusion we as a people are subject to that you think we might correct?

Miss THOMPSON. I think the greatest illusion we are subject to is the illusion that we don't quite live on this planet. You know, it is a round world. For instance, I think it is an illusion that we are awfully near South America. That seems to be a general illusion. Nobody seems to realize Rio is farther from New York than Marseille is from New York, and I think it is an illusion that we can live off South American trade without very radically changing our economic order. After all, something like 50 percent of our total trade is with Great Britain and her dominions and France—nearly 50 percent of our total trade.

As for the restrictions on shipping, it is all very well now; I think the bill is all right as it stands, but suppose the war spreads—maybe it is going to contract, but suppose it spreads to the whole seven seas—are we going to take our merchant marine off the seas? Who is going to bring us rubber from the Dutch East Indies if the war spreads that far?

Congressman SMITH. Miss Thompson, do you think the agreement with Panama might help us to convert our traditional isolationism which you think is our great illusion, and the oscillation which is the result of it, into insulation through new-found cooperation here in the Western Hemisphere?

Miss THOMPSON. No; I don't.

Congress SMITH. You don't?

Miss THOMPSON. No; I am sorry, I don't. I am very enthusiastic about the Panama agreement because I think it is a very good example to the rest of the world; but, after all, there are in the whole of North and South America, the whole of them together, less than half of the people that there are in western Europe. We are not going to be able to preempt South America and 90,000,000 in an enormous continent, and the problem of the world is an economic problem, it is a problem of colonization, it is a problem of new markets, and they aren't going to let us have it in the long run.

Mr. CARTER. Why are they not going to let us have it?

Miss THOMPSON. Because they need it and we don't know what to do with it.

Mr. CARTER. The British know what to do with it.

Miss THOMPSON. Of course.

Mr. CARTER. Why can't we learn the same lesson?

Miss THOMPSON. Because we have a very different situation from Europe as far as South America is concerned. South America produces the things we do, with certain notable exceptions. What are we going to do with a lot of cotton from South America? What are we going to do with a lot of meat from South America?

Mr. CARTER. Well, we can ask the meat lobby from Texas.

Miss THOMPSON. We don't know what to do with cotton of our own. And the 90,000,000 people in South America—not the majority of them, quite—with a very low standard of living, are not going to buy our automobiles.

Congressman SMITH. Mr. Lindley, do you think it worth while to comment on this further?

Mr. LINDLEY. Miss Thompson starts, it seems to me, with the assumption that our welfare is necessarily bound up with the situation in Europe.

Miss THOMPSON. With the world.

Mr. LINDLEY. We all know we live on the world and we are part of the world, but it may be impracticable or impossible at the present time, as it has been in the past, to organize the whole world. We seceded from the British Empire and the European system some time back, and it has probably been the most consistent policy of this country from the days of the founders up until the turn of the century to make this side of the ocean our citadel. I resent the notion that we are so weak or that we are merely something on the fringe of civilization. I think we are the center of it, or can become the center of it.

Miss THOMPSON. Then we have to be willing to use our power if we are going to be the center of it.

Mr. LINDLEY. I want to use our power in the way that will be the most effective.

Congressman SMITH. Mr. Franklin, you ought to have a half minute here.

Mr. FRANKLIN. We are fundamentally a peace-loving people, and I think Senator NORRIS brought out very aptly that we have never gone to war yet unless the people of the country were enthusiastically in favor of it.

Congressman SMITH. If we can correct this folklore of fatalism that we have to get into it against our will, I should say we have done something tonight in the way of agreement—and strengthening of American morale.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you. You have been listening to the American Forum of the Air presenting a discussion on America's Neutrality Policy.

Our speakers were Miss Dorothy Thompson, Ernest K. Lindley, Jay Franklin, and Boake Carter.

Our guest chairman for the panel discussion was Congressman T. V. Smith, of Illinois.

And now for a final word from Mr. McCormick.

Announcer MCCORMICK. So we have concluded the fifth broadcast in this season's series of the American Forum of the Air programs, emanating from the broadcasting studios of the new Department of the Interior Building in Washington, D. C. The facilities of these radio studios have been extended by the Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, in the interest of free speech on assurance these educational broadcasts will present all sides of a national problem, temperately discussed by representatives of opposing schools of thought and conducted by nonpartisan, nonpolitical organizations.

The Mutual network will bring you this forum broadcast every Sunday evening from 8 to 9 p. m., E. S. T., throughout the session of Congress. Tickets to this broadcast may be had by sending your request to station WOR, New York, or WOL, Washington.

In the interest of education there are printed, free of charge, a limited number of copies of the entire proceedings of these broadcasts. Address your requests and comments to WOL. The American Forum of the Air is directed by Theodore Granik, who presided as chairman tonight, and comes to you as a presentation of WOR in cooperation with WOL.

This is Stephen McCormick speaking. This is the coast-to-coast network of the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Congress Should Stay in Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEWIS D. THILL
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, now that the arms embargo has been lifted, we must make doubly certain that America will remain at peace. Congress should stay in session as long as the crisis in Europe and a war emergency exists, with one purpose in mind—to keep America out of war. This will not cost the taxpayers one additional cent for salaries of Members of Congress, because the Representatives and Senators are paid a yearly salary on a monthly basis whether Congress is in session or not. The mileage fee given to Members of Congress is paid only once during a session for their trip to Washington and return. If Congress remains in session, it will eliminate certain reasons advanced for giving the President more power. It will be a comfort to those Americans who have lost faith in our President and those who feel that the President's international-minded spirit might get us into war. It will give Congress an opportunity to take up many matters, including agriculture and unemployment, which must be solved before we can have national prosperity.

Keeping Youth in Trim

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE BOSTON HERALD OF OCTOBER 8, 1939

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Boston Herald on Sunday, October 8:

[From the Boston Herald of October 8, 1939]

KEEPING YOUTH IN TRIM

Congress at its last session was unexpectedly generous with the N. Y. A., or National Youth Administration, enlarging the appropriation from $77,000,000 to $100,000,000. This has made possible the extension of the N. Y. A.'s work in Massachusetts, which John L. Donovan, the new State administrator, announced a few days ago. Heretofore the N. Y. A.'s work or apprentice-training program has been limited to young members of families supported by welfare or the W. P. A. Now young folks of any family in need will be eligible for help.

The N. Y. A.'s work is not generally well understood by the people. It is divided into two major programs—student aid and work training. Under the first, about 12,000 Massachusetts boys and girls are enabled to continue their education in high school or college. These are selected or certified by the school or college authorities, not the N. Y. A. High-school students so aided get about $5 a month—usually about enough to pay their carfares—and college students $19. All of them are required to do a certain number of hours of work, in addition to their usual school work, in return for their Government allowances.

The work program is open to unemployed young men and women between 18 and 24. It consists, in the main, of vocational training, with classes in carpentry, machine-shop work, automotive repair, plumbing, welding, etc., for boys, and classes in sewing, laundering, domestic service, etc., for girls. The pay is about $20 a month. Emphasis is laid not so much on the work accomplished as on encouraging the boy or girl to discover some trade which he or she has a knack for and can probably become proficient in.

Any inclination to make a career of N. Y. A. work is discouraged. Indeed, the higher the rate of turn-over of its workers, the happier the N. Y. A. is, for that means many of their young men and women are going into private employ. In September 14 percent of their 5,000 workers in Massachusetts obtained jobs.

The Government's paying boys and girls to go to school or to learn a trade seems ridiculous to many people. But the alternative to the practice, in most cases, is allowing them to remain completely idle, with consequent rusting of what vocational qualifications they possess and with great danger to their morale.

Unemployment among old people is often pitiful. Among young people it is perilous. The N. Y. A. seems to be performing a necessary work. Mr. Donovan and his associates do it intelligently and constructively.

The Motion-Picture Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LYLE H. BOREN
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, I urge the American people and our democratic Government in all its branches to focus its attention on the motion-picture industry, analyze its influence, examine its methods and tactics, and become acquainted with the full import of the growth and perpetuation of its un-American monopoly.

On several occasions I pointed out reasons why the Congress should give particular attention to pending legislation affecting the motion-picture industry. I might add that my colleagues would find it interesting to examine the record of the trial of Judge Manton. It struck me as particularly peculiar that while the borrowing of Judge Manton was given considerable publicity, the fact that Judge Manton borrowed from Harry Warner when Warner was in difficulty before this court was not publicized, though it is a matter of record.

Joe Schenck, Zanuck, Goetz, and other moguls of the motion-picture industry are now before the Federal grand jury.

Let me urge each of you to some investigation of the situation existing in the motion-picture field. America had its Teapot Dome scandal, but it was small compared to the story behind motion pictures.

Mr. Speaker, our attention should be directed to the utter failure of the motion-picture industry to live up to the production code of ethics, which was drawn up in 1934 to satisfy the justly aroused public opinion against the evils of motion-picture influences of that day. That code of ethics requires that the history, institutions, and citizenry of nations shall be represented fairly.

Where was Will Hayes when they produced Mr. Smith Goes to Washington? Where was Joseph J. Breen when they produced Honeymoon in Bali? Will Hayes, Pettyjohn, and Joe Breen are supposed to hold in the motion-picture industry the responsibility of carrying out the 1934 code of ethics. Religious leaders, P. T. A. leaders, and so forth, at one time banded together in a Legion of Decency, and it is undoubtedly time for the American people to join hands again to meet the responsibility which these administrators of the production code of ethics have failed to meet.

Mr. Speaker, I have pointed out here some of the things that are taking place in the movie industry in violation of law and ethics, and I would like to emphasize that these things are taking place at the same time these same people participate in a combine to force the raising of admission prices from 10 to 25 cents and more in the small theaters in the villages in your districts.

T. V. A. Agricultural Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

LETTER FROM EDWARD A. O'NEAL AND RADIO INTERVIEW WITH DR. HARCOURT A. MORGAN

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest and most beneficial phases of the T. V. A. program is that relating to agriculture. The T. V. A. has done a great job in the promotion of an agricultural program. This was recently called to the attention of the members of the American Farm Bureau Federation by a letter from the president of that organization, Mr. Edward A. O'Neal, transmitting a copy of a radio interview of Dr. Harcourt A. Morgan, Chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. O'Neal's letter and Dr. Morgan's interview are set forth as follows:

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Chicago, Ill., October 17, 1939.

To State Farm Bureau Presidents and Secretaries:

I am enclosing herewith a copy of a radio program in which Dr. H. A. Morgan, Chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority, explains something about the program that the T. V. A. is pushing.

The work of the T. V. A. is of vital interest to agriculture because of its fertilizer experiments, its practical power development, its work in controlling erosion, and in determining proper land use. I thought you might like to read the transcript of this short radio program so as to refresh your mind on what is being done there.

The report of Dr. Morgan indicates the continuing success of the project, and it promises much for the future of agriculture in the entire Nation. The fertilizer work that is being done is of great consequence to agriculture everywhere.

With best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

EDW. A. O'NEAL, President.

DR. HARCOURT A. MORGAN, CHAIRMAN, TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

INTERVIEWER. Dr. Morgan, in reading the act of Congress which created the Tennessee Valley Authority, I was greatly impressed with the broad scope of activities delegated to your Board, such as national defense, the development of navigation channels, the control of floods, the generation and sale of electric power, the production of new and better fertilizers, and a readjusted agriculture for water control. Isn't that a rather large order?

Dr. MORGAN. So itemized, it seems that way, but the physical effort—the building of dams, for instance—is work that can be done in an orderly manner by the engineers and other technicians. That is really the easiest part of the work—the big job comes in adding up all this so as to produce the greatest results in human betterment.

INTERVIEWER. It had not occurred to me to look at your work in just that light. I guess I had paid too much attention to your engineering works and not enough to human values. Of course, results in human betterment do count most.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes—that is what the President meant when, in asking Congress to set up the Tennessee Valley Authority, he spoke of its program as one which "touches and gives life to all forms of human concerns."

INTERVIEWER. Dr. Morgan, where do you start in tackling such a vast problem?

Dr. MORGAN. The start was made by the President and the Congress which set up the Tennessee Valley Authority in a bold effort to give greater flexibility to government. When Congress adopted the President's suggestion that the Authority be established in corporate form "clothed with the power of government, but possessed of the flexibility of a private enterprise," it sent into the field an agency whose job it was to face and coordinate all the problems of a region and to present an integrated program for their solution. In that lies our strength to translate physical works in terms of human betterment.

INTERVIEWER. Dr. Morgan, you just used the expression that Congress had sent the Tennessee Valley Authority "into the field." Do you mean by that a decentralization of Federal efforts?

Dr. MORGAN. Exactly. It has permitted us literally to go down to the crossroads in the area to discuss the people's problems with the people at their own firesides. Out of such conferences precise formulas adapting the Federal program to meet varying local situations can be discovered. The people are eager and willing to help themselves. They only need a little help here and there by the Federal Government to make real their program.

INTERVIEWER. Their program? Do you mean that the Authority's program is the people's program and that it is largely through their efforts that its benefits are being achieved?

Dr. MORGAN. Exactly.

INTERVIEWER. That sounds to me like democracy really in action.

Dr. MORGAN. You are correct. And that is why the help which Congress and the President set up for the Valley region in the T. V. A. Act has become a cooperative undertaking. It is a program that has won the confidence of citizens in the area, a confidence essential to success and which is now reflected in formal or informal cooperative agreements between the Tennessee Valley Authority and a host of local, State, and regional agencies, with colleges, farmers' associations, city councils, boards of health, and even sportsmen's clubs participating.

INTERVIEWER. It certainly means getting down to the grass roots. It suggests to me that perhaps you are developing a new frontier of public administration.

Dr. MORGAN. From the beginning we have shared our responsibilities with other agencies of the Federal Government whenever common interests were involved. There has been no jealous hoarding of authority. Today we have informal relationships with almost every governmental department in Washington and in approximately 100 cases those relationships are set down in written agreements or formal contracts. To many of the Government agencies our Board has formally delegated jurisdiction over projects particularly suited for their supervision.

INTERVIEWER. In other words, Dr. Morgan, you have helped to mobilize the technical experience of our Federal departments and to harmonize their varied activities toward a common objective?

Dr. MORGAN. Yes; a common objective—human betterment.

INTERVIEWER. And such an objective, Dr. Morgan, requires vast physical effort. Will you describe some of these activities and fit them into their proper place in your integrated program?

Dr. MORGAN. That is not difficult if we keep in mind that, basically, the program or the Tennessee Valley Authority is concerned with the control of water, and control of water in a humid region like the Tennessee Valley, with its average annual rainfall of 52 inches, may be subdivided into two major problems—the control of water in the publicly controlled river-channels and control of water on the privately owned land. The solution of those two problems brings in its wake a third, the proper utilization, in the public interest, of the vast amount of water power created thereby.

INTERVIEWER. Dr. Morgan, I think it would be helpful if you would first describe your plan to control the water in the river channels.

Dr. MORGAN. Certainly. Let us take water control in the rivers first. The property losses alone from uncontrolled water in the river channels amount to untold millions of dollars.

INTERVIEWER. Yes; I realize that. The great floods of recent years, with their tremendous destruction of human life and property, have brought the importance of river control home to many who never thought of it before. What is the Authority's plan for coping with the rivers, Dr. Morgan?

Dr. MORGAN. By high dams. Multipurpose dams high enough and so strategically placed that they can serve three purposes—navigation, flood control, and power. The plan for development of the Tennessee River from Paducah, Ky., to Knoxville, Tenn., proposes nine high dams. And to control the flow into the Tennessee we propose high storage dams across several of the principal tributaries. And this is very important because the slope at the eastern end of the valley is very steep. The operations of all these will be integrated to produce the greatest total public service.

INTERVIEWER. That sound like really putting a river to work.

Dr. MORGAN. It is exactly that. When completed this system of dams will transform the Tennessee River into a navigable waterway 650 miles long; it will reduce floods on the lower Mississippi River by 2½ to 3 feet; it has already reduced flood heights by as much as 5 feet on the Tennessee, and it will creat a large block of electric energy useful to the people of the region and to the Nation.

INTERVIEWER. But, Dr. Morgan, I am also curious about control of water on the land.

Dr. MORGAN. We call it controlling "the floods you do not see." In the past we have always thought of a flood as being a dangerously large volume of water out of control and trying to force its way down a narrow river channel. We never thought of the damage that water did before it collected in the river channel. Given the slope and other conditions, the damage can be appalling. Our 52 inches of rainfall annually, on just 1 acre of land, weigh about 6,000 tons. That is a lot of water. It falls on land that seldom freezes. It falls on land that invariably slopes. And as it falls it cuts deeply into the soil, the farmer's only capital. Erosion—the result of the floods you do not see—clogs the rivers and reservoirs with silt, strips the unprotected land of its fertile topsoil, turns the uplands into arid gullies. In the Tennessee Valley, this destructive process has seriously affected 10,000,000 acres, more than a third of the region.

INTERVIEWER. How does the Tennessee Valley program deal with this problem, Dr. Morgan?

Dr. MORGAN. The first step in any plan to control water on the land must be the restoration of the soil's fertility. Plant foods that have been taken from the soil by overcropping and erosion must be restored. It is here that our program combines the use of the wartime munitions plant at Muscle Shoals and the power from the high dams in the river channel to furnish plant foods in peacetime for soil-protecting cover crops.

INTERVIEWER. What kind of plant foods have you experimented with?

Dr. MORGAN. We have adapted a portion of the munitions plant at Muscle Shoals to the production of phosphatic plant foods. Our first product was a triple superphosphate containing about three times the amount of plant food carried by the phosphate fertilizer now in common use. This triple superphosphate, produced by electric furnaces, is being tested by agricultural agencies in more than 42 States of the Union. It is also being given practical tests on more than 25,000 farms, the farmers receiving the fertilizer through the various State agricultural extension services. With this work well under way, we then sought an even higher concentration, and succeeded in developing an entirely new form of fertilizer known as calcium metaphosphate. This contains approximately 65 to 70 percent plant food.

INTEVIEWER. Just how do such high concentrations aid the farmer, Dr. Morgan?

Dr. MORGAN. They make possible large savings in such costs as bagging, handling, and transportation. The processes we have developed are of national significance, for they can be applied to the vast phosphate deposits out in Idaho, Montana, Utah, and Wyoming and these resources made available to farmers all over the Nation at reasonable cost.

INTERVIEWER. I can see how such research can help the farmers to establish better land-management practices on a truly widespread scale. I am sure that this gives rise to many related activities. Will you tell us, briefly, something about them?

Dr. MORGAN. There are many others. The factors controlling the economy of any region are so interrelated that the development of one resource more or less affects all the others. Adjustments with the existing economic situation are necessary. For example, the Authority is actively engaged in malaria control along these new reservoir shore lines, it is concerned with reforestation and with the aquatic life in its reservoirs from the standpoint of inland fisheries resources. It is concerned with the coordinating of the Tennessee waterway with other forms of transportation so that the region may have an integrated transportation system. It is interested in maintaining a merit system of employment and good labor relations. Consequently the Tennessee Valley Authority conducts considerable research, frequently at the suggestion of local groups or agencies, on such subjects as highway planning, scenic resources, and recreation possibilities, industrial development of mineral resources, population studies, and many others.

INTERVIEWER. Dr. Morgan, I have been greatly impressed by the manner in which you are tackling the problems of an entire region in the interests of, as you have said, human betterment.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes. If we can assist this great area to achieve a better living and a more nearly balanced economy, not only the Tennessee Valley region, but the Nation, as well, will be benefited.

Resolution of Convention of United Rubber Workers of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

RESOLUTION BY THE UNITED RUBBER WORKERS OF AMERICA

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, seldom have I read a more forceful and effective statement of fundamental principles of American government and life than is contained in the following resolution passed by the United Rubber Workers of America at their convention in La Crosse, Wis., in September of this year.

I appreciate very deeply the fact that this resolution was sent me by Mr. Baque, the secretary of local No. 117 of the United Rubber Workers, which local is situated in my own district.

Whereas we fully recognize and defend the inalienable rights of the people, as set forth and guaranteed in the Bill of Rights, an integral part of the Constitution of the United States—the right of assembly—the right of religious freedom—the right of free speech—the right of freedom of press: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the delegates of the United Rubber Workers of America, in convention assembled, do strenuously object to and condemn all those who live in this country and who enjoy the benefits as hereinbefore stated and, particularly, those who hold public office and obtain their compensation from public funds paid to them for services rendered through the established units of our Government who, in their thought, in their words, and by their acts as citizens, guests, or public servants, betray their trusts to the people whose confidence they enjoy, by practicing or teaching, or publicly encouraging any system or form of government—Federal, State, or local—that, in any way would weaken or abridge the foundation principles of this Government, of and by and for the people—as guaranteed in the Bill of Rights and the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States; be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this convention and that copies of same be sent to the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States; John L. Lewis, president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations; Senator ROBERT LA FOLLETTE, Committee on Civil Liberties, and through the locals, to their own representatives in Congress and the Senate, and also to the press.

Centennial Anniversary of the Birth of Frances E. Willard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE H. SMITH
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

LETTERS AND STATEMENT

Mr. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter received from Arthur C. Jackson, of Maine, together with his statement and letters from chief executives of 22 States, all in recognition of the centennial anniversary of the birth of Frances E. Willard.

The matters referred to are as follows:

WASHINGTON, October 23, 1939.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN SMITH: World safety is now, or should be, the prayer of every rational human being. Day by day we are appalled by the increasing number of fatalities on our public highways, a startling proportion of which are directly attributable to the liquor traffic. Our State of Maine should lead the way to total abstinence from all intoxicating beverages. The recent celebration of the centennial of St. Frances of Evanston, suggests the inclusion of the enclosed matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a practical contribution to world safety.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR CHARLES JACKSON,
President, World Safety Council.

[The Frances Willard Centennial Total Abstinence Society, Arthur Charles Jackson, president, Portland, Maine, United States of America]

September 28, 1939, is the centennial anniversary of the birth of Frances E. Willard, one of the noblest women of all time, as well as one of the greatest of any age or nation.

The story of her faith in the conquest of evil by good should be a mighty inspiration alike to old and young, of this and succeeding generations.

The Master's message was at once her guaranty and her command. The Bible was to her, in very truth, divine.

What immeasurable and increasing influence that book has wielded over the minds of men and women and the destiny of the world!

If it be the word of God, as we profoundly believe, surely it comes to human ears and understanding with all the dignity and peace and power that His word should command. If it be the work of man, then even the doubter must admit that the ancient Hebrews had miraculous skill to cast a spell across millenniums which, strengthening with the years, spreads wider today than ever and embraces the future as far as even the eye of imagination can behold. Not all invention, or all statesmanship, or all of literature, have so touched and bettered human life as this one book. And it was the Bible that gave Frances Willard her mission, her strength, her hope, her argument, and her inspiration.

Thus prepared and thus equipped she went out into the world and to her work. No method can measure what she did. The half million of women whom she brought into organized cooperation in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is but a suggestion of the real results of her activities. Indeed, the highest benefits her life bestowed were as intangible as air and as full of life. She made purer the moral atmosphere of a continent—almost of a world. She rendered the life of a nation cleaner, the mind of a people saner. Millions of homes today are happier for her; millions of wives and mothers bless her; and countless children have grown into strong, upright, and beautiful maturity who, but for the work of Frances Willard might have been forever soiled and weakened.

To aid in appropriate, timely, world-wide enduring commemoration as well as perpetuation of this noble life and work, the Frances Willard Centennial Total Abstinence Society seeks your cooperation and membership as well as that of all men, women, and children who believe in God, sobriety, nobility of character, the beauty and sanctity of home, the true grandeur of nations, peace on earth and good will.

The presidents of all women's organizations, all clergymen, and all teachers, who will abstain from the use of intoxicating beverages, are hereby appointed vice presidents of the Frances Willard Centennial Total Abstinence Society, and each is urged to contribute for the world-wide work of the society a nominal annual membership fee of 10 cents, and to secure 10 or more others, men, women, or children, who will endeavor to promote the aims and purposes of the society and contribute the same small membership fee. Each group of 10 or more may and is urged to organize as a branch of the parent organization and report as regularly as convenient to the Frances Willard Centennial Total Abstinence Society, Portland, Maine.

Let us cherish the memory, the sweetness, and light of Frances Willard—St. Frances of Evanston—by imitating, insofar as we are able, her beautiful life and service.

We believe that every child of God of whatever age, race, or religion should have a right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, unmenaced and unpolluted by the frightful evils of the liquor traffic, a traffic regarded by millions of Christian men and women all 'round the world as one of, if not the deadliest, enemy of the human race.

STATE OF WYOMING,
August 30, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: I accept with pleasure honorary membership in the World Safety Council, in accordance with your letter of August 23.

Yours truly,

NELS H. SMITH, Governor.

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,
August 28, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: I accept with pleasure your invitation to become a member of the World Safety Council.

In these days of world unrest, it is indeed, reassuring to know that our leaders of thought in all parts of the world are devoting their time and talents in the interest of peace.

Cordially yours,

JOHN MOSES, Governor.

STATE OF NEVADA.

GENTLEMEN: Relative to your letter of August 22, I am pleased to accept honorary membership in the World Safety Council. Due to the heavy responsibility in my office, I am unable to take an active part in any organization, and I understand from your letter that this would not be required.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

E. P. CARVILLE, Governor.

STATE OF TENNESSEE,
October 5, 1939.

MY DEAR DR. JACKSON: I am highly honored to accept an honorary membership in the World Safety Council, and will be very happy to cooperate in any way I can in the furtherance of the aims of the council.

With many good wishes, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

PRENTICE COOPER, Governor.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
August 23, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: Governor Saltenstall expresses his thanks to you for receiving him into honorary membership in the World Safety Council. He is glad to accept and heartily supports every effort to promote world safety, peace, and good will.

Sincerely yours,

RUSSELL GAROULD,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor.

STATE OF MARYLAND,
August 24, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of August 22, addressed to Governor O'Conor.

The Governor has requested me to express his appreciation of your kindness in making him honorary member of the World Safety Council, which he accepts with pleasure.

It might be interesting to you to know that at the present time Governor O'Conor is instituting a safety movement here in Maryland. Again thanking you, and with kindest personal regards, I am,

A. J. BOURBON,
Acting Executive Secretary.

STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA,
August 31, 1939.

GENTLEMEN: Thank you for your recent letter extending to me an honorary membership in the World Safety Council.

I have just recently appointed a South Dakota Safety Council and we are doing everything we can to promote safety upon the highways of this State.

Sincerely yours,

HARLAN J. BUSHFIELD, Governor.

STATE OF MAINE,
AUGUSTA, February 8, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: Let me assure you, I very much appreciate the designation as one of the honorary officials of the International Longfellow Society. Thank you.

Very truly yours,

LEWIS O. BARROWS, Governor.

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
CONCORD, March 7, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: It is with pleasure that I received your notification of my election as an honorary president of your society. I am in complete accord with the society's wishes to secure the birthplace of our poet Longfellow and to preserve it as a memorial to him.

Yours sincerely,

FRANCIS P. MURPHY, Governor.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
Raleigh, February 9, 1939.

MY DEAR MR. JACKSON: I have your letter advising me that I have been elected honorary president of the International Longfellow Society, which honor I am pleased to accept. With best wishes, I am,

Yours very truly,

CLYDE R. HOEY, Governor.

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,
Bismarck, February 10, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: I thank you most sincerely for the honor you have conferred upon me by electing me an honorary president of the International Longfellow Society. I accept with pleasure.

Respectfully yours,

JOHN MOSES, Governor.

STATE OF OHIO,
Columbus, February 16, 1939.

MY DEAR PRESIDENT JACKSON: I appreciate the opportunity to give recognition to the beneficent activities of the International Longfellow Society. Any boy who read McGuffey's Readers in country school knows he is better for his knowing the work of your beloved poet Longfellow.

Cordially yours,

JOHN W. BRICKER, Governor.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA,
Oklahoma City, February 17, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: I wish to thank your society for the honor bestowed upon me by electing me honorary president.

With kindest wishes, I beg to remain,

Yours very truly,

LEON C. PHILLIPS, Governor.

STATE OF OREGON,
Salem, February 11, 1939.

MY DEAR MR. JACKSON: This will acknowledge your letter of February 6, in which you advise I have been elected an honorary president of the International Longfellow Society. I thank you very much for this honor.

I have long been an admirer of Longfellow and like to take down the volume of his poems which I inherited from my father's library and read from it.

Yours sincerely,

CHARLES A. SPRAGUE, Governor.

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
Harrisburg, February 13, 1939.

DEAR DR. JACKSON: I am happy to accept the honor of being an honorary president of your society. All the days of my life the poetry of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow has been an inspiration and a blessing to me.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR H. JAMES, Governor.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND,
Providence, February 9, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: Thank you very much for yours of the 6th, in which you advise me that the International Longfellow Society has elected me one of its honorary presidents.

I deeply appreciate this honor and want to thank you and the other members most sincerely.

With best wishes and again many thanks for your letter, I am

Very sincerely,

WILLIAM H. VANDERBILT,
Governor.

STATE OF ARIZONA,
Phoenix, February 11, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: This letter will serve to express my very deep apreciation upon my election as an honorary president of the International Longfellow Society.

With kindest personal regards and best wishes for the continued success of this worthy association designed to perpetuate the memory of a great American poet, believe me,

Very sincerely and cordially yours,

R. T. JONES, Governor.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, February 14, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: It is a real pleasure to me to accept the honor conferred by the International Longfellow Society, of which your letter of February 6 advises me.

It is gratifying to note that through your society the anniversary of the birth of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow will be celebrated so widely throughout our country, whose homes and whose literature have been enriched by the interpretations of this poet.

Gratefully yours,

CULBERT L. OLSON, Governor.

STATE OF DELAWARE,
Dover, February 8, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: I appreciate your letter notifying me of my appointment as honorary president of your society.

Since you are doing a very worth-while work in commemoration of this great American poet, I am pleased, indeed, to accept the honor you have accorded me.

Yours very truly,

RICHARD C. MCMULLEN, Governor.

TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, February 17, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: I have your favor in which you advise that I have been elected an honorary president of the International Longfellow Society.

Will you kindly convey to the society my appreciation of the honor thus conferred upon me.

Very truly yours,

J. B. POINDEXTER, Governor.

STATE OF INDIANA,
Indianapolis, February 8, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: This will acknowledge receipt of your recent letter stating that I have been elected an honorary president of the International Longfellow Society. I consider this an honor, indeed, and am glad to accept.

Very truly yours,

M. CLIFFORD TOWNSEND, Governor.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
Frankfort, February 8, 1939.

MY DEAR MR. JACKSON: My election as an honorary president of the International Longfellow Society is much appreciated.

I want to extend my warm good wishes to you and to all of those who are interested in perpetuating the name of the beloved Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

Faithfully yours,

ALBERT B. CHANDLER, Governor.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Baton Rouge, February 25, 1939.

DEAR MR. JACKSON: Many thanks for your letter notifying me of my election as an honorary president of the International Longfellow Society. I am pleased to join this movement to honor this great American and poet.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Yours very truly,

R. W. LECHE, Governor.

Agricultural Exports

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STEPHEN BOLLES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 2, 1939

LETTER FROM EDWARD E. KENNEDY

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I desire unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter from Edward E. Kennedy, of the Farmers' Washington Service, in reference to the farm problem. The letter follows:

The first 9 months of 1939 compared with the first 9 months of 1938 indicate a great increase in agricultural imports into the United States and a great decrease of agricultural exports from the United States. In the 9 months of 1939 we imported farm products for consumption in the amount of $794,700,000, while in the same period in 1938 we purchased farm products in the amount of $711,600,000. For the same periods our agricultural exports declined from $602,700,000 in 1938 to $418,400,000 in 1939.

While all in the United States are being diverted from consideration of serious problems of agriculture and unemployment by the present dramatic attempt to lift the embargo and increase the exports of arms, munitions, and implements of war, little is being said and nothing is being done to protect our farmers from imports at below our cost of production prices or to sell our excess food and fiber to the world.

To lift the embargo now, would we not be choosing between the munition makers and war mongers on the one hand and our Nation's 6,800,000 farmers on the other—choosing between "fools' gold" and fools' profits on the one hand and our own peace and security on the other—choosing between the national defense of a foreign state and the national defense of our own beloved country?

Is there even one valid, patriotic reason why we should lift the arms embargo now? Would it not be both patriotic and wise to retain the embargo on arms, munitions, and implements of war—settling this question decisively? Then, at once, turn our attention to assuring our farmers the cost of production, plus a profit—protect our home farm market from invasion by foreigners—build our prosperity upon our own basic industry—agriculture, give employment opportunities to our own labor at an adequate annual wage?

"Why quit our own to stand on foreign ground? Why by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?" Why quit our own?

Sincerely,

EDW. E. KENNEDY.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

RESOLUTION BY THE LONG BEACH DEMOCRATIC CLUB, CALIFORNIA

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution of the Long Beach Democratic Club of California, relative to the neutrality legislation:

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States a measure intended to repeal the embargo on munitions of war to belligerent nations and to enact in lieu thereof a cash-and-carry provision applicable to all belligerents; and

Whereas it is the constant aim and desire of all the American citizens to see conducted the affairs of this Nation so that we will not be drawn into the present European conflict; and

Whereas the cash-and-carry amendment to the present Neutrality Act strongly buttress and support that aim, and will aid in that position: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Long Beach Democratic Club, in regular meeting assembled, endorses the said proposed amendment of cash and carry to the Neutrality Act and urges all Members of the Congress to vote for said amendment or such other measure as may be presented and supported by the administration; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary be, and she is hereby, directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the California Senators, and to all Members of the California delegation in the House of Representatives.

MABEL C. AGEE,
Secretary.
FRANK H. JAQUES,
Chairman of the Board.

OCTOBER 9, 1939.

Why the Old Discredited Embargo Tariff Hurt the American Farmer and the New Hull Trade Agreements Help Him

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

TEXT OF LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF STATE, THE HONORABLE CORDELL HULL, TO THE HONORABLE ARTHUR CAPPER, UNITED STATES SENATE, NOVEMBER 1939

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, under permission granted me on November 3, 1939, page 1351, I wish to have inserted in the RECORD Secretary of State Hull's letter to Senator ARTHUR CAPPER relative to the proposed trade agreement dealing with agriculture. The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
November, 1939.

The Honorable ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: I have received your letter of October 17, 1939, in which you comment further upon the proposed trade agreement with Argentina. Elaborating the expressions of apprehension concerning the possible effects of this agreement upon agriculture which were contained in your previous letter, you discuss at some length certain of the agricultural items which were listed in our public announcement as being open to consideration for the granting of possible concessions to Argentina.

It would manifestly be improper for me, while the negotiations are in progress and before any decisions have been reached concerning these and other pending items, to attempt to anticipate the results of the very careful study which will be given to all such items by the best practical experts from the various departments of the Government which are collaborating in this work, including, of course, the Department of Agriculture. I note that you have sent a copy of your letter to the Committee for Reciprocity Information with a request that it be made a part of the statement which you submitted to the committee at the hearings on October 16 You may be assured that this additional expression of your views will be carefully considered by the interdepartmental trade-agreements organization.

Your views appear to be broadly similar to those expressed before the Committee for Reciprocity Information at the recent hearings on the Argentine agreement by various other Members of Congress, and also by representatives of certain organizations speaking, or purporting to speak, for the farmer. Hence I should like—speaking also for the farmer as well as for the rest of the country—to take this opportunity to point out some of the salient facts which should be borne in mind in connection with this whole matter.

First of all, I want to emphasize that attempts to prejudge the case by forecasting all sorts of dire happenings to agriculture, in consequence of an agreement with Argentina which has not yet been negotiated, are wholly premature, and are in no sense justified by the experience in connection with earlier agreements. Expressions of fear and sweeping assertions of this type have been heard every time trade-agreement negotiations have been undertaken with another country. Invariably this occurred before the negotiation of the particular trade agreement had been completed. Invariably the clamor subsided as soon as the actual terms of the agreement were made public and the moderate and careful nature of the tariff adjustments made by us was revealed.

Second, I want to emphasize that neither you, yourself, nor any of the others who have expressed opposition to the negotiation of a trade agreement with Argentina, on the ground of alleged injury to agriculture, can possibly have more at heart than I do the interests of the farmers of this country. There cannot be any question of that. The point at issue is wholly different. I am convinced that the trade-agreements program has been highly beneficial to our farmers and to the Nation as a whole. You, apparently, are not. I am confident that the proposed trade agreement with Argentina, which is a part of the program, will not be injurious to our farmers, but, on the contrary, will be helpful both to our agriculture and to the economic well-being of the Nation as a whole. You, apparently, are not. Let us look at the facts.

In most of the recent discussions of the proposed agreement with Argentina, including your own observations, I note a decided tendency not only to prejudge this prospective agreement in the absence of any knowledge of what its actual terms will be, but also to weigh it solely by itself, entirely separate and apart from the remainder of the trade-agreements program. That, I submit, is wholly untenable and unfair. I recognize, of course, that each agreement must be appraised, in the first instance, on its own merits; but I cannot, in fairness to the interests of the farmers themselves or the Nation as a whole, agree that responsible consideration of the matter can stop at that point.

As regards the prospective agreement with Argentina, obviously it cannot be appraised on its own merits until its actual terms are determined. At the present stage of the negotiations, neither I nor any one else concerned with the negotiations can possibly know precisely what commodities will be affected and in what measure—except that, as was invariably the case in all previous negotiations, the well-being of our farmers, as well as of all other groups of the population, will be fully and carefully taken into account.

As to the wisdom of negotiating an agreement with a country like Argentina, it should be noted, first of all, that during the past 15 years our sales to Argentina amounted to $1,543,000,000, which was $487,000,000 in excess of our purchases from Argentina. The agreement now under negotiation is necessary in order to safeguard and expand this important foreign market for American products as a necessary means of expanding our domestic market as well. Shall we throw away this mutually beneficial trade relationship and the increased purchasing power for both agriculture and industry resulting from it, simply because of exaggerated fears—entirely unwarranted and, in too many instances, unfairly fostered—that American farmers might be injured by an agreement containing, among its other features, limited adjustments of tariffs on a few agricultural products, some of them largely or wholly noncompetitive and all of them supplementary to our own production?

The whole question of negotiating a trade agreement with Argentina or any other country is one which can be fully and properly evaluated only in conjunction with the entire program. In the conduct of trade negotiations there is neither justification in principle nor authority in law for deliberately discriminating between agricultural and nonagricultural countries in choosing the field for negotiation. If we are to proceed seriously with this broad program for the reopening of the channels of trade, we must be prepared to negotiate either limited or comprehensive agreements—as circumstances warrant—with all countries whose trade policies are such as to afford a basis for negotiation under principles laid down in the Trade Agreements Act.

Almost without exception, opponents of this agreement—even those who, in all sincerity, have been making public statements in opposition to it—have failed to grasp the fundamentals of the issue. The problem is one of promoting the economic welfare of the entire Nation through increase of purchasing power and expansion of markets, at home and abroad, to the benefit of American agriculture, industry, and labor. To do this requires that we exert every effort—without materially impairing, even temporarily, the interests of any established and reasonably efficient domestic industry—to lower or remove excessive barriers to international trade. Agriculture, dependent as it is not only upon foreign markets but also upon the general prosperity of the Nation, has probably more to gain from such a program of trade liberalization than any other major branch of the Nation's economic life.

This is the central problem which we have been seeking to solve through trade agreements. It is because of the vital bearing of a constructive foreign-trade policy on our national prosperity that the President and his entire administration have made the trade-agreements program an essential part of their unceasing effort to rehabilitate our agriculture and our whole economic life.

The trade-agreements program has had, and now has, no purpose more essential than that of benefiting American agriculture. Notwithstanding reckless and grossly unfair assertions to the contrary, we have made great headway in the face of difficulties of the most serious character. Now, however, as we enter upon negotiations with Argentina, it is violently asserted in certain quarters that we should forego the unquestionable advantages of a trade agreement with Argentina on the spurious and unsupported plea that certain branches of American agriculture would be injured in the process. It is even sweepingly alleged, without one scintilla of supporting evidence, that agriculture as a whole will suffer from this agreement.

However sincerely such feelings may be held, they are not, I repeat, founded upon a full understanding of the facts. They rest upon premises which are so erroneous or so narrow that the entire picture is distorted. The allegation that the Argentine agreement will be injurious to certain branches of American agriculture is based upon two false assumptions: (1) That whatever tariff adjustments are made will not be as carefully considered and as adequately safeguarded as those made in agreements already negotiated; and (2) that every additional pound or bushel or other unit that is imported deprives the domestic producers of that much business. This second assumption entirely overlooks the fact that the domestic market is not a fixed or a static market but, on the contrary, expands or contracts under the influence, among other factors, of a prosperous or a depressed foreign trade.

The inherent fallacy involved in the assumption that the domestic market is a static one is nowhere better demonstrated than by our own experience under embargo tariffs. I have discussed that experience so often and so fully in the past that it is surely unnecessary to repeat it here. The essential facts are, as our Hawley-Smoot experience painfully demonstrated: First, that it is impossible to grant embargo tariffs to some groups and withhold them from others, and that, once political trading of this sort gets under way, there is no stopping short of prohibitive tariffs all along the line; and second, that the net result of such an embargo tariff policy is a disastrous decline in our foreign trade which leaves in its wake a prostrate agriculture and a prostrate nation.

Far from being preserved, the farmer's home market—as well as his foreign—is drastically reduced as a result of embargo tariffs. We have learned from experience that to embark upon such a policy is ruinous. For well-meaning persons assuming to speak for agriculture still to cling, despite all that happened after 1930, to the delusion that the farmer has something to gain from embargo tariffs, or from resisting a program for adjusting such tariffs below the embargo level while still providing thoroughly adequate safeguards, is folly compounded. Most of those who are today attempting to destroy our trade program by making insupportable charges that it is injuring agriculture are the same false prophets who solemnly assured the farmers that the Hawley-Smoot embargoes would guarantee to them full and permanent prosperity; whereas, in actual fact, within 2 years from the enactment of the 1930 tariff, millions of farmers found themselves in, or on the verge of bankruptcy.

The plain truth is that farmers in this country have everything to gain and nothing to lose from a carefully administered program for the reestablishment of our foreign trade to the fullest extent that international conditions will permit. It is either such a course of moderation, with expanding markets for American products at home and abroad; or else it is embargo tariffs all around, with consequences that we have already seen.

Moreover, there is no basis in fact for truly astounding statements that the program in actual operation has injured American farmers. The very reverse is the case.

The facts are that we have secured extremely valuable benefits for agriculture through the safeguarding and expanding of foreign markets for our farm surpluses. The improved facilities for the marketing abroad of the products of our farms were one of the major factors responsible for the rise in our agricultural exports from $662,000,000 in 1932 and $694,000,000 in 1933 to $828,000,000 in 1938, as contrasted with their drastic decline from a level of $1,693,000,000 in 1929. In addition, of course, the farmer's home market has expanded in consequence of increased domestic employment and purchasing power for farm products, partly brought about by trade-agreement concessions obtained for American exports of both agricultural and nonagricultural commodities.

The trade agreements thus far concluded are with countries which take about 60 percent of our total exports. In these agreements we have obtained valuable concessions, including binding of duty-free entry, for 47 percent of our exports of farm products to all countries. These concessions cover about three-fourths of our exports of farm products to the trade-agreement countries themselves. Old markets have been safeguarded and new markets have been opened up for all surplus-producing branches of our agriculture. A few illustrations will suffice.

After a prolonged period of domestic shortage, the corn-hog industry is again becoming heavily dependent upon export outlets. Reduction of barriers against our exports of pork, ham, or bacon has been obtained in 10 countries. On lard 9 countries have reduced barriers, while 3 others have agreed not to impose new restrictions. Of special significance is the removal in the agreement with Great Britain of a burdensome preferential duty on lard, originally imposed in retaliation for some of the superprotectionist provisions of the Smoot-Hawley tariff.

On grains and grain products, foreign-trade barriers have been lowered in all but five of the agreements now in effect, and in three of the remaining five agreements the foreign countries concerned have bound existing favorable duties against increase. Great Britain has removed its duty on wheat, also originally imposed in retaliation for our action under the Smoot-Hawley tariff, and has bound corn and cotton on the free list.

Fruits, vegetables, and a long list of other farm products have benefited from the concessions obtained in the trade agreements.

Analysis of the results obtained under the trade-agreements program reveals that between 1935 and 1938 our exports of farm products to trade-agreement countries increased by nearly 50 percent, whereas to other countries they actually declined slightly. It is a stupendous fact that this progress in reopening market outlets was attained in the face of such formidable obstacles as the continuation in many countries of exorbitantly high trade barriers, the existence abroad of an extraordinarily low level of purchasing power, the increasing diversion of purchasing power to the procurement of commodities needed for the construction of armaments, and the disastrous effects of unprecedented droughts upon our own exporting capacity.

One would look in vain, in the mass of statements and appeals with which those who seek to destroy the trade-agreements program have flooded the farmers, for any reference to these undisputed and important benefits secured, through trade agreements, for the farmers themselves and for the Nation as a whole. In their unholy zeal, they deliberately suppress and withhold all material facts favorable to the trade-agreements program. It is high time for the farmers of our Corn-Hog Belt, our Wheat Belt, our Cotton Belt to ask why such opponents of the trade-agreements program—professing, as they do, to have the interests of the farmers at heart—do not give them all of the facts essential for informed judgment on this issue, which is so crucial to their welfare.

The agreements we have concluded are with countries which account for a little over 60 percent of our total imports. Among these are such important agricultural producers as Canada and some of the Latin American republics. To these countries we have granted carefully considered and carefully safeguarded tariff adjustments on some of their characteristic products, designed to permit a moderate increase of their sales to us in exchange for increased outlets for our products.

Much has been said in recent years about imports of agricultural products, by persons who have sought to persuade farmers that such imports are highly detrimental; and efforts have been unceasing to make it appear that trade-agreement concessions have been seriously harmful in this connection. It has even been falsely asserted that the bulk of the concessions granted by us in trade agreements have been on farm products. Repeated exposure of the utter hollowness of such unfounded assertions has not prevented their endless repetition.

The facts with regard to concessions on farm products are that, while duties have been adjusted on more than a fifth of our nonagricultural imports, in the case of agricultural imports the tariff adjustments now in effect apply to only about 8 percent of the total. It is clear that these adjustments in duties on farm products could not possibly have been a factor of any considerable importance in the recent situation as regards imports of agricultural products.

It needs to be understood just what these agricultural imports are and what is the true explanation of the changes in their volume in recent years. In all of the vast array of misleading literature put out on this subject, there is not the slightest suggestion as to the true character or the true significance of these imports.

For example, if we examine the figures for 1938—the last full year available, and a year in which most of the abnormality in the import figures arising from the cumulative effects of the droughts of 1934 and 1936 had disappeared—what do we find? We find that, of the total imports of agricultural, or so-called agricultural, products, amounting to $956,000,000, more than half consisted of things like rubber, coffee, silk, etc., which are not even produced in the United States. Among these items were $138,000,000 worth of coffee; $130,000,000 of crude rubber; $89,000,000 of raw silk; $29,000,000 of bananas; $20,000,000 of cocoa beans; $18,000,000 of tea; $13,000,000 of carpet wool; and $10,000,000 of sisal and henequen (mostly for the farmer's binder twine). This was the situation, notwithstanding that the relatively low business and industrial activity in the United States in 1938 resulted in much smaller importation of industrial raw materials than takes place in more prosperous years. For example, in 1937 our imports of products of this type, not produced in the United States, amounted to $711,000,000.

With respect to the remainder of our 1938 imports of agricultural products (amounting to slightly less than half of the total), we find that sugar alone accounted for $130,000,000, or well over a fourth; and sugar imports have been regulated by quota restriction until quite recently when the quotas were removed and the tariff duty on Cuban sugar reverted to the pre-Cuban-trade-agreement rate. So far as concerns the rest of these imports, two things are to be noted: First, that they consist—as in the case of sugar—of commodities of a type which we do not produce in sufficient quantities, despite high tariffs on most of them, to meet our own requirements; and second, that, in very considerable part, they consist of products imported because of seasonal, quality, or other special factors.

The significance of changes in the volume of imports of agricultural, or so-called agricultural, products from year to year is equally in need of clarification. It is easy to attach a completely false significance to the rise of such imports from $668,000,000 in 1932 to $956,000,000 in 1938, meanwhile conveniently ignoring the fact that farm income, after reaching its lowest ebb in 1932, had increased between 1932 and 1938 by almost $3,000,000,000. It is easy to neglect pointing out that in 1929 we brought in from abroad $2,218,000,000 of such products, so that, on the theory that the volume of farm imports governs farm prosperity, agriculture should have reached the very bottom of depression in 1929, instead of which—after 2 years of Hawley-Smoot embargoes—it reached bottom in 1932. It is easy to make utterly false use of import figures which are, in a large degree, abnormal. For example, a large part of the greatly increased volume of agricultural imports in 1937 was, as every informed person should have known, the direct result of severe domestic shortages caused by the droughts of 1934 and 1936. A considerable part of the increase was also, of course, the result of the marked economic improvement in 1937, which led to increased imports of agricultural and other raw materials, in large part noncompetitive and essential for the operation of our industries.

That our agriculture has not been injured by these imports of agricultural products may be clearly seen from an examination of the income received by farmers in recent years and from the movement of prices of the principal agricultural commodities. What the figures show, on the contrary, is that agricultural imports and farm income have tended generally in the past to move up and down together.

The total cash income from the marketing of all farm products, exclusive of Government payments, was $4,606,000,000 in 1932, $5,248,000,000 in 1933, $8,621,000,000 in 1937, and $7,538,000,000 in 1938. The latest estimated income for 1939 is $7,600,000,000. All major groups of producers participated in these increases, just as in the preceding 3 years they all shared in the calamitous decline of farm income from the level of $11,221,000,000 which was received in 1929.

The contrast between the two periods is striking. During the first, the Hawley-Smoot tariff was in full operation; during the second, the trade-agreements program was increasingly being put into effect.

When the Hawley-Smoot tariff was enacted in 1930 the farmers were promised a period of great prosperity, under the slogan "the American market for the American farmer." Instead, during the 3 years which followed, the cash income from the marketing of crops fell by $1,355,000,000, while the income from the marketing of livestock and livestock products dropped by $2,338,000,000. This latter figure included a decline of $1,252,000,000 in the income from meat animals alone and a decline of $641,000,000 in the income from dairy products.

When the Trade Agreements Act was passed, and periodically since then, as trade agreements were negotiated, irresponsible and terrifying predictions were made in some quarters that the effect would be to "ruin" our agriculture. Yet between 1933 and 1938 the income received from the marketing of crops increased by $716,000,000, and the income received from the marketing of livestock and livestock products increased by $1,574,000,000. This latter figure includes an increase of $952,000,000 in the income from meat animals and of $408,000,000 in the income from dairy products.

The movement of prices of farm products since 1932 tells essentially the same story. In 1932 the average index of farm prices (1909–14=100) was 65; in 1938 it was 95. In 1932 the average farm price of wheat was 38.8 cents a bushel; in 1938, 66.1 cents; and on September 15, 1939, 72.7 cents. For corn the figures for these same respective dates were 28.1, 49.0, and 56.2 cents a bushel. For hogs, the figures were $3.34, $7.74, and $7.06 a hundred, respectively. For beef cattle the figures were $4.25, $6.53, and $7.07 a hundred. For butterfat the figures were 17.9, 26.3, and 24.7 cents a pound. For wool the figures were 8.6, 19.1, and 24.3 cents a pound.

While there was a considerable rise in prices of some of these products after the recent outbreak of war in Europe, inspection of the earlier figures reveals that, before that time, the prices received by farmers for beef cattle, hogs, corn, and wheat had risen one and one-half times as compared with 1932; those for butterfat, by nearly one-third; and those for wool, to three times their 1932 level.

The data for income and prices with respect to beef cattle and dairy products are particularly significant. It is in connection with these commodities that the loudest prophecies of doom and the most reckless claims of injury have been occasioned by the tariff adjustments made in the trade agreements. Yet both of these branches of our agriculture have shown substantial improvement during recent years. It is in the face of such facts as these that some lobbyists in and out of Washington purporting to speak for dairy and livestock interests carry on their unceasing efforts to mislead not only the public but the very industries for whom they pretend to speak.

The record recited above shows all too clearly that the whole idea that farmers have anything to gain by supporting a policy of airtight embargo tariffs on farm products is shot through with fallacy. It shows, as already stated, that this leads to embargo tariffs all around, destroying both foreign and domestic markets and resulting in disaster to agriculture, as to other branches of our economic life. It proves conclusively that statements to the effect that our farmers are being injured by the trade agreements can only be based either upon ignorance of the facts, for which there is little excuse, since all of the data given above are regularly published and are easily available; or else upon a deliberate attempt to mislead the farmers and the public in general. It is an incontrovertible fact that no agricultural tariff adjustments have been made in our trade agreements without the utmost care to see to it that those branches of our agriculture affected were left with ample safeguards.

I feel that I must emphasize once more the point that those who now attack the trade-agreements program on the alleged ground that the proposed Argentine agreement will injure our agriculture assume that this agreement, or any single agreement, can be weighed in complete dissociation from the remainder of the entire program. They would have us ignore completely the moderate nature of the concessions made in other trade agreements and the beneficial effects of other agreements upon agriculture, through expansion of market outlets for farm products both at home and abroad. They even assume that the tariff adjustments which we may make in the Argentine agreement can be appraised independently of the benefits obtained in the way of safeguarding and expanding our exports to Argentina.

Far from injuring farmers, the trade agreements have made a twofold contribution to their economic welfare. Increased foreign markets for agricultural products have eased the burden of our surpluses and have placed greater purchasing power in the hands of the producers. Increased foreign markets for industrial, as well as agricultural, products—and in the trade agreements negotiated to date valuable concessions were secured from foreign countries for one-quarter of our nonagricultural exports—have expanded domestic demand for all types of farm products.

The accomplishment of both of these aims—that is, expansion of both the domestic and the foreign demand for our products at fair prices—is among the paramount purposes of the trade-agreements program. Neither is possible in a satisfactory measure without the establishment throughout the world of conditions under which mutually profitable trade, based upon the essential principle of equal treatment, can be given the greatest practicable scope of operation. And experience has shown that no more effective method of promoting such conditions of trade has been devised than that embodied in our trade-agreements program.

We have taken a position of leadership in this field, not only because a healthy development of foreign trade is necessary to the economic stability and welfare of this country and is an indispensable foundation of enduring peace, but also because the alternative to the type of policy which we pursue is a growth of national economic isolation, with all its disastrous results for the peace and prosperity of nations. That alternative means, within nations, increasing regimentation in all phases of economic life, beginning with the surplus-producing industries and steadily extending to all other branches of production and distribution. It means the dole in an expanding and more and more aggravated form, and a decline in the general standard of national well-being. Even before the outbreak of the present war, excessive trade barriers were predominantly responsible for the piling up of huge surpluses in some countries, while millions of people throughout the world were compelled to subsist on short rations. Internationally it means growing animosities, bitter resentments, and, in the end, the anarchy of violence through the unbridled use of armed force.

When the present unfortunate period of hostilities is over, this and other important nations will be confronted with the choice of either furnishing an increased measure of leadership in bringing the world back to a sane and healthy economy, both domestically and internationally, and thus in building the foundation of enduring peace; or of undergoing a steady deterioration in their economic life, with all the evil consequences of such a downward course for stability and prosperity within nations and for peace among nations.

At the present time, the best interests of this Nation require the greatest possible effort in the direction of maintaining the results of our unremitting work in the field of trade-agreement negotiations during the past 5 years and of extending the area of negotiations wherever possible. The negotiations now in progress with such countries as Argentina are a part of this vital effort. Here we have an opportunity to place the trade relations between this country and the nations to the south of us on a basis of greater mutual advantage, to the benefit of both sides, and at the same time to strengthen the ties of friendship and solidarity in the Western Hemisphere, which are so vitally important to our common security in a world harassed by war.

In view of all these circumstances, I earnestly hope that those, like yourself, who have been apprehensive concerning the pending negotiations will give the whole matter further thought. It seems to me that it is due the Nation, and the farmers themselves, that premature judgments with respect to these negotiations be suspended and that, when the negotiations are completed, appraisal of the results be based upon all of the relevant facts. I am confident that, if this is done, the only reasonable verdict will be that the interests of the farmers will have been promoted, rather than hurt. I am confident that, in consequence of both direct and indirect benefits arising from the Argentine agreement itself and of the further impetus that conclusion of this agreement will give to a program which is basically in their interest, farmers will share with the rest of the Nation the manifest advantages to be gained from the improvement of our trade relations with an influential and a friendly nation in the Western Hemisphere.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, under permission granted on November 3, 1939, page 1358, I wish to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two proclamations issued by the President of the United States, as provided under House Joint Resolution 306, passed at the extra session of Congress, relating to neutrality, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
November, 1939.

PROCLAMATION OF A STATE OF WAR BETWEEN GERMANY AND FRANCE; POLAND; AND THE UNITED KINGDOM, INDIA, AUSTRALIA, CANADA, NEW ZEALAND, AND THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA

By the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

A PROCLAMATION

Whereas section 1 of the joint resolution of Congress approved November 4, 1939, provides in part as follows:

"That whenever the President, or the Congress by concurrent resolution, shall find that there exists a state of war between foreign states, and that it is necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace of the United States or to protect the lives of citizens of the United States, the President shall issue a proclamation naming the states involved; and he shall, from time to time, by proclamation, name other states as and when they may become involved in the war."

And whereas it is further provided by section 13 of the said joint resolution that—

"The President may, from time to time, promulgate such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary and proper to carry out any of the provisions of this joint resolution; and he may exercise any power or authority conferred on him by this joint resolution through such officer or officers, of agency or agencies, as he shall direct."

Now, therefore, I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, acting under and by virtue of the authority conferred on me by the said joint resolution, do hereby proclaim that a state of war unhappily exists between Germany and France, Poland, and the United Kingdom, India, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and the Union of South Africa, and that it is necessary to promote the security and preserve the peace of the United States and to protect the lives of citizens of the United States.

And I do hereby enjoin upon all officers of the United States, charged with the execution of the laws thereof, the utmost diligence in preventing violations of the said joint resolution and in bringing to trial and punishment any offenders against the same.

And I do hereby delegate to the Secretary of State the power to exercise any power or authority conferred on me by the said joint resolution, as made effective by this my proclamation issued thereunder, which is not specifically delegated by Executive order to some other officer or agency of this Government, and the power to promulgate such rules and regulations not inconsistent with law as may be necessary and proper to carry out any of its provisions.

And I do hereby revoke my proclamations Nos. 2349, 2354, and 2360 issued on September 5, 8, and 10, 1939, respectively, in regard to the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to France, Germany, Poland, and the United Kingdom, India, Australia, and New Zealand, to the Union of South Africa, and to Canada.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this fourth day of November, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and thirty-nine, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and sixty-fourth.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

By the President:
CORDELL HULL,
Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
November, 1939.

USE OF PORTS OR TERRITORIAL WATERS OF THE UNITED STATES BY SUBMARINES OF FOREIGN BELLIGERENT STATES

By the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

A PROCLAMATION

Whereas section 11 of the joint resolution approved November 4, 1939, provides:

"Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President shall find that special restrictions placed on the use of the ports and territorial waters of the United States by the submarines or armed merchant vessels of a foreign state, will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign states, or to protect the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or to promote the security of the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall thereafter be unlawful for any such submarine or armed merchant vessel to enter a port or the territorial waters of the United States or to depart therefrom, except under such conditions and subject to such limitations as the President may prescribe. Whenever, in his judgment, the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply, except as to offenses committed prior to such revocation."

Whereas there exists a state of war between Germany and France; Poland; and the United Kingdom, India, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and the Union of South Africa; and

Whereas the United States of America is neutral in such war;

Now, therefore, I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, acting under and by virtue of the authority vested in me by the foregoing provision of section 11 of the joint resolution approved November 4, 1939, do by this proclamation find that special restrictions placed on the use of the ports and territorial waters of the United States, exclusive of the Canal Zone, by the submarines of a foreign belligerent state, both commercial submarines and submarines which are ships of war, will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign states, to protect the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, and to promote the security of the United States;

And I do further declare and proclaim that it shall hereafter be unlawful for any submarine of France, Germany, Poland, or the United Kingdom, India, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, or the Union of South Africa to enter ports or territorial waters of the United States, exclusive of the Canal Zone, except submarines of the said belligerent states which are forced into such ports or territorial waters of the United States by force majeure; and in such cases of force majeure, only when such submarines enter ports or territorial waters of the United States while running on the surface with conning tower and superstructure above water and flying the flags of the foreign belligerent states of which they are vessels. Such submarines may depart from ports or territorial waters of the United States only while running on the surface with conning tower and superstructure above water and flying the flags of the foreign belligerent states of which they are vessels.

And I do hereby enjoin upon all officers of the United States charged with the execution of the laws thereof the utmost diligence in preventing violations of the said joint resolution, and this my proclamation issued thereunder, and in bringing to trial and punishment any offenders against the same.

And I do hereby revoke my proclamation No. 2371, issued by me on October 18, 1939, in regard to the use of ports or territorial waters of the United States by submarines of foreign belligerent states.

This proclamation shall continue in full force and effect unless and until modified, revoked, or otherwise terminated pursuant to law.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this fourth day of November in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and thirty-nine, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and sixty-fourth.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

By the President:
CORDELL HULL,
Secretary of State.

Inter-American Relations in the Field of Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS OF HON. CORDELL HULL, SECRETARY OF STATE, TO BE DELIVERED AT THE CONFERENCE ON INTER-AMERICAN RELATIONS IN THE FIELD OF EDUCATION, HOTEL MAYFLOWER, NOVEMBER 9, 1939

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, under permission granted me on November 3, 1939, page 1358, I wish to submit an address to be delivered by Secretary of State Hull for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as follows:

At the outset let me express the thanks of the Department of State for your willingness to lay aside your duties and join us today. We are peculiarly in need of the kind of assistance which you can give. We are seeking to examine certain aspects of international relations in which education and educators may make a unique contribution; and we are endeavoring, through common counsel, to find the methods and means by which that contribution may be made most effective.

The greatest triumph of this hemisphere thus far has been the establishment of the peace of the Americas, peace by cooperation instead of by conquest or by balance of power. This has been built through many experiments and many phases; it has had setbacks, but in the main, the Western Hemisphere has succeeded in marked degree in making itself free from the militarism of the Old World, and free from the idea that only through successive wars can its civilization be maintained.

All of us are, I am sure, familiar with the diplomatic and governmental aspects of the work which the 21 American republics have endeavored to carry on, and to which this Government has tried consistently to contribute. Over many decades, the principal problems affecting inter-American development, and bearing on the peace of the Americas, were primarily within the American continents. We were interested particularly in the relationships between the countries of this hemisphere. It was necessary to place those relationships firmly on a basis of law, rather than force; and to bring about recognition of the juridical equality of every nation on this hemisphere, irrespective of size or numerical strength. It was necessary to work out a sort of inter-American national bill of rights, which would include complete respect for the sovereignty of every country, the elimination of intervention, the perfecting of mechanisms by which disputes could be solved through reason. At the Conference of Montevideo in 1933, substantial agreement was reached on these essential principles.

Three years later, in 1936, the danger of warfare overseas became apparent; and with it a very real danger that much of the world might slip back into the anarchy of international relations based purely on force. It was the firm resolve of this Government, as indeed of the other American governments, that the New World must be kept free of that tragedy. The Conference for the Maintenance of Peace, at Buenos Aires, in 1936, was called and held for the specific purpose of endeavoring to set up methods and agreements which would prevent the rising tide of anarchy from invading this hemisphere. In consequence, the 21 American republics concluded certain agreements designed to make possible common action by all of the 21 republics in the event that peace was threatened.

During the next 2 years, the trend of affairs in other parts of the world continued to worsen; and signs were not wanting that certain overseas governments had interested themselves in the affairs of the American continent. In that atmosphere the Eighth International Conference of American States met at Lima in December of last year. The Conference rightly appraised its task as that of setting up the principles and the mechanics for defending the peace of the New World against any attempt to subvert it by any outside power or force. The result was the declaration of Lima, by which the 21 American republics agreed that they would defend and maintain the integrity of the republican institutions to which the New World is committed; that they would regard an attack on any one of these nations as an attack on all; and that they would consult together to take measures for the common defense in the event of a threat to peace, or attack on any one of the American family. With the outbreak of war last September, the mechanics thus set up were promptly brought into action at the recent consultation held at Panama.

At all these conferences, vigorous efforts were made, by discussion and agreement, to place the economic relations of the American nations—and of each of them with the rest of the world—upon a sound basis of mutual benefit. We have sought to lay the foundation for an elimination or reduction of excessive trade barriers and for the establishment of the vital principle of equality of commercial treatment. In the relations of government to government, we have striven to implement these ideas through appropriate action—for the sake of promoting the economic well-being of each of us, as well as because of our firm conviction that sound and healthy economic relations among nations constitute an indispensable foundation of enduring peace.

This is a bare outline of diplomatic and governmental steps. Those of us who have most to do with measures of government are fully aware of the fact that governmental action can never rise higher than its source, and that the source is the moral and intellectual structure which lies behind and beneath the formal governmental action. Bad mechanical arrangements may be successful when there is common understanding, when men's minds march together, and when none of the parties are strangers to each other's ideas and ideals. On the other hand, the best technical arrangements in the world are futile if there is not underlying them the foundation of that understanding. For this reason we, in common with our neighbors, are especially interested in buttressing the economic and political relations which we have by broad understanding between peoples. The creation and continuance of this understanding is, I am convinced, the peculiar contribution which education can make to inter-American relations and to the security, peace, and welfare of the Americas.

The present moment is unusually happy for developing to the fullest the contributions which each of us in the American family can make to the other. Never have relations between the American republics been more cordial. Never has there been greater realization that each of us has much to contribute to the other; never has there been greater mutual respect or greater comprehension. For that very reason it is clearer to all of us than ever before that the relations among our nations must not rest merely on the contacts between diplomat and diplomat, political leader and political leader, or even between businessman and businessman. They must rest also on contacts between teacher and teacher, between student and student; upon the confluence of streams of thought as well as upon more formalized governmental action and constructive business activity.

Understanding, trust in each other, and friendliness are the foundations of those close relations of cooperation upon which the progress of all depends. Education, exchange of information, earnest effort to learn from each other and to understand and respect each other's point of view are among the greatest factors in promoting these essential objectives.

In the American republics, the intellectual plays a part of first importance in the national life. The poet, the scholar, and the teacher are likely to be found not only in universities and in cultural circles but in places of diplomatic and political responsibility. No less than in the United States, the American republics lying to the south of us make active use of their intellectual resources, and their men of learning and letters and arts stand high in the national respect of their peoples. Our own country can afford to learn many lessons in this respect. In asking you today to consider the problem of educational and cultural relations, I am certain that out of that relationship we shall receive as much as we give. It is within our power to make our own splendid educational resources available to our neighbors, as well as to draw upon them for ideas and inspiration which may be of great use to us.

You are more familiar than I with the technical avenues for accomplishing the result which we have in mind. You realize, I am sure, how much our own country needs to learn of the civilization of other American peoples, and of the possibility of disseminating this knowledge through our schools, our colleges, our universities, and our technical journals; and in like measure, the possibilities which these institutions afford for making the tools of our own civilization available to our neighboring countries.

The process of making available the fruits of our intellectual work in the other American republics and of bringing the fruits of their work to the United States properly ought to be carried on by the private and semipublic educational agencies which are already in existence. Mechanically, the Department of State is able to give you very considerable help. It is my hope that we may place at your disposal the facilities of this Government so that we may assist you in contributing the wisdom which you have to our neighbors who seek it; and that, in like manner, we may assist you in finding contact with the scholars and scientists and institutions of learning outside the United States which have something to say to us.

Let me close by saying that, in my judgment, this work in which we are all engaged is of the highest importance. None can forecast the future in world affairs. It is possible that the great shadow which lies heavily over Europe may become a long twilight. It is not inconceivable that many of the lights of western civilization may there be dimmed or altogether put out. It may even be that for a time the New World may have to guard and maintain the achievements of that civilization, holding them in trust for a time when they can once more be general throughout the world.

Though governments can help, this is not a task for government alone but for all of us. The teachers, the men of science and learning throughout the New World, must resolve to work together to accomplish that function which is rightfully theirs—to guard, to enrich, and to forward the civilization which, in the high calling of education, all of us must seek to serve.

Our Prince of Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM I. SIROVICH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

ARTICLE BY HARRY H. SCHLACHT

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article entitled "Our Prince of Peace," from the East Side News, of New York City, September 23, 1939:

[From the East Side News of September 23, 1939]

OUR PRINCE OF PEACE

(By Harry H. Schlacht)

Justice and humanity are America's greatest contributions to the world. She stands today as a temple of peace and liberty in the world aflame—a sanctuary where the lamp of civilization illuminates the earth. Like Washington and Lincoln, who guided our country through epochal testing times, President Roosevelt truly reflects the sentiments and feelings of our people. His doctrine of sympathy, which has been the foundation of his administration; his unbounded faith in humanity; his profound philosophy and his deep-rooted belief in the ultimate triumph of liberty and justice are strikingly expressed in all his international dealings and constitutes the greatest contribution to the progressive thoughts of mankind.

America must preserve, under the guidance of President Roosevelt, her national ideal and her national soul. The thirst for this ideal is so closely woven into the warf and woof of our life that to tear it out now would unravel the very thread of our existence.

The civilization that we know is being torn by the mightiest struggle in all history. Sparks of Europe's conflagration are beginning to blaze into our own skies and echoes of her strife are sounding at our very doors. In a dramatic and historic address President Roosevelt is determined to "keep us out of war." The policies of his administration will not be written in the ruins of American homes, not in the wrecks of American industry, and not in the destruction of American families. From every whirling wheel in America, from every factory that turns, from every growing thing that breathes its prayer of plenty, from every quiet schoolhouse, from every crowded market, from every peaceful home goes up a song of praise and thanksgiving to hymn a nation's tribute for the statesmanship that will bring these things to pass.

In the bloodiest crucible of all history the President will keep the stainless banner of the Republic flying with peace and honor. In spite of the complications crowding upon each other like waves of an angry sea, with enemies powerful from within and without, he will emerge as a majestic and powerful mountain after a storm. Let us behold a free and fruitful America under smiling skies, a potent force in world's peace.

Why Cannot Texas Tax Crude Oil?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. R. POAGE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, the State of Texas produced 39.2 percent of all the petroleum produced in the United States during the year of 1938, and as the United States produced in the same year 61.3 percent of the petroleum of the world, my State accounts for 24 percent of the entire world's production of this vital mineral.

No natural resource is of greater importance to modern civilization than petroleum. It is the lifeblood which gives movement and vitality to the products of steel. Not only does it make possible the daily use of the automobile and the modern streamlined trains, not only is it vital to our everyday lives and existence of our peaceful civilization, it is equally indispensable to the prosecution of modern warfare. Without gasoline every bomber would be grounded and every tank would be stalled. Oil is essential not only to America but to the world. And that means that Texas oil is essential to the world.

It is little wonder then that a resource of such importance should be a source of relentless intrigue and overreaching. Throughout the old West there was a saying that "Wherever there is gold there is hell." This is likewise true of oil. Not only do we find that wherever there is oil there is the turmoil and violence of the frontier camp—not only is there an ever-present likelihood of personal violence—there is a much more dangerous and far-reaching background. The lawlessness of the boom days is always brought under control by the forces of law and responsible government. The opportunity for the gunman or the gangster is short lived, but the opportunity for those who can shape the forces of government itself are unlimited. The oil industry was the first to fall into monopolistic hands. The Standard Oil was the first of a whole series of trusts that have successively ravaged one after another of the business interests of America. While its manipulations have of late years been less obvious, it cannot be doubted that in all too many instances Standard Oil has exercised an unwarranted influence on legislation in a number of our States. With the discovery of some of the great Texas oil fields, there sprang up a group of independents. For a time these independent oil operators seemed likely to give the trust some real competition, but all too soon the old tactics of ruthless destruction of all competitors had decimated the ranks of the independents. Today the major companies probably control the production of nearly 90 percent of all oil produced in Texas, and refine approximately the same percentage of all gasoline. The independent operators have been forced in the oil industry, just as in so many other industries, into the marginal fields, and the eastern-owned major companies control not only the bulk of oil production but through their financial ramifications they are heavily interested in, if not in control of, the sulfur and natural-gas production of the State as well. Their community of interest in the field of taxation with the public utilities, the railroads, the insurance companies, and other large interests of the State and Nation has made it relatively easy for them to protect their properties to a very large degree from the hand of the tax collector, which has been laid so heavily on most of their less influential neighbors.

And it is to this matter of taxation of natural resources that I wish to direct your attention. I have heretofore discussed this problem both here and in Texas. I have discussed it in Texas because I believe, and have long believed, that the resources of my State were being removed and the capital wealth of my State depleted for the enrichment of residents of other jurisdictions without any just return to the sovereignty that made possible these transitory but distinctly profitable operations. I have discussed this problem here because I recognize, as you do, a growing insistance on the part of many for Federal control of the great oil industry. Certainly such action on the part of the Federal Government is to be avoided if possible, and I believe that it is possible if the several States will but awake to their own powers and responsibilities. Most of the States have evidenced a full recognition of responsibility for the control of oil production. I wonder if this could be due to the fact that all major companies have in this instance joined with the independents to keep production control in local hands? In any event, there has been no such energetic and uniform State action in the field of taxation of natural resources.

There was a time when all our Federal taxes came from sources like the tariff and the income tax, which taxes did not directly conflict with State levies, which were then largely confined to ad valorem taxes on tangible property. However, in recent years the Federal Government has expanded its taxing base so as to include many, if not all, of the special taxes—as the gasoline tax and admission taxes. These special taxes have at the same time become more and more important in the scheme of State financing as the ad valorem tax has become less and less productive. Today we have a situation where it seems to me to be apparent that the ad valorem tax must be released to the local agencies of government—cities, counties, and school districts.

This will leave to the States only the special-privilege, severance, and sales taxes. While I do not believe in the sales tax as a just tax policy for any unit of government, it can certainly be more fairly administered as a Federal tax than as a local tax. The income tax is probably the most equitable of all taxes, but this field is already occupied by the Federal Government. Let us, then, divide the field of tax revenue and save the tremendous cost of overlapping and duplicating taxation. Let us leave to the Federal Government the right to collect the tariff and all income and sales taxes, and to the State governments the collection of all other special taxes, reserving to local governmental agencies the ad valorem revenue. It is much more expensive to require the States to collect $50,000,000, for instance, from the income tax and an additional $50,000,000 from gasoline taxes and have the Federal Government duplicate the process as to both taxes than it is to allow the States to collect their full $100,000,000 from the gasoline tax and the Federal Government to collect its full $100,000,000 from the income tax. The return to each government is just as great under the last plan as under the first. The burden to the taxpayer is not increased and at least one-half of the cost of collection is saved.

Furthermore, the income tax can be more equitably collected by the Federal Government than by any one or more States. The large incomes of the present day are not ordinarily produced in any one State. They are more likely to be the result of the exploitation of the resources of some "raw material" or "colonial" community than to be properly attributable to the locality where they are taxable.

We have developed to an appreciable degree the customary set-up of an economic empire. The fact that we are all living in one contiguous territory has tended to obscure the colonial-empire relationships. Certain great industrial and financial centers have assumed tremendous and, in my opinion, unwarranted importance in the control of the economic ife of the outlying communities.

As Dr. R. H. Montgomery, of the University of Texas, has often remarked, "Texas is the largest and incomparably the richest foreign colony owned by Manhattan." We are under the same flag. We exercise certain rights of political citizenship. We are, it is true, tremendously proud of our heritage of independence, of liberty, and of individual opportunity in Texas. But this cannot obscure the further fact that our economic, political, and social lives are to a very appreciable extent dominated by our colonial status, just as they are in most of the Southern and Western States.

It is of little significance that within our State is found by far the world's richest deposits of oil, natural gas, and sulfur. The ownership rights are vested in giant holding companies in the financial centers. The profits flow to these centers. If we are to have a satisfactory and smoothly functioning economic system, money income must be so distributed in the colonies that we may be able to buy the products and services of the industrial and financial centers.

In any great free-trade area, under our traditional economic order, money income tends to flow into the great financial centers from the outlying raw material producing areas. We must devise means for pumping this money back into the colonies if the system is to function. Obviously an income tax levied by the State of Texas would not touch the tremendous profits of our great natural-resources industries. The properties are in Texas. The cash profits are translated into income in New York and Pittsburgh.

The relationship between the physical properties of corporations engaged in the production of natural resources and the realization of profits therefrom and the problem of determining an equitable basis of taxation thereon when the one is so widely separated from the other in geographical distance is well illustrated by three classic examples from our own State.

Texas has an almost complete monopoly of sulfur. For a decade we produced about 98 percent of the American supply. In 1938 Texas produced 86 percent of the total sulfur produced in the United States, or 64.3 percent of all the sulfur produced in the world. Two companies controlled that production—both, of course, "foreign" owned and managed—both closely related by affinity, if not by consanguinity, not only with each other but each with one, although not the same, giant oil company, and all together exercising a tremendous political influence in Texas; nor have the Texas Co., a Delaware corporation, and Mr. Mellon's Gulf Co., interested themselves in brimstone simply because the process of production was interesting. It has paid a fair profit.

According to its own books, Texas Gulf Sulphur Co. had invested in its company in Texas—at least, it had common stock outstanding—to the amount of $6,350,000 in 1921. Entirely aside from the unnumbered millions which have been "plowed in" since that time, the company during the next 16 years paid in cash dividends on that common stock over 100 percent per year, a total of $103,952,500, and for one company alone; and in 1938 Texas collected only $1,766,288.04 from its sulfur tax on all companies.

Texas also owns the world's greatest reservoirs of natural gas—I should say the world's greatest reservoirs of natural gas are within the boundaries of Texas. The pieces of paper representing ownership lie in other jurisdictions. In 1938 Texas produced 1,099,678,000,000 (trillion) cubic feet of natural gas, of which 68 percent is reported to have been used in Texas; but when we consider that a large part of this gas was used in the manufacture of carbon black, which was ultimately sold in the industrial East, we realize that in the final analysis Texas' citizens and Texas' industry used relatively little of this great resource. In times past there was far more gas blown into the air in Texas than was produced in any other State, but since the great gas companies came to the conclusion that it would be self-serving to prevent this waste the State has passed conservation laws; but this wealth, as reflected in the profits, still escapes the Texas tax collector, and 137,196,000,000 (billion) cubic feet of natural gas was blown off into the air as waste last year. That is another tragic consequence of the "foreign" ownership and control of the industry.

There are 75 gas-pipe lines serving the industry from Texas. About half of these, all very tiny ones, are more or less owned in Texas. The others handle Texas gas in the interest of the stockholders of eastern corporations. The 20 largest lines, all foreign owned, handle in the neighborhood of 90 percent of the total production. The Lone Star Gas Corporation, of Delaware, owns 6 of these and does an annual business of nearly one-third of the total; Electric Bond & Share Corporation, of New York, owns 5 and does a little more than one-third of the business. Although the large foreign-owned lines have for years shown tremendous profits ranging well in excess of $25,000,000 per year, the State of Texas in 1938 collected only $631,191.97 in gross-receipts taxes from all natural and casinghead gas produced in the entire State.

Gas and sulfur fade into insignificance when compared with the value of the products of the Texas oil fields. Texas produces approximately 40 percent of the entire output of crude oil in the United States and almost one-fourth, 24 percent, of the world's total supply. And this in the face of the fact that the actual daily production as of October 1, 1939, was only 2,100,000 barrels, out of a potential daily production of more than 35,000,000 barrels.

Last year the value of Texas oil was more than three times, nearly four times, the value of her cotton crop and I am sure that you all know that Texas is the greatest of all cotton-producing States. The value of our oil at the well—approximately half of a billion dollars—was 60 percent greater than the total value of all our agricultural products, and Texas ranks first in the Union in the production of agricultural crops. We have over half a million individual farms. Over 2,700,000 people live on those farms. Over a million more live off those farms. The oil industry employs in Texas in all capacities, including the lobby at Austin, only about 200,000 people.

As in the case of natural gas, we have become entirely too efficient in producing oil. We are in danger of being drowned in a veritable flood of it, and we are still paying 18 cents a gallon for gasoline in Texas that sells for 15 cents in Washington, D. C. Of course, we are doing what we can to protect ourselves.

By choking down our flood of oil to a tiny trickle we have increased the price at the well by approximately $1 per barrel. We are producing 500,000,000 barrels per year. This means that the State of Texas has added around half a billion dollars per year to the income of the owners of these oil wells by governmental action. Would it be unreasonable for the State that created such values to ask the owners to share, say, 10 percent of their extra values with the Government that creates and maintains these values? I do not think this is an unfair request; yet back in 1936 when the Texas Legislature—of which I was then a member—increased the tax on crude oil to 2¾ cents per barrel, or to about 2¾ percent of its value, the oil lobby all shouted "confiscation." Yet the average farm will pay approximately this much on its value each year, and city property will pay twice that much. I own a little real property in Texas, and I would gladly pay a tax of 10 percent of its value at one time if I could thereby exempt it from all further taxation for all time to come, and that is just what the oil industry would be doing if it paid four times the production tax it is now paying. Under these circumstances, can it be said that a 10-percent tax on the value of crude oil, gas, and sulphur is inequitable? Certainly it is not out of line when compared with the tax bill of the masses of our people.

But the oil industry of Texas is not owned, Mr. Speaker, by the citizens of Texas. It is difficult to get a satisfactory figure on the ownership of oil wells. There are still a number of individual producers in Texas, and some of them are Texans, it is true, but their number is undoubtedly decreasing rapidly. It would not be understating it to say that 90 percent of all oil-producing properties of our State are owned by citizens of other jurisdictions.

When we consider pipe lines we have more adequate figures. There are 41 common carrier oil pipe lines serving Texas fields, almost all of them foreign-owned. The 18 largest companies handled approximately three-fourths of the total oil run. Yet one of these companies, which alone made a net income of $8,800,676 in 1 year, paid, according to the Governor's message to the Texas Legislature, only $95.77 taxes for the privilege of operating in Texas that year. These companies have been making around 25 percent yearly return on their investment, but the return is payable as income in Delaware or New York and Texas collected only a few thousand dollars as franchise tax from all of them.

Long ago the industrial States learned the gentle art of passing their taxes on to those communities, such as Texas, which produce raw materials and buy manufactured articles. It is true that those of you who have recently purchased automobiles found in the bill for your car no mention of a tax to the State of Michigan, but it was included in the manufacturer's costs and you paid it nevertheless. For years General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler have been very efficient tax-collecting agencies for the State of Michigan, and the taxes they have collected, while levied by that State against those companies, have been paid by the people of Texas and other "raw-material" States. The tax on automobile manufacturers is but an example—the same principle is followed by all of the manufacturing States of the world and we pay the bill. Nor can we of the "raw-material" States protect ourselves by the adoption of a like tax, because we do not manufacture any appreciable quantity of world necessities, but we do produce great quantities of indispensable basic natural resources that these same industrial States must have. Nor is there any good reason why the State of Texas should not constitute the exploiters of these resources, tax-collecting agencies for our own State, to collect from the people who finally use these resources a small sum to compensate our State for the loss of these irreplaceable assets.

A man may cultivate a farm for a hundred years, and, though he pays taxes each year, it will, if properly handled, lose none of its value. Not so with oil, gas, or sulphur. When taken from our soil these resources pay taxes in our State only one time, and the State then loses their value and is forever that much poorer. Once removed, these resources move into other States and may enrich New York stockholders, but never again will they contribute to the support of our Texas institutions.

In this connection it is interesting to note the difference between the farmer and the miner. These two are often carelessly spoken of together as being producer of raw materials or new wealth. It is true that both farmers and miners make new wealth in the form of raw material available to industry, but only the farmer and stockman "produce" new wealth. The farmer creates usable goods, and if he is a good farmer, repeats the process over and over again on the same land. The miner and well driller create nothing that did not already exist in the soil. He merely removes the minerals that God placed there. Neither the oil nor the sulphur drawn off this year can be grown again next year on the same land as could a crop of cotton or corn. The cultivation of our farms adds to the total wealth of the world. The operation of our oil wells but depletes our reserves.

Not all States, Mr. Speaker, have the opportunity to care for their local needs by a reasonable tax on natural resources, as does the State of Texas. A tax of only 10 percent of the value of oil, gas, and sulfur would, at present prices and at the present rate of production, produce well over $50,000,000 per year. With that amount of money Texas could and should abandon her State ad valorem tax entirely, pay the existing State deficit, and care for a reasonably liberal system of old-age pensions. Everyone familiar with the financial condition of the State knows that some such source of revenue must be found, and if we do not levy a natural-resource tax we will very probably fall victim to a general sales tax, which will take the full amount of the tax levy out of the channels of trade, which will burden the people least able to pay, reduce the purchasing power and employment, and subject honest Texas dealers to unfair out-of-State and mail-order competition, and involve the State and Federal Governments in additional and needless disputes.

On the other hand, if we collect the money by a natural-resource tax, we will actually bring new money into Texas. A natural-resource tax must obviously either be paid by the producers and be taken out of profits—stockholders' dividends—or it must be added to the cost and passed on to the ultimate consumer of the product. The oil and sulfur companies claim that the stockholders would have to absorb the tax. If this were true—and I do not think anyone believes it is—it must be admitted that most of the stock is owned beyond the borders of the State, and therefore the tax would be paid by foreign stockholders. If, however, the tax is added to the cost of the retail product, as it will undoubtedly be the final consumer will pay the bill; and where does this consumer live? More than 85 percent of all Texas oil and probably around 99 percent of all Texas sulfur is ultimately consumed outside of the State, so even if every dollar of tax is passed on to the ultimate consumer, as it will be, the citizens of Texas will only pay approximately $5,000,000 of the $50,000,000 which a 10-percent natural-resource tax would produce. On the other hand, it would bring in $45,000,000 of outside money into the State. The tax should be imposed for this reason if for no other.

Let me pause here, Mr. Speaker, to answer the two objections that have undoubtedly already suggested themselves to your mind. They are, of course, first, the question, Will not such a tax result in a loss of markets for Texas oil to oil produced elsewhere, particularly in Oklahoma and California?, and, second, Will not such a tax seriously cripple the small or marginal producer? These questions are both pertinent and both deserve a fair answer. Taking the second question first, my answer is that we should probably give the marginal producer an advantage in tax. This was done in the natural-resource tax bill which I introduced in the Texas Senate while a member of that body in the fall of 1936. In that bill I proposed to tax oil produced from marginal wells only 5 percent of its value, as compared with a general tax of 10 percent. The term "marginal well" has long been defined by our Texas laws and our courts have upheld the right of the legislature to classify these wells and to impose different requirements on large and small producers. These marginal wells include all small producers, the maximum production varying with the depth of the well. The tax I proposed would have abolished all State ad valorem taxes on all property, including, of course, property used in production, as the well and the lease, which in some counties of the State exceeds 5 cents on each barrel of oil produced.

The increase in production tax on marginal wells would only be approximately 2¼ cents per barrel, so that the small producers would actually get a reduction of net as well as of gross taxation. According to the Railroad Commission of Texas, there were on October 1, 1939, a total of 88,934 oil wells in the State. Of this number, 35,758, or 40.18 percent, were marginal, and while they were allowed to produce to capacity while some of the other wells were restricted to a small fraction of their potential production, the entire number of marginal wells produced only 125,093 barrels daily in the year of 1938, or 5.9 percent of the total of the State's production. Therefore we could give these small producers an actual reduction in their taxes and at the same time we would not materially jeopardize the total revenue to the State by extending a 5-percent rate to the marginal wells. These marginal wells are the ones that are most generally owned locally and are entitled to a preferential treatment in order that they may not be abandoned and the ultimate recovery reduced and laborers thrown out of employment.

The answer to the question of loss of markets merely requires that we consider the location of our oil reserves with reference to the markets of the world. Three States produce more than three-fourths of all of the oil of the United States. They are: Texas, with a production of 39.2 percent of the Nation's total; Oklahoma, with 14.4 percent; and California, with 20.6 percent. There is no other State that could supplant these three in supplying the Nation's need because no other State produces enough oil. Not only does Texas produce more oil than both of her two nearest rivals combined, but our production is so located with reference to the markets of the world that Texas oil can reach these markets more cheaply than oil produced from either of our competitors.

We must bear in mind that the cost of a barrel of oil, when delivered in the markets of the world, either on the Atlantic seaboard or in Europe, includes not only the cost of production—drilling, leases, royalty, and so forth—but it includes as well the transportation charges incurred in getting it to market. There is no difference in production costs in the three States that can be related to State lines. Of course some wells cost more than others, but this difference in cost exists within each State and not between States.

We must then look at the cost of transportation to determine whether Texas oil could stand a higher tax than it now carries. Mr. Speaker, oil moves, as does any other commodity, most cheaply by deep water, and it is by deep water that Texas oil reaches the markets of the world. Both Texas and California enjoy the benefits of ocean rates at their very doors or wells. The cost of putting oil to shipside is about the same in the two States, but according to the American Petroleum Institute it has heretofore cost approximately 46 cents per barrel to move a barrel of oil by tanker from the port of Los Angeles to New York, while the same authority quotes the rate from Port Arthur, Tex., to New York at 14 cents. The Department of Commerce advises me that since the outbreak of the European war the shipping charges have increased to around 30 cents per barrel from any Gulf port to New York, and that there is now no movement of oil from Los Angeles. This means, under normal conditions, that Texas oil can be delivered in New York for approximately 32 cents per barrel less than California oil, and that even with a 10-cent tax Texas oil could be sold in New York at 22 cents per barrel less than California oil with no tax.

As to Oklahoma, the difference is equally striking. Oklahoma oil must move through Texas ports, and while it is, of course, true that after reaching the port the cost of transportation to the world markets is the same as that of Texas oil, there is a very decided difference in the cost of putting it to the port. I have in my office the published tariffs of several of the large common-carrier pipe-line companies, who operate in both Texas and Oklahoma. These tariffs show that it costs a minimum of 25 cents per barrel pipe-line charges to move a barrel of oil from any Oklahoma field to Port Arthur or Houston. There is also a minimum gathering charge of 10 cents per barrel on all Oklahoma oil. To this must be added a tax of 5 cents per barrel now levied and collected by the State of Oklahoma. This makes a total of 40 cents overhead on each barrel of Oklahoma oil before it starts its ocean voyage. On the other hand, these same tariffs show that in the East Texas field, which represents the bulk of Texas production and a fair average of transportation costs in our State, the pipelines rates are 12½ cents per barrel, plus a 5-cent gathering charge, which, with a 10 cents per barrel tax, would make a total overhead at shipside of only 27½ cents per barrel, or 12½ cents per barrel less than for Oklahoma oil.

The only other American State that can possibly compete with Texas is Louisiana, which only accounts for 7.8 percent of American production, and, while their freight rates compare favorably with our own—they are now identical—their production is small and they now levy a tax on oil production ranging up to 11 cents per barrel, dependent upon the gravity of the oil, and averaging in excess of 8 cents per barrel. And this tax has not destroyed the oil industry of Louisiana.

Another favorite criticism of the oil lobby to this tax is their long-whiskered plea that "the oil industry pays half the taxes of Texas anyway." In arriving at these figures they take credit for the $40,000,000 realized from the 4-cent gasoline tax which my State collects, just as most of other States do, and of which every cent is paid by the ultimate consumer. In fact, in their own reports to their stockholders these great oil companies do not claim to pay any gasoline tax, but simply report it as "gasoline taxes collected for States." When this item is eliminated it is readily seen that the great oil industry, which takes so many multiplied millions from Texas, leaves a very meager sum in Texas in the form of taxes. Nor do the financial reports of the companies to their stockholders show that they are paying any great amount of tax to any State. The annual report of Standard Oil Co. of New York—now known as Socony Vacuum Oil Co.—issued to its stockholders in May 1939 shows that the assets of that giant corporation were last year $923,428,918.30, but the same report shows that it paid in taxes of all kinds the sum of only $23,643,001.30, including both Federal and State income and property and miscellaneous taxes, or about 2.5 percent on the value of its assets. It hardly bears out the claim that the oil companies are overtaxed. Other great oil companies show even smaller taxes paid. The Texas Corporation, which is Texas only in name, shows assets of $605,360,644.26, and "taxes for the year 1938, excluding State gasoline and Federal excise taxes, were $13,484,654.44," or 2.2 percent total tax on the property owned, including all income taxes. The figures for the Gulf Oil Corporation are about the same. I cannot understand, Mr. Speaker, how any citizen of Texas who is paying around 5 percent of the value of his property in ad valorem taxes can for a moment ever consider the advisability of further burdening himself and his neighbors with a sales tax, while these great foreign-owned corporations are escaping with such an insignificant levy; but we have many unexplainable inconsistencies in our tax system in Texas. It is, however, interesting to note that none of the mistakes of our taxing system have ever been made against the interests of the oil companies. I take it that is a tribute to the ability and industry of the oil lobby that fills the hotels of Austin.

Under our present laws, Mr. Speaker, Texas takes from her own citizens from 30 to 45 times as much in the way of taxes if they consume or use a barrel of Texas oil as the State takes in taxes if the same barrel of oil is used beyond our borders. If the oil is produced in east Texas and shipped to Washington, D. C., in either its crude or refined condition, the State of Texas receives a gross-production tax of approximately 2¾ cents and no more. If, on the other hand, the same oil should be refined in Texas, that barrel will give labor to Texas citizens and will produce under average conditions 19 gallons of gasoline. If the most modern methods of refining are used, a barrel of oil may produce 29 gallons of gasoline. If the gasoline is sold in Texas by Texas dealers to Texas citizens, the State takes not only the 2¾ cents production tax but a tax of 4 cents per gallon on the gasoline, or a total of from 78¾ cents to $1.22¾.

The major portion of the value of our Texas resources is the gift of Providence augmented by the action of the State, and only a very small portion of this value can be attributed to the ingenuity or industry of the great corporations which appropriate the profits. A natural resource, or any other commodity, the major portion of which is consumed outside the State, should carry all the tax it can without putting it at a disadvantage in the markets of the world. It does not cost any more to produce a natural resource in Texas than elsewhere; therefore capital invested here can return to the State a large part of the profits accruing from our favorable location and still enjoy greater profits than in other States.

It is trite to say that our present social, economic, and political structure is characterized by continual change. It is self-evident that these changes call for new solutions of old problems. We can defer our thinking on these things for a time, but the responsibility remains. Only real statesmanship can enact adequate legislation. The answer that undoubtedly suggests itself to many minds is "Federal control"—"Federal taxation"—and I must confess that I can see no other possibility if the greatest oil-producing State in the Union is to continue to "break the market" with its tax system and to "undersell" its competitors. Not for long can the oil companies, powerful though they are, continue to play one State against the other and prevent any of the great natural resource producing States from subjecting them to fair tax burdens. If the oil companies persist in their present policy of forcing a sales tax on States like Texas in lieu of a reasonable natural resource tax, they cannot long expect the support of States like Louisiana or even Oklahoma where severance taxes are two or three times as great as in Texas in their fight against Federal control. And with Federal control will come Federal severance taxes.

Mr. Speaker, for years the oil companies have had things very much their own way as far as taxation was concerned in my State, but I believe that I can see the light of a new day in the eastern sky. As that day dawns those exploiters of our natural resources must choose whether they will cooperate with the people of Texas in the support of our State government, of our schools, of our aged, or whether they will continue to insist on the special privileges and tax exemptions that they have so long enjoyed, and subject themselves to the rigors of Federal control and taxation which will not enrich our State, but which will leave them poor, indeed. The choice, Mr. Speaker, is with those who have grown great and rich on the resources of my State. I hope that their choice may be one of cooperation with the people who have done so much for them.

The Reciprocal Trade-Agreements Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, restoration of our trade with foreign countries was one of the vital problems affecting our domestic economy when the present administration in Washington came to power. Secretary of State Cordell Hull had pioneered zealously for a more liberal commercial foreign policy, and his efforts bore fruit in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act passed by the Congress of the United States on June 12, 1934, after careful study of all pertinent facts. The act authorizes the President to negotiate with foreign governments for the reciprocal modification of excessive and uneconomical tariff rates. By such a procedure freer access to the markets of the world is provided for the products of our agriculture and industry, while at the same time our American markets for domestic products are safeguarded with adequate tariff protection. Our domestic prosperity is so closely related to foreign trade that permanent rehabilitation of our agriculture and industry is in a very great degree dependent upon restoration of our international trade.

The exigencies of the World War stimulated the building of our productive capacity far in excess of our normal peacetime requirements. Europe, whose production was greatly curtailed as a result of the war, was left heavily burdened with billions of dollars in foreign debts and the urgent necessity of obtaining by a redevelopment of their former foreign markets the foreign exchange necessary for the servicing and the payment of those debts, as well as for the rehabilitation of its own productive facilities. During the period of reconstruction following the war, we were able for a time—during the 1920's—to maintain our foreign markets by lending billions of dollars to European governments to pay for our products instead of increasing our imports from Europe as a means of payment for our exports. The prosperity which resulted from such a trade was artificial and fundamentally unsound. Trade cannot continue to flow in one direction indefinitely.

Proponents of excessively high tariff barriers fail to recognize the far reaching disruptive effect that a policy of economic nationalism has on domestic prosperity. The United States has experienced the bitter results of such a policy. Under the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act, enacted in 1930, tariff rates were raised to embargo levels. Foreign countries with which we normally carried on prosperous trade finding our markets barred to them and seeing their gold reserves gradually being depleted in a degree to seriously affect the stability of their currency quickly retaliated with such restrictive trade measures as import quotas, import licenses, compensation agreements, foreign-exchange control, and clearing agreements.

In the period following enactment of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act our foreign trade dropped to a fraction of its former level. Exports of American products dropped from $5,241,000,000 to $1,611,000,000 between 1929 and 1932. The economic repercussions resulting from such a severe loss of trade adversely affected the well-being of every community in the Nation. Industries, finding their sales in our customary foreign markets dropping off to a mere driblet, took the only escape open to them—curtailed production, lay-off of workers, and reduction in salaries. In the case of agriculture the adjustment in the face of a weakened and restricted demand for its products was made in drastically lowered prices, although substantially maintaining its volume of production. Agriculture was thus adversely affected in two ways—first, by restricted exports, and, second, by severely reduced industrial pay rolls undermining effective demand for farm products in home markets.

Since our capacity to produce has been developed to an extent to meet the requirements of world markets and since our high standard of living has been largely due to that fact, restoration of world trade is absolutely essential to our domestic prosperity. In pursuance of that objective, the Government is seeking, through the medium of reciprocal modification of the barriers which in the past few years have blockaded foreign markets, to open the avenues to foreign markets. This is being accomplished by direct negotiation with foreign governments.

Revival of world trade securely planted on a firm foundation of permanent stability cannot be accomplished with spectacular speed. The difficult and complex problems arising in connection with the reciprocal modification of trade barriers require considerable time for negotiation. Negotiation is essentially a long, slow process. Intricate problems arising in the course of negotiation require careful examination and analysis.

Restoration of foreign commerce and the benefits resulting from the increased marketing opportunities obtained through reciprocal-trade agreements are not enjoyed alone by those branches of our agriculture and industry dependent on foreign markets but, because they result in a net increase in trade and stimulate increased production, are also shared by all the other enterprises making up our national economy.

In a world in which certain countries are struggling to establish economic nationalism and attain self-sufficiency, the United States is demonstrating that the way to economic prosperity is through more abundant foreign trade. The progress being made by the reciprocal trade agreements program in restoring our foreign markets is clearly indicated by the following study recently made by the Department of Commerce.

United States foreign trade with trade-agreement countries and with all others, 1937–38 compared with 1934–35

[Value in millions of dollars]

	1934 and 1935 average value	1937 and 1938 average value	Change
			Value	Percent
UNITED STATES EXPORTS, INCLUDING REEXPORTS
Total, all trade-agreement countries [1]	759.8	1,224.8	+465.0	+61.2
Total, all nonagreement countries	1,448.0	1,996.8	+548.8	+37.9
Total, all countries	2,207.8	3,221.6	+1,013.8	+45.9
UNITED STATES GENERAL IMPORTS
Total, all trade-agreement countries [1]	793.9	1,073.6	+279.7	+35.2
Total, all nonagreement countries	1,057.4	1,448.5	+391.1	+37.0
Total, all countries	1,851.3	2,522.1	+670.8	+36.2

[1] Including the 17 countries (and colonies) with which agreements were in operation during the greater part of the last 12 months. Only 1 of the agreements was in operation throughout 1935, 6 throughout 1936, 12 by the middle of 1936, 15 by the middle of 1937, and 18 by the end of 1938. The last (with Ecuador) only came into force on Oct. 23, 1938, and is therefore not yet included in the above calculations as an agreement country. The new agreement with Canada, and the agreement with the United Kingdom (including Newfoundland and non-self-governing British colonies) which became effective Jan. 1, 1939, and the agreement with Turkey, effective on May 5, 1939, bring the number to 20.

Common Sense Wins

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

EDITORIAL BY FELIX MORLEY

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I have heard and read many speeches and editorials on the different phases and aspects of neutrality, but I believe that the editorial of November 3, 1939, by Mr. Felix Morley, editor of the Washington Post, entitled "Common Sense Wins," is one of the most lucidly informative I have yet had the pleasure of reading. It is one of the very best that Mr. Morley has written on neutrality, and because of its interest and value at this time I desire to call it to the attention of the House. I quote:

[From the Washington Post of November 3, 1939]

Those who wished to see the arms embargo retained set great store by the House vote. In spite of the smashing Senate verdict for repeal they were optimistic right up to the balloting yesterday afternoon. It was argued that the House, subject to complete replacement every 2 years, would be more responsive to propaganda than the Senate. And nobody knows the strength of the propaganda against repeal better than those who were made its victims.

The large majorities by which the bill was yesterday hastened to final passage therefore possess a significance even greater than that of the legislation now happily on the verge of enactment. They show that the House is no less a deliberative body than the Senate. They show that Congress as a body cannot be stampeded by feverishly whipped-up pressures. Those ballots yesterday show, in short, that the American system of representative government is still functioning. Our democracy has not yet degenerated into mob rule.

Unquestionably the great majority of those who opposed embargo repeal did so with perfect sincerity. But the arguments used by this side were for the most part emotional rather than rational. Without a scintilla of effective evidence it was asserted that repeal is of itself likely to involve the United States, to prolong the war, to "put the blood of millions on our heads," as a group of self-styled "peace organizations" asserted no later than yesterday. This sort of outcry is virtually hysteria.

What the legislation actually does has been almost lost to sight amid the shrieks and shouts, the groans and moans, with which it has been enveloped. Actually the United States is about to put into effect a sweeping self-denying ordinance, scrapping the doctrine of the freedom of the seas, abandoning traditional and unquestionable neutral rights, all for the sake of strengthening the safeguards against war. As a small offset to this wholesale surrender the administration is mildly reasserting the right of American nationals to sell munitions, provided they are bought for cash and shipped in foreign bottoms.

Because there is a point at which the country does not propose to surrender its sovereignty in behalf of belligerents a furious and wholly emotional storm has been whipped up by organizations whose antecedents are in some cases of dubious character. The pacifist propaganda is understandable. There are some people, and they are wholly honest, who would rather see the United States destroyed than take arms to defend it. The complete isolationist viewpoint is also understandable. But these and other honorable groups alone did not account for all the sound and fury of the embargo advocates.

Included in the strange line-up against repeal were all the Communists, all the bund adherents, all the quasi-Fascist groups, all the professional Anglophobes. Together they made a formidable if chaotic assortment, sufficiently numerous to bring to their side many of the disillusioned, the ignorant, the credulous, and the self-seeking. Not by reasoning, but merely from its own momentum, the embargo movement gained many adherents who could not have advanced a single cogent argument against repeal.

Like "ham and eggs" in California a movement of this sort, partly emotional, partly wishful, and partly self-seeking, can easily become a serious problem for a democracy. The effective arguments—legal, moral, patriotic, and economic—always favored repeal. But it almost seemed for a time that common sense might be overwhelmed and the vital congressional function of analysis subordinated to an essentially ridiculous mass emotionalism.

That danger has happily been averted. But, it was more threatening to the United States than any of the bogies conjured up by the opponents of repeal.

Proposed Neutrality Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WADE H. KITCHENS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, it is said that the decision we are to make on whether or not to lift the embargo on arms, munitions, and implements of war in the present Neutrality Act is most important. In my opinion, it will be a momentous decision.

Are we to decide that every nation, both great and small, is to isolate itself and be self-dependent for means of defense? If so, the only alternative is for every nation hereafter to devote its energies, resources, and the ingenuity of its people to building up a great military machine for self-defense. Japan, Russia, Italy, and Germany today are military nations, and are aggressor nations, and have millions and millions of their citizens armed for the purpose of aggression. They are devoting all of their energies and resources to the formation of absolute dictatorial and aggressive military nations under military lords and masters. If the neutral nations are to surrender their rights to furnishing each other supplies and means of defense, then we have the most serious situation confronting us today, and the most important that was ever presented to the American people or to the people of any other peaceful nation, or to mankind since the time of recorded history.

It certainly is understood that the United States Government will not sell one dime's worth of arms, munitions, or implements of war to any nation, nor will it loan or furnish one dime for any nation to purchase arms and munitions.

It was Stephen Decatur, a little more than a century ago, who said:

> Our country! In her intercourse with foreign nations may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong!

There is nothing wrong with the statement of Stephen Decatur when it comes to patriotism or love of country. However, I prefer to quote at this time one of America's distinguished statesmen, a former member of the Senate of the United States, a man born of German parents near Cologne, Germany. I refer to Hon. Carl Schurz, who, in 1872 in the Senate in this Capitol, said:

> Our country, right or wrong! When right to be kept right; when wrong, to be put right!

Not a single Member of this House has ever said that he favored aggressor nations or their dictators. On the contrary, all of those who oppose repeal of the arms-embargo provision of our Neutrality Act state they hate dictators, militarists, and aggressors and love peace and peaceful people.

Some Members oppose repeal, not upon the merits, but on the ground that after war starts, to repeal the embargo provision would be an unneutral act. In other words, we have been caught with a domestic enactment that works wrongfully and unjustly, but due to circumstances over which we have no control we are not to correct a wrong or to "put ourselves right," as Carl Schurz would say. They state that it will be unneutral to change the rules of the game after the game starts. The trouble about this reasoning is it is not our game, we are not a party thereto, and had nothing to do with the origin of the game. We were not consulted as to rules nor asked to make rules for the game of war that is now being played. If we should venture to suggest some rules to govern the conduct of the war or game, if you like, it would be deemed impertinent by the parties playing the game. That war is not our war, and we are merely making rules to govern our own conduct, and not the conduct of others, so we can be fair and honorable and not be wrongfully aiding by law the perpetration of injustice.

Mr. Speaker, I stated we were not responsible for this war in Europe. However, I feel that our arms embargo encouraged the beginning of the war.

The leader of those opposing repeal—and I refer to the gentleman from New York, Hon. HAMILTON FISH—has vigorously fought repeal on the ground that it would make us a party to the war and put us immediately into the war. He was so sincere in his belief that he organized, in May of this year, a sort of rump congress composed of 36 Republicans and 1 Democrat. This select committee and, so far as most of the Members are concerned, a secret committee placed themselves upon a high pedestal of morality and patriotism and took an attitude, possibly innocent, against all the other Members of Congress. It is well known that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has an unquenchable hatred of the President. He is ranking member of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House and chairman of the delegation to attend the Interparliamentary Union at Oslo, Norway, this year.

He went to Europe on his way to Oslo and there assumed and arrogated to himself the functions of our State Department and of our President in foreign affairs. He nominated and appointed himself, it seems to me, as a sort of Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, and proceeded to seek consultations and conferences with the Nazi leaders of Germany. Notoriety and publicity hampered his negotiations. He advised them that the Versailles Treaty should be scrapped and that Germany should have Danzig and the corridor to Prussia. He no doubt assured these leaders of his position and of the great efforts he would make to prevent any nation, great or small, which Germany might attack from obtaining arms, munitions, or implements of war from the United States. In other words, he had organized to hold the embargo in our law. In my opinion, these Nazi leaders were encouraged to proceed and take Danzig and destroy Poland. Therefore unofficially the war might be called, in a way, of our own making. The gentleman from New York and his committee of 36 was going to ask funds from every source available with which to defeat a repeal of the arms embargo and, as they claim, prevent America from becoming involved in any war. I sometimes wonder why the lone Democrat was induced to become a member, but probably for the purpose of prestige and making it bipartisan or nonpartisan, as the case may be.

Mr. Speaker, I have studied international law. I am fairly familiar with the great work of Hugo Grotius. He is recognized by all nations and by all men of legal learning as the founder of international law. As a basis for neutrality 300 years ago, Hugo Grotius set forth the following premise:

> It is the duty of those who profess neutrality in war to do nothing toward increasing the strength of a party maintaining an unjust cause, nor to impede the measures of a power engaged in a just and righteous cause.

It is my humble opinion that the provision in our neutrality law for an embargo on arms and munitions, admitted to be in derogation of the common law of nations and contrary to the policies of peaceful nations for 300 years, increases the strength of militaristic nations and helps them to maintain an unjust cause. It must be admitted that the embargo provision of our Neutrality Act impedes the measures of any peaceful, nonaggressize power or powers engaged in a just and righteous cause. On the floor of this House it is almost unanimous that Germany is engaged in an unjust cause. It must be admitted that England and France are impeded while engaged in a just and righteous cause of defense against military aggressors engaged in destroying nations.

I have listened to many speeches made upon this proposed Neutrality Act. I have listened to the opponents of repeal denouncing the Versailles Treaty—denouncing our entrance into the World War. I have listened to them as they have detailed the horrors of war. I have listened to them wail and almost weep while describing the destruction of human beings, the mangling of men, and the killing of women and children, and of towns plastered with brains and blood—of men running in all directions, wildly, insane, with eyes bulging from their sockets. I have listened to them describe wounded men lying on the ground, biting their nails and the ground. I have listened to them tell of little children holding up whimperingly the stumps of their arms in appeal to their mothers who were dead. I have listened to such nauseating yet true descriptions, and wondered why people do not stop and think—why some of us in Congress do not think.

Mr. Speaker, from 1914 to 1918, 1,357,000 fine young Frenchmen were killed by being shot down, blown to pieces, or poisoned with gas; over 900,000 young Englishmen were shot down or blown to pieces; over 650,000 fine young Italian men were destroyed; 1,700,000 young Russians were shot to death; 335,000 young Rumanian men were slaughtered; 126,000 fine young Americans were killed or died of disease; 44,000 of them were mangled, arms and legs shot off, eyes shot out, face disfigured; and our hospitals today are filled with thousands of these young Americans. Hospitals of England, France, Italy, Russia, Rumania are likewise filled with men disabled by rifles, machine guns, bombs, and poison gas. Belgium was overrun and thousands upon thousands of her people were killed. The homes of millions were blown from the face of the earth. Mr. Speaker, I ask you, Who killed all of those millions of young men of France, England, Italy, Russia, Rumania, and the United States? I ask you, Who caused all the misery, suffering, and heartaches of millions of young men who have been languishing in our hospitals for the last 25 years? Do I need tell you it was a dictatorial Germany? Yet I hear Members of Congress denouncing the Versailles Treaty. Who caused the Versailles Treaty? In proportion to the horrible crimes and injustice committed by Germany from 1914 to November 11, 1918, that treaty was too benevolent.

Mr. Speaker, during the present war in Europe I have seen the pictures, read accounts, and know that millions of little children, women, sick people, and old people have been forced from their homes and country. I ask you, Who caused that? Germany has even now destroyed her former ally, Austria, murdered her premier and thousands of Austrians, and took by force the Austrian Government and destroyed it; and yet Austria sacrificed 1,200,000 of her young men to aid Germany in the killing and destruction I have mentioned. Germany has recently, by force and threats of destruction, due to her great military might, destroyed Czechoslovakia, a peaceful country, a democratic country. Germany likewise has destroyed Poland and thousands upon thousands of her citizens unjustly. Women and children were bombed and slaughtered and hundreds of thousands of the citizens of Poland were forced to flee their country with a few belongings, and are now in refuge in other countries.

Mr. Speaker, the man at the head of Germany recently celebrated the German victory over the Poles, a nation of 35,000,000 people. After the destruction of Poland, Herr Hitler went in triumphant procession to the city of Warsaw, the capital of Poland, and there boasted of his might and power and, in the presence of the mortified bodies of women and children in the ruins of Warsaw, boasted that other nations would receive the same fate if they did not submit to his dictation and subjugation.

Mr. Speaker, it is said that only England and France will be able to purchase arms and munitions from the United States. It is said that these arms, munitions, and planes will be used to kill innocent children and women. No; I cannot be convinced they will purchase arms and munitions for any such purpose. I believe they will purchase arms and munitions to stop aggressors, vandals, and murderers. I believe they will purchase arms and munitions to prevent women and children, and the women and children of small countries, from being bombed and murdered and their countries overrun by military aggressors. I know when we were in France in 1917 and 1918 we were not engaged in killing babies, children, or women, but madmen. We were engaged in stopping the wanton killing of millions of human beings, and the preservation of our civilization.

Mr. Speaker, I am not going to vote to repeal the arms embargo in our Neutrality Act because of sentiment. I am going to vote to repeal it so that this country of ours will do nothing toward increasing the strength of a party maintaining an unjust cause, and so that this country may not impede the measures of a power or powers engaged in a just and righteous cause.

Hugo Grotius, in his great work on international law, further said:

> It frequently happens that it is an act of greater piety and rectitude to yield a right than to enforce it.

From the foundation of this Government until the present time this Nation has insisted upon the freedom of the seas. We went to war in 1917 because Germany ruthlessly destroyed, without warning or mercy, many of our ships engaged in lawful commerce under international law. Our hospital ships bearing medical supplies to the wounded, diseased, and sick were wantonly sunk. We fought to prevent such destruction of our rights on the high seas. Today we are yielding for the present some of our rights on the seas, and, according to Grotius, we are doing an act of piety and rectitude rather than plunge our country into war again. We are today, under the proposed act, preventing any American ship carrying any supplies or any article whatsoever, of any kind or description, to any of the fighting nations, and we are preventing them from going into danger zones. There can be no more sinking of American ships, as was done in 1916 and 1917, for the reason our ships will bear no arms, no munitions, and no supplies to either of the belligerents, and our ships will not go into any war or danger zones. We will even cease allowing our ships to go to neutrals like Holland in the sincere desire to avoid war.

Mr. Speaker, I shall cast my vote so as to enable peaceful nations to defend their homes, liberty, people, and prevent the killing of their citizens. I do not want our Nation to become a military nation and be burdened hereafter with four or five million soldiers and an enormous fleet. I do not wish other peaceful nations to be forced to become militaristic and be burdened with the cost of armaments; but, as surely as we live, unless dictators are checked in their efforts to dominate the world, it will be necessary for each nation to become militaristic. All small nations will be destroyed. Belgium, Holland, Finland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and Switzerland are today in great terror. They are gravely threatened and forced in order to defend their homes and people to bare their breasts at their borders against the greatest military machine on this earth.

I shall vote upon this proposed measure, as I see it, to prevent the spilling of innocent blood and the ruthless destruction of human beings, their homes, churches, liberty, and peaceful nations. I shall vote in the interest of the people of the United States, of the people of the American Continent, and of all peaceful, Christian nations in this world. My vote will be against militarism and dictators, and in favor of Americanism and the American form of government.

The Town That Wouldn't Admit Defeat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT G. ALLEN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ARTICLE FROM NATION'S BUSINESS

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under authority given me to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to insert a story from Nation's Business with the title "A Town That Wouldn't Admit Defeat." This town of Scottdale lies in my congressional district, and I am naturally proud that the fight which our citizens have waged against overwhelming economic obstacles has merited the attention of such a publication as Nation's Business. I am proud of Scottdale and of what it has accomplished. The following story clearly indicates that the morale of our people is high, and that they are determined to solve their own problems locally insofar as they are able. After all, it is such spirit as this which will preserve our country as the greatest democracy in the world and which will insure to succeeding generations the same blessings which have been ours.

The article follows:

[From Nation's Business for November 1939]

A TOWN THAT WOULDN'T ADMIT DEFEAT

(By Francis McQuillin)

"What would you do if you were a businessman in a community where industrial inactivity has caused 90 percent of the population to be unemployed for 3 years; where 40 percent of the available business sites are vacant; where a Federal Emergency Relief Administration representative classed us as being the second hardest hit town in the United States?"

Such was the opening paragraph of a letter signed by the Scottdale (Pa.) Board of Trade and sent to President Roosevelt April 20, 1934.

When a board of trade reaches the point where it publicly acknowledges that its community is economically next to the worst in the country, its plight must be desperate. In April 1934 Scottdale's plight was desperate.

Founded in 1873 as a rural outpost on the newly constructed southwest branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad, whose president, Col. Thomas A. Scott, it was named for, the borough of Scottdale soon became an active shipping point for a rich agricultural section. With the development of the surrounding bituminous coal fields and the growing beehive coke industry centered at Connellsville a few miles away, Scottdale quickly became a thriving industrial center.

Scottdale's earliest industry was the McKinney blast furnace, which turned ore from a nearby mine into pig iron, using coke from the local ovens. In 1877 Scottdale citizens organized a steel sheet mill which was later destined to become an important unit in the American Sheet & Tin Plate Co. In 1882 Henry Clay Frick founded the H. C. Frick Coal & Coke Co., which became a subsidiary of the United States Steel, with headquarters at Scottdale. The Foundry & Supply Co. was established in 1884. Two years later local interests organized the United States Pipe & Foundry Co. Although the population was never more than 10,000, Scottdale became a miniature boom town.

During the prosperous war years and the lean years which followed, Scottdale's industries continued to flourish and new ones sprang up. The original sheet mill was supplemented by a more modern and larger plant, and the two mills became important units in the American Sheet & Tin Plate Co. From its small beginnings, the pipe foundry developed into the world's largest manufacturer of cast-iron pipe. A modern Y. M. C. A. building was constructed, many new churches were established, new streets were laid out and quickly lined with modern houses, schools were built, bank deposits swelled to $9,000,000, and a country club was started. In 1928 a progressive group of businessmen formed the Scottdale Board of Trade. That same year 43 high-school graduates out of a class of seventy-three went on to college. Scottdale's future seemed assured.

PAY LINES REPLACED BY BREAD LINES

Then came the crash. The Scottdale sheet mill closed, leaving 1,200 men jobless. Another 1,000 workers were left without a source of income when the pipe foundry closed. Managements of both companies had done all they could to keep these plants going. They had built up huge stock piles to make work, they had reduced prices, but orders had ceased to come in. After the plants closed they transferred as many workers as possible to other plants.

Long lines of workers waiting for pay envelopes soon gave place to bread lines. Banks closed, businesses failed, among them some of Scottdale's pioneers. One of two movie houses was boarded up, the other played to a half empty house 2 nights a week. The bright lights of Pittsburgh Street, the borough's principal thoroughfare, faded. In their place appeared an ever lengthening row of darkened store windows framing "for rent" signs. A padlock hung from the doors of the Y. M. C. A. In June Scottdale High graduated 106, but only 12 could afford to go on to college. Eight out of every ten Scottdale citizens were on relief.

Members of Scottdale's Board of Trade spent many hours in conference with officials of closed plants in efforts to get these plants reopened. Representatives called on Congressmen, wrote to Gen. Hugh Johnson, who then headed the N. R. A.

The pipe company's executives were sympathetic but powerless to help. They had another plant in the South which could produce at lower cost than the northern plant. A change in freight rates also favored the southern foundry. Anyway, there was little market for cast-iron pipe. From the Steel Corporation officials the board heard a similar story:

"We would like to help Scottdale, but there is only enough business to operate two or three of the corporation's smaller mills. Scottdale's sheet mill is large and unfitted to supply hand-to-mouth buyers. If national prosperity were restored, then the plant would be reopened."

As the depression dragged on, conditions grew worse. Tax collections which had reached $200,000 in 1929, dwindled. There was not enough money in the borough's cash drawer to meet the bills for essential public services. Street lights were reduced to a minimum, fire protection was severely curtailed, while the handful of citizens who could still afford automobiles bounced and jolted over streets long in need of repair. Having exhausted every resource, the board of trade dissolved.

Scottdale had in truth become a ghost town.

For the country at large, business revival seemed to start slowly but surely late in 1935 but not for Scottdale which had two huge white elephants on its hands. In 6 years of disuse, the sheet mill and pipe foundry had grown obsolete. Continued maintenance had kept up the outward appearance but technological advances had made the machinery inside obsolete. Local efforts to reopen them met with discouragement.

Spirits were at a low ebb when a group of the most determined local businessmen and civic leaders met with the industrial development representative of the West Penn Power Co., which supplies Scottdale's electric service, to plan for Scottdale's rehabilitation. After some discussion, they decided to abandon all efforts to get the former mills reopened and devote their energies toward getting new industries for Scottdale.

First step was to compile an inventory of what Scottdale had to offer prospective industries. Even the most sanguine were surprised at the results of this inventory. With all the facts assembled, Scottdale seemed to offer a veritable paradise for certain types of industry.

To begin with, Scottdale had an abundance of workers skilled in the metal-working trades, predominantly native-born and with a long record of friendly relations with management. In addition Scottdale was a good place to live, with no crowded slums, many modern homes, broad, shaded streets, first-class schools, churches of many denominations, small bonded indebtedness, and low taxes. Production of iron, steel, aluminum, brass, alloys, glass, and plastics centers around Pittsburgh, which is only an hour's drive from Scottdale. Two-thirds of all United States families live within reach of an overnight train ride.

To top it off, Scottdale had two plants suitable for many types of manufacture all ready for some industry to move into. Most important of all, every Scottdale citizen stood ready to help new industries get off to a good start, because everyone realized that the whole future of his community depended on industrial development.

Strangely enough, Scottdale's first good break resulted from another community's misfortune. After the Ohio River flood of 1937, the rumor reached the Scottdale committee that a steel company in a neighboring State had tired of trying to keep the river away from its door. The committee sent a representative to confer with the steel company's officials and interest them in a Scottdale location.

After talking with officials of the Duraloy Co., manufacturers of special analysis steel castings, the representative learned that they were definitely in the market for a new plant location. In fact, they were already considering several locations. The Scottdale representative outlined the advantages of a Scottdale location and finally elicited a promise that the officials would make no decision until they had seen Scottdale. A date was set for a trip to Scottdale with the suggestion that the officials bring their wives.

SHOWING THE TOWN AS IS

Members of the Scottdale committee were overjoyed when their emissary returned with this news. Then the question arose, What could be done to make a favorable impression? Though they were aware that their community presented anything but a prosperous appearance, the committee decided against any suggestion of window dressing. They had the vacant cast iron pipe foundry which could be obtained at a reasonable price and easily converted to the needs of a modern steel foundry. They had many natural advantages such as cheap fuel, electric power, skilled labor, and good transportation. They could offer good housing and good living conditions. Above all, they would show a friendly spirit of willing cooperation.

The crucial day arrived. After being greeted by a committee composed of the borough manager, council members, and leading businessmen, the Duraloy officials visited the vacant property. Meantime a group of local women accompanied the officials' wives on a tour of the community, pointing out the desirable houses available, the schools, churches, and places of interest. This tour ended with a luncheon in the home of one of the welcoming committee.

Apparently the Duraloy representatives and their wives were impressed because they immediately started negotiations for the vacant plant. Owners of the plant, eager to aid Scottdale's comeback, made their terms particularly attractive.

Duraloy took over the plant.

It was Scottdale's first good break. The Independent-Observer, Scottdale's newspaper, got out a special edition to commemorate the occasion. The Scottdale committee took a new lease on life and set out to find more industries.

Next prospect was the Calvin Manufacturing Co., which had developed an automobile distributor cap made of glass. This concern was now about ready to place its product on the market, but needed a larger plant and additional capital to get into production.

The committee suggested a vacant plant on the outskirts of Scottdale which could be converted for the production of glass products. When the proposal was accepted, the committee launched a campaign to raise money by public subscription to repair and remodel the plant for the new tenant.

With two new industries to its credit, the committee decided that even greater accomplishments might be possible if a larger group participated. Accordingly, a meeting was called, to which many of Scottdale's most capable and influential citizens were invited. At this meeting the Scottdale Civic and Industrial Association was formed. S. B. Bulick, superintendent of schools, was chosen as chairman, and Ernest Overholt, a banker was named secretary. The directors included many leading businessmen.

The newly formed association's first achievement was to obtain title to the only large industrial plant remaining vacant. This was the old American Sheet & Tin Plate Co.'s works which was owned by the United States Steel Corporation. Steel company officials deeded the entire property over to the association for $1. Only provision was that the property could not be resold, but was to be held in trust for the people of Scottdale and rented to industries which would employ local citizens.

Early in 1939 the association learned that a manufacturing concern then located in a congested industrial center was considering expansion.

Representatives of the association called on officials of this concern and arranged for them to visit Scottdale. A week later the visitors arrived and were given a reception similar to that previously provided for the Duraloy officials. They agreed to rent a section of the vacant plant on condition that it was repaired and remodeled. The association undertook that job, believing that rental income would soon retire the obligation. Work was started immediately, and early in 1939 the R. E. Uptegraff Manufacturing Co., manufacturers of electric transformers, moved into its new home.

As this is written the association is negotiating with several small but wide-awake industries in the hope of finding tenants for other buildings in the vacant steel-mill group.

While rehabilitation is not complete, the Scottdale of today is quite different from the ghost town of a few years ago. "For rent" signs have almost disappeared on Pittsburgh Street, smoke curls from factory chimneys, both movie houses play to full houses nightly, the padlock no longer hangs from the Y. M. C. A. door, tax collections have almost doubled, and streets are being resurfaced.

A number of smaller companies which tottered on the brink of failure during the long lean years have made striking come-backs.

Credit for reviving Scottdale should go to the pioneering spirit of its people, and particularly to that handful of determined men who refused to admit they were licked—the fellows whose efforts laid the ground work for the Scottdale Civic and Industrial Association. It is this same spirit which assures the future of the new Scottdale.

The American Farmer Pays Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there must be what amounts to a gigantic conspiracy against the American farmer, and that repeal of this embargo is just another evidence of its existence.

There is not the least doubt but what United States farmers have been sold down the river with respect to the reciprocal-trade treaties now in force or to become operative in the very near future. In my opinion, the whole theory of trade reciprocity, as envisioned by this administration, is a fallacy. To my mind we are doing nothing more than trying to buy our neighbor's friendship every time we negotiate one of these trade treaties.

I realize that the ideal situation in foreign trade is where such trade between countries closely balances and I also realize that in order to make one of these treaties show even a small semblance of sanity, it is necessary to give and take. But what I object to most strenuously is that in every such treaty negotiated by the Department of State so far, the American farmer has been required to do most of the giving, while eastern industrialists have taken nearly all the gains accruing from the trade.

Why is it, may I ask, that during the first 9 months of this year a very large gain has been shown in agricultural imports to the United States, while at the same time there has been a very large decrease in exports of agricultural products from the United States? Certainly it cannot be because the United States is unable to produce enough farm products for our own use.

Do you know that during the first 9 months of this year we have bought $794,700,000 worth of foreign-produced farm products? Do you realize we bought almost as much for the comparative period a year ago?

I am inclined to believe that the whole idea of reciprocal-trade treaties as practiced by this administration is nothing more than a bribe. I cannot see where the country as a whole is gaining anything from them. What we gain from the sale of industrial products is lost through letting down the tariff walls so that foreign agricultural products grown by what virtually amounts to slave labor can come into this country and undersell those same products raised here.

As a matter of fact, from the agricultural standpoint, the United States is almost 100 percent self-sufficient. But I would not object to these trade agreements so strongly if they did not pit class against class. Yes; you can call it class legislation, for that is exactly what it boils down to in the last analysis. Mr. Hull draws up a treaty with Argentina, another with Chile, still another with Canada and more than a dozen more. And what happens? He agrees to let all sorts of foreign farm products come into this country under a "most favored nation" agreement.

To be sure the countries on the other end of the pact agree to take certain quotas of American-manufactured goods and raw materials. But that is a poor way to get business, I think. What American industry can and should do is make such superior products for export that buyers from all the world would be eager to take them in preference to all other goods of the same nature. No one can tell me that American industry cannot turn out better goods at lower prices than any of our industrial competitors.

If American industry has fallen to such a low state that this Government has to buy business for them abroad, then it is about time somebody performed a rejuvenation operation on it. I cannot believe such harsh remedies are required, but I do not believe industry will continue to take all it can get in the way of governmental aid just so long as such aid is forthcoming.

If I were an exporter, though, I would not count too strongly on building up my foreign trade through the benign efforts of this administration. I would want my business to stand on its own feet and not be propped up by the Federal Government. And I do not believe I would be able to retain a clear conscience if I knew that whatever profits I might make were largely gained through the losses incurred by my fellow citizens.

It was suppressed until after the embargo repeal was assured, but then it was revealed authoritatively that the mid-west farmer stands to lose rather than gain out of the new law. It is true that England and France plan on buying many millions of dollars' worth of arms, ammunition, and implements of war in this country. It is equally true they are going to take these materials away in their own boats and pay cash for them.

But while they are doing that they are going to cut down on the amount of other goods they buy in this country. They do not intend to buy much in the foodstuff line here. They are going to try to supply all their needs in that respect from their own possessions. Therefore United States exports of corn, wheat, meat products, and so forth, appear certain to be doomed for even further reduction. That hits Midwest farmers right square in the pocketbook and basically puts these same dollars in the hands of their competitors in other parts of the world, along with their transfer to war-munitions makers in domestic industrial centers.

It means that what little export business the American farmer had has been virtually wiped out. The first estimate indicates that about $150,000,000 worth of normal export trade will be lost, but the new dealers figure that will be all right, for France and England will buy several times that amount of war planes here. The trouble with that theory is that only a few manufacturing companies will participate in that business. They do not stop to think that many thousands of farmers shared in the $150,000,000 worth of export business that is now reliably reported to have been lost to them.

But the real danger does not lie in the temporary curtailment of demand for our surplus products by France and England. The Allies have announced that they are going to try to produce all the food supplies they need at home or in their colonies. If they can do that, then the American farmer may as well kiss his export market good-bye, for if they can get all the food supplies they want elsewhere, particularly their own colonies, then it stands to reason they will continue to do so after the war is over.

Mr. Speaker, these are the economic aspects of proposed repeal of the arms embargo from the agricultural viewpoint. But that is not the main reason why I am voting against it. My first motive is that I firmly believe the repeal to be a very unneutral act, and one that is certain to have unfavorable repercussions later on, if not immediately. I am against repeal for the reason I do not want this Nation to aline itself on either side in this European war, for I am certain if it does we will eventually find ourselves all the way in it. I do not think we can go half in and stay half out. We tried that before the World War, and what did we get? Mr. Speaker, the American people know the answer.

Thomas Brackett Reed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

LETTER FROM ARTHUR CHARLES JACKSON

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to print granted to all Members, I insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the letter addressed to me as Speaker by Mr. Arthur Charles Jackson, president of the Thomas Brackett Reed Association, as follows:

[The International Longfellow Society. The Portland Historical Society. President: Arthur Charles Jackson, LL. D., president, Longfellow University. Secretary: Marshall W. Pickering, Portland, Maine, and Washington, D. C.]

NOVEMBER 3, 1939.

W. B. BANKHEAD,

Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Thomas Brackett Reed Centennial Association and the Portland (Maine) Historical Society wish to most heartily thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House of Representatives, for the very notable tributes by yourself and other Members of the House in memory of Thomas Brackett Reed on the occasion of the recent centennial anniversary of his birth.

Most sincerely yours,

ARTHUR CHARLES JACKSON,

President, the Thomas Brackett Reed Centennial Association and the Portland (Maine) Historical Society.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STEPHEN BOLLES

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

TRIBUTE BY ALMA LUTZ

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and give therein a tribute to Elizabeth Cady Stanton, pioneer woman leader not only in the movement for woman suffrage but for the whole position of women in America.

This article is from the pen of Alma Lutz, author of a life of Mrs. Stanton. The extracts follow:

On November 12, the birthday of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, a tablet will be unveiled at 250 West Ninety-fourth Street, New York City, where Mrs. Stanton lived from 1898 until her death on October 26, 1902.

The tablet is being erected by the New York State Education Department and the National Woman's Party. It bears the following inscription:

"ELIZABETH CADY STANTON
Nov. 12, 1815—Oct. 26, 1902
Lived From 1898 on This Site
Called the First
Woman's Rights Convention
Seneca Falls, N. Y., July 19–20, 1848
And Made the First Public Demand for Woman Suffrage
And for Equal Rights."

Mrs. Stanton's daughter, Harriot Stanton Blatch, well known for her own work for woman suffrage and the advancement of women, has been asked to be the speaker at the unveiling, but as illness makes it impossible for her to be present, her place will be taken by her daughter, Nora Stanton Barney, who lived with her grandmother at 250 West Ninety-fourth Street, when she was preparing to enter Cornell University to study architecture and engineering. Rhoda Barney, Mrs. Stanton's great-granddaughter, a student of architecture and engineering at the University of Pennsylvania, will unveil the tablet.

Jane Norman Smith, vice chairman of the Woman's Party and chairman of its New York City committee, will preside. Persons prominent in Government, members of Mrs. Stanton's family, and active workers in the feminist movement have been asked to participate in the ceremonies, scheduled for 3 o'clock in the afternoon. Members of the National Woman's Party, friends of equal rights, and admirers of Mrs. Stanton are urged to be present to pay tribute to this great pioneer for the emancipation of women.

Mrs. Stanton lived in an apartment at 250 West Ninety-fourth Street at the end of a very active life. Even at 84 she was writing magazine and newspaper articles. Editors regarded her as an interesting personality and sought her comments on a variety of subjects. Somehow or other, no matter what her subject, she always smuggled in a word or two on woman's emancipation. She was a steady contributor to the Sunday edition of the New York Journal and American and was featured as "the grand old woman of America." In 1901, when she was 86, she wrote in her diary: "I am writing articles long and short all the time. Last week I had something in seven different papers. The December number of the North American Review contains an article of mine, and so does the Cosmopolitan. In a word, I am always busy, which is perhaps the chief reason why I am always well."

Although at that time she no longer took an active part in the work of the National American Woman Suffrage Association of which she had been president for many years, she still sent her speeches to its conventions and her suggestions regarding policy to Miss Anthony. She wrote Miss Anthony in 1899: "To my mind our association cannot be too broad. Suffrage involves every basic principle of republican government, all social, civil, religious, educational, and political rights. It is therefore germane to our platform to discuss every invidious distinction of sex in the college, home, trades, and professions, in literature, sacred and profane; in the canon as well as in civil law. At the inauguration of our movement, we numbered in our declaration of rights 18 grievances covering the whole range of human experience. On none of these did we talk with bated breath. Note the radical claims we made, and think how the world responded. * * * In short, in response to our radicalism, the bulwarks of the enemy fell as never since. * * * But at present our association has so narrowed its platform for reasons of policy and propriety that our conventions have ceased to point the way."

Keen, interested, planning until the very last, she wrote a letter to President Roosevelt on October 25, 1902, asking him to immortalize himself by bringing about the complete emancipation of his countrywomen. The next afternoon she passed away quietly in her chair.

The world's estimate of her in 1902 in newspapers, magazines, and memorial meetings was that she was "the mother of woman suffrage," "the great statesman of the woman's rights movement," "the greatest woman the world has ever produced."

When Elizabeth Cady Stanton was born in Johnstown, N. Y., on November 12, 1815, the world offered a very limited career to a woman. Educational opportunities for girls were meager, for it was generally believed that their minds were capable of absorbing little beyond the reading, writing, and arithmetic of the elementary schools. A woman did not earn her living. She was supported by her father, her husband, or her nearest male relative. Therefore, marriage, which meant a husband to protect her and a home to shelter her, was the one great event toward which the hopes of every young girl were directed. That this event might not prove adequate to protect, shelter, and support was disregarded. In fact, to be born a woman was to live under the shadow of a "defect of sex," as Blackstone expressed it in his Commentaries.

As the daughter of an able lawyer, Elizabeth Cady was confronted very early in life with Blackstone's interpretation of woman's status. She rebelled instinctively even before she knew how laws were made or what it all meant, and when she grew to womanhood, she dedicated herself to the task of freeing women from the bonds which custom and common law had fastened upon them.

She made the first public demand for woman suffrage in 1848 at the first Woman's Rights Convention, held at her instigation in Seneca Falls, N. Y., by proposing this resolution: "That it is the duty of the women of this country to secure to themselves their sacred right to the elective franchise." This bold action was heralded far and wide by the press, ridiculed, and bitterly criticized; but from then on every woman's rights convention demanded the ballot for women. All her life Elizabeth Cady Stanton worked for woman suffrage, making speeches, writing tracts and articles, editing The Revolution, and acting as president, first, of the New York State Woman's Rights Association, then of the National Woman Suffrage Association, and, lastly, of the National American Woman Suffrage Association.

But her interest in the emancipation of women went far beyond woman suffrage to equal rights for women under the law and in all human relationships. She saw what women suffered under prevailing marriage laws, and in spite of the fact that divorce was a forbidden subject for a good woman to discuss, she publicly advocated more liberal divorce laws. She asked for equal rights for women in the church and for equal educational opportunities. She recognized women's needs for economic independence and rejoiced when they entered new fields in business and the professions.

She also saw that before women could be completely liberated there must be a great change in their own thinking. She urged them to discard false traditions, to be wary of cultivating so-called womanly qualities which had been held up as virtues and as substitutes for equality. She urged them to question the edicts of the church regarding woman's sphere. It often took more courage to denounce women's foibles than to ask for the ballot, but Elizabeth Cady Stanton was equal to the task, and all through her life she waged war against women's self-inflicted frailty and inferiority.

She believed in women and was confident that with education, training, and a new outlook, with the power that the ballot would give them, they would contribute much to their country and the world.

Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH L. PFEIFER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. PFEIFER. Mr. Speaker, no question since the World War has been more widely and seriously considered by all classes of people than that of the present legislation before the House, the repeal of the embargo provision of the present Neutrality Act.

The people of my district, a cosmopolitan one, abhor war, therefore, desire to remain neutral. Of the thousands of letters and telegrams that I have received, 83.7 percent favored retention of the embargo provision and 16.2 percent favored repeal.

The crux of this extraordinary session is to repeal the embargo provision of the present Neutrality Act.

WHAT IS NEUTRALITY?

Literally it means not taking sides. From a legal viewpoint permit me to quote Mr. S. A. Baldus, managing editor of the Extension Magazine. I quote:

In international law neutrality is defined as "the complete abstention of a state from giving material aid or encouragement to either belligerent in an existing war. Legally, a neutral state is a friend to both belligerents and endeavors to maintain peaceful relations with each * * *."

"Among the obligations of a negative character resting upon neutrals may be mentioned the duty of abstaining from furnishing money, ships, troops, or munitions to either belligerents * * *." (The New International Encyclopedia.)

How do the commentators on international law define neutrality?

Let it be understood that I am not posing as one deeply versed in the subject of international law. I have some volumes dealing with the subject in my library, and every now and then when a question arises which makes it necessary that I consult such books I give whatever time I can to their perusal and study. Thus I have gone over some of the volumes of John Bassett Moore, LL. D., who is rightly considered one of the ablest and most scholarly American commentators on international law. I have before me as I write volume VII of his monumental Digest on International Law. This one volume alone contains 1,109 pages and is an exhaustive treatise on all questions involved in the present "neutrality" legislation: War, maritime war, contraband, blockade, neutrality, etc.

Another work that has intrigued me is the Treatise on International Law, by L. Oppenheim, M. A., LL. D., Whewell professor of international law in the University of Cambridge, a member of the Institute of International Law and honorary member of the Royal Academy of Jurisprudence at Madrid. The volume before me as I write is volume II (710 pages), entitled "War and Neutrality" (2d ed.), published in 1912. (I understand that a later edition (revised) has been published. But, even so, I prefer the earlier work, for the reason that it was written before the League of Nations tried to create a new world order and establish new principles of international law.)

Oppenheim's definition of neutrality makes a nice distinction between international law and international politics:

"Such states as do not take part in a war between other states are neutrals. The term 'neutrality' is derived from the Latin neuter. Neutrality may be defined as the attitude of impartiality adopted by third states toward belligerents and recognized by belligerents, such attitude creating rights and duties between the impartial states and the belligerents. Whether or not a third state will adopt and preserve an attitude of impartiality during war is not a matter for international law, but for international politics" (p. 361). [Italics Oppenheim's.]

"The question of remaining neutral or not is, in the absence of a treaty stipulating otherwise, one of policy and not of law" (p. 362).

(Parenthetically, it may be stated here that much of the confusion that has arisen over the subject of neutrality could be cleared up if, instead of prating about international law, we would call the thing by its right name—"international politics." That is the crux of the whole question and should be insisted upon by all debaters.)

Generally speaking, in international law the act of supplying arms and munitions of war to the parties to an armed conflict is considered an unneutral act. The following few passages from John Bassett Moore's Digest of International Law not only stress the unneutrality of selling war materials of whatever kind to belligerents, but also set forth that individuals engaging in such traffic place themselves beyond the pale of the law and forfeit the protection of their governments.

"The supply of materials of war, such as arms and ammunition, to either party to an armed conflict, although neutral governments are not obliged to prevent it, constitutes on the part of the individuals who engage in it a participation in hostilities, and as such is confessedly an unneutral act. Should the government of the individual itself supply such articles, it would clearly depart from its position of neutrality. The private citizen undertakes the business at his own risk, and against this risk his government cannot assure him protection without making itself a party to his unneutral act. * * *

"Says Kent: 'The principal restriction which the law of nations imposes on the trade of neutrals is the prohibition to furnish the belligerent parties with warlike stores and other articles which are directly auxiliary to warlike purposes.'

" 'If the neutral (government),' says Woolsey, 'should send powder or balls, cannons or rifles, this would be a direct encouragement of the war, and so a departure from a neutral position * * *.'" (vol. VII, p. 749).

ORIGIN OF THE NEUTRALITY BILL

Its birthright was the result of the committee "to take the profits out of war," and became enacted August 31, 1935, to expire March 1, 1936. The President signed it and issued the following statement:

I have given my approval to Senate Resolution 173—the neutrality legislation which passed the Congress last week.

I have approved this joint resolution because it was intended as an expression of the fixed desire of the Government and the people of the United States to avoid any action which might involve us in war. The purpose is wholly excellent, and this joint resolution will to a considerable degree serve that end.

Shortly thereafter war broke out between Italy and Ethiopia, and the President applied the provisions of the law to the strife between these two nations. He said:

In these specific circumstances I desire it to be understood that any of our people who voluntarily engage in transactions of any character with either of the belligerents do so at their own risk.

Supplementing the statement of the President, Secretary Hull made the following remarks at a press conference when asked for elaboration of the President's statement of October 5 regarding transactions with belligerents:

As I said to you gentlemen heretofore, the language of the President's statement has thoroughly well-defined meaning, and every person should be able to grasp its meaning and its implications. Technically, of course, there is no legal prohibition—apart from the proclamation governing the export of arms—against our people entering into transactions with the belligerents, or either of them. The warning given by the President in his proclamation concerning travel on belligerent ships and his general warning that during the war any of our people who voluntarily engage in transactions of any character with either of the belligerents do so at their own risk were based upon the policy and purpose of keeping this country out of war—keeping it from being drawn into war. It certainly was not intended to encourage transactions with the belligerents.

Our people might well realize that the universal state of business uncertainty and suspense on account of the war is seriously handicapping business between all countries, and that the sooner the war is terminated the sooner the restoration and stabilization of business in all parts of the world, which, infinitely more important than trade with the belligerents, will be brought about.

This speedy restoration of more full and stable trade conditions and relationships among the nations is by far the most profitable objective for our people to visualize, in contrast with such risky and temporary trade as they might maintain with belligerent nations.

I repeat that our objective is to keep this country out of war.

Again, on October 30, 1935, the following statement came from the President:

In dealing with the conflict between Ethiopia and Italy, I have carried into effect the will and intent of the neutrality resolution recently enacted by Congress. We have prohibited all shipments of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to the belligerent governments. By my public statement of October 5, which was emphasized by the Secretary of State on October 10, we have warned American citizens against transactions of any character with either of the belligerent nations except at their own risk.

This Government is determined not to become involved in the controversy and is anxious for the restoration and maintenance of peace.

However, in the course of war, tempting trade opportunities may be offered to our people to supply materials which would prolong the war. I do not believe that the American people will wish for abnormally increased profits that temporarily might be secured by greatly extending our trade in such materials; nor would they wish the struggles on the battlefield to be prolonged because of profits accruing to a comparatively small number of American citizens.

And to this statement the Secretary of State appended the following:

It is my opinion that our citizens will not be disposed to insist upon transactions to derive war profits at the expense of human lives and human misery. In this connection I again repeat that an early peace, with the restoration of normal business and normal business profits, is far sounder and far preferable to temporary and risky war profits.

By the time Congress met on January 4, 1936, the President was so pleased with his neutrality legislation that he stated in his annual message the following:

As a consistent part of a clear policy the United States is following a twofold neutrality toward any and all nations which engage in wars not of immediate concern to the Americas: First, we decline to encourage the prosecution of war by permitting belligerents to obtain arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States; second, we seek to discourage the use by belligerent nations of any and all American products calculated to facilitate the prosecution of a war in quantities over and above our normal exports to them in time of peace.

Thereupon the act of 1935 was amended and strengthened as requested by the President, and on February 29, 1936, the President, in approving this legislation, stated the following:

By the resolution approved August 31, 1935, a definite step was taken toward enabling this country to maintain its neutrality and avoid being drawn into wars involving other nations. It provided that in the event of the Executive proclaiming the existence of such a war thereupon an embargo would attach to the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war destined to any belligerent country. It also authorized the Executive to warn citizens of this country against traveling as passengers on the vessels of any belligerent except at their own risk.

By the resolution I have just signed the operation of the August resolution is extended and strengthened until May 1, 1937. A new and definite step is taken by providing in substance that when an embargo becomes effective obligations of any belligerent government issued after the date of the proclamation shall not be purchased or sold in this country, and no loan or credit extended to such government; but with authority the Executive, if our interests require, to except from the prohibition commercial credits and short-time loans in aid of legal transactions. * * *

The policies announced by the Secretary of State and myself at the time of and subsequent to the issuance of the original proclamation—Italy and Ethiopia—will be maintained in effect. It is true that the high moral duty I have urged on our people of restricting their exports of essential war materials to either belligerent to approximately the normal peacetime basis has not been the subject of legislation. Nevertheless, it is clear to me that greatly to exceed that basis, with the result of earning profits not possible during peace, and especially with the result of giving actual assistance to the carrying on of war, would serve to magnify the very evil of war which we seek to prevent. This being my view, I renew the appeal made last October to the American people that they so conduct their trade with belligerent nations that it cannot be said that they are seizing new opportunities for profit or that by changing their peacetime trade they give aid to the continuation of war.

At Chautauqua, N. Y., August 14, 1936, the President said:

Nevertheless, if war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we should find in this country thousands of Americans seeking immediate riches—fool's gold, blood money—would attempt to break down or attempt to evade our neutrality.

They would tell you—and, unfortunately, their views would get wide publicity—that if we could produce and ship this and that other article to belligerent nations the unemployment of America would all find work.

I might call attention to the fact that this provision, arms embargo, in 1937 was approved in the Senate by a vote of 63 to 6, and in the House by a vote of 376 to 13; almost unanimous.

Thus you see that we have had a Neutrality Act since 1935 which has been highly praised by the President, the Secretary and Under Secretary of State, and by Senator PITTMAN, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The latter on March 3, 1937, in the Senate said:

Undoubtedly if anything on earth would arouse unfriendliness on the part of a belligerent against us it would be discrimination by our Government in favor of its enemy. We are speaking of a time when war exists, not of peacetime, and if Canada were engaged in war with a foreign country, and we were at peace with both of them, we would certainly arouse the intense anger and probably the unfriendly disposition of any country against which we discriminated in favor of any other country.

Again, on April 7, 1937, before the Academy of Political Science, he said:

Our Government, in my opinion, undoubtedly has the legal right to place an embargo upon the export of any commodity. No one has seriously opposed the placing of an embargo upon the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerents.

I shall now quote from the President's message to Congress, September 21, 1939:

I have asked the Congress to reassemble in extraordinary session in order that it may consider and act on the amendment of certain legislation which, in my best judgment, so alters the historic foreign policy of the United States that it impairs the peaceful relations of the United States with foreign nations. * * *

Beginning with the foundation of our constitutional government in the year 1789, the American policy in respect to belligerent nations, with one notable exception, has been based on international law. * * * The single exception was the policy adopted by this Nation during the Napoleonic wars, when, seeking to avoid involvement, we acted for some years under the so-called Embargo and Nonintercourse Acts. That policy turned out to be a disastrous failure. * * * Our next deviation by statute from the sound principles of neutrality and peace through international law did not come for 130 years. It was the so-called Neutrality Act of 1935. * * * I now ask again that such action be taken in respect to that part of the act which is wholly inconsistent with ancient precepts of the law of nations—the embargo provisions. * * *

I give to you my deep and unalterable conviction, based on years of experience as a worker in the field of international peace, that by the repeal of the embargo the United States will more probably remain at peace than if the law remains as it stands today.

Now, why this sudden right about face? Why the demand of the President for the repeal of the embargo provision? It is needless for me to state why. You know as well as I. Of course, to help England. Senator AUSTIN in a recent address said—and I quote:

We must make it possible for Great Britain and France to get supplies.

We do not need to ask whether the bill is neutral.

No matter how much we may hate Hitler and despise all dictatorships, let us not deceive ourselves into believing a fundamental change in our neutrality policy now would be anything but an unneutral act which may lead us into war.

What do the leading international lawyers say?

Dr. John Bassett Moore, America's leading international law authority, said:

As regards the impartial prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries which is taken over from the neutrality resolution of last year, I have no objection to make on legal grounds. The question of prohibition is one of policy.

Dr. Edwin M. Borchard, professor of law at Yale University, appearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on January 29, 1936, urged reenactment of the joint resolution of August 1935, which contained mandatory embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war:

The bulk of that act merely confirms existing international law. The embargo on arms, munitions, and implements of war is a measure which has been adopted by various countries from time to time, and is not in the least revolutionary. Dr. Moore has indicated some of the objections to that provision by way of policy, but there is none on grounds of law.

Dr. Edward S. Corwin, professor of jurisprudence at Princeton University, in a letter to the Washington Post dated October 1, 1939, discussing President Roosevelt's contention that "repeal of the embargo and a return to international law are the crux of this issue," asserted:

The fact is that the above argument rests on a mistaken assumption, namely, that neutrals are under a positive obligation to trade with belligerents. The international law to which the President constantly appeals knows no such rule. It does require that a neutral shall not prohibit trade with one belligerent which it permits with the other. It also subjects neutral trade to the hazards to which the rules concerning contraband and blockade shall give rise. But it no more requires a neutral to stand ready to sell to belligerents than it requires a neutral to produce for them. The President's argument subjects neutral interests to an utterly unheard-of servitude in favor of the belligerents, and in the instance it quite gratuitously presents the naval powers with a grievance made up out of whole cloth.

Father Edmund A. Walsh, vice president of Georgetown University, regent of the Georgetown Foreign Service School, and well-known authority on international law and international relations, in a talk reported in the Washington Post October 3, 1939, page 6, characterizes as absolutely false the contention in the Foreign Relations Committee report which I have heretofore quoted. He said:

I protest, as one who has given some attention to international law, against the falsity of the statement in the committee report that any belligerent has the right under international law to purchase any article in any neutral country. That is a misstatement. It is absolutely false. I regret to see the truth abused by people in high places who ought to know better—and probably do know better. If the embargo is to be repealed, let it be done on the merits of the case and not on the basis of any such Machiavellian skulduggery.

Again, testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on May 3, 1939, reported at page 491 of hearings on Senate Joint Resolution 21 and other measures, Father Walsh engaged in this colloquy with Senator BORAH:

Senator BORAH. There is no doubt in your mind but what we had the right to withhold the sale of arms?

Father WALSH. Yes; very decidedly. It has been a highly debated question, and I take issue with the school that gives to all belligerents a right to purchase, creating a corresponding obligation to sell. The correlative of the right to purchase is not an absolute obligation on any government to sell, because to sell or not to sell, being a subject of national determination, is a subject for the Government, and there is no public-utility idea by which it has to exercise its franchise and sell or give service. There is no such thing in international law. Therefore I did not mention any international law which would be violated by an arms embargo, though some people hold that. The only obligation is to sell impartially if you sell at all.

Dr. Thomas H. Healy, dean of the Georgetown Foreign Service School and former professor of international law at The Hague, testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on April 27, 1939, at page 340 said:

Today neutrality, as I see it, is strictly domestic legislation, and that comes under the prerogative of the Congress of the United States. It has little to do with international law and has nothing to do with treaties, except by indirection it might violate one. It is traditional international practice. If a nation feels it is being hurt, it may not question your right, but it may say that, independently of your right, they are going to take action.

Dr. Herbert Wright, professor of international law at Catholic University, testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on May 2, 1939, at pages 404 and 405 declared:

There is nothing in international law, however, to prevent a neutral state, by domestic legislation, from temporarily waiving the exercise of some of its admitted neutral rights to make more remote the possibility of being drawn into a foreign war.

Profs. Charles Cheney Hyde and Philip Jessup, of Columbia University, former legal advisers to the State Department and outstanding authorities on international law, in a letter jointly signed by them in the New York Times on October 6, 1939, had the following to say:

We must challenge the suggestion that international law has ever imposed any duty on a neutral to permit the exportation of munitions of war from its territory, and that accordingly the retention of the embargo is contrary to the precepts of international law. That is not the case and never has been. It is fantastic to call the present arms embargo a violation of international law, and it is misleading to intimate that it represents a departure from that law.

Mr. Green H. Hackworth, Solicitor and Legal Adviser of the State Department, testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on February 5, 1936, at page 298 of the 1936 hearings, declared:

This section has to do with the placing of embargoes on the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries. There appears to be little or no serious objection to this from any quarter, even from those who tell us that we should have no domestic legislation but should constantly rely on international law. The sentiment of the people seems to be opposed to the furnishing of finished implements of war to belligerent countries.

Secretary Hull, a well-known and ardent champion of international law, championed such a provision when he proposed the draft of a treaty to the Buenos Aires Pan American Conference in 1936, article VIII of which contained this provision:

Upon the determination of the existence of a state of war between two or more American republics those of the high contracting parties remaining neutral shall not permit, during the continuance of hostilities, the exportation from their respective territories of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to any of the belligerents, or to any neutral country for transshipments to, or for the use of, any of the belligerents.

WHAT DOES THE ORDINARY CITIZEN THINK?

I, as one, am of the same opinion as the 83.7 percent of my constituents. I believe repeal of the arms embargo is a definite and certain step toward war. I believe our chances of staying out of the present war will be much better if we leave the existing arms-embargo provision of the Neutrality Act remain as is. I also believe, from the conversations with my colleagues, that the American people are overwhelmingly opposed to the United States becoming involved. Some of my colleagues fear the administrative whip, which again cracked during this extraordinary session. Insofar as I am concerned, America shall remain at peace, and remain absolutely neutral, thus friendly to all powers on the face of the earth.

This is not our war. Therefore, I am opposed to the United States taking any part in this European conflict. Certainly, as the eminent international lawyers have stated, repealing the embargo provision is an unneutral act, short of war, and is very apt to lead us into war. Why take those chances for fool's gold?

The sacrifice of one American youth, disregarding his race, color, or creed, is not worth all the mercenary gain involved. Why then repeal the embargo provision? As I have stated at a previous time on the floor of Congress, let us legislate for the security of America, and not for the security of any foreign nation. We are Americans. We should neither be pro-British, pro-French, pro-German, nor pro for any other nation, but solely pro-American. If we are to be real patriots, let us radiate true Americanism. Let us first make this country safe for democracy. Let us protect and preserve these United States for ourselves and our children.

WILL HISTORY REPEAT ITSELF?

The people of the United States are asked again to accept the false philosophy that we can end Europe's round of wars. History gives us no grounds to believe that we can do any such thing. Europe has been torn with strife for centuries, and it seems that there is a war for every generation. A war every 20 years.

In 1917 Woodrow Wilson asked the question, "Is the present war a struggle for a just and secure peace, or only a new balance of power?"

Believing that the struggle was for a lasting peace, a war to end all wars, the United States went into that war. Today the cycle of revenge has spun around again. A new crop of cannon fodder has matured, and Europe is again at war.

Shall we now, with our unselfish effort of 1917 so clearly proved in vain, be fooled again?

Reread your American history. Reread the great State papers of America—the Declaration of Independence, George Washington's Farewell Address, Lincoln's second inaugural, the statement of Thomas Jefferson.

Our first and fundamental maxim should be never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe; our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs.

President Monroe wrote:

In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken part, nor does it comport with our policy to do so. * * * Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy.

Daniel Webster, referring to this foreign policy adopted by our young Republic for the purpose of keeping us out of European embroilments, said:

Sir, I look on the message of December 1823 as forming a bright page in our history. I will help neither to erase it nor tear it out; nor shall it be, by any act of mine, blurred or blotted.

If every citizen were to read this group of documents, we would have a revival of true Americanism. We would cease to worry about Europe and would set ourselves to solving our own problems.

Let us not be too nationalistically inclined. Let us, since we have made America our home, inculcate reverence for our laws, ideals, and institutions, and preserve it for our children. I recall, 22 years ago when my dad, thinking the liberty of America was at stake, voluntarily urged his three sons to fight for this country, even though against the land of his birth.

I have the greatest admiration for the Polish people who so valiantly fought to maintain their independence.

It is with sympathy that we look at the geographical area that was known as Poland. But certainly the United States cannot be expected to police the world, nor is there any justified reason for her becoming the arsenal of the world.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD K. CLAYPOOL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Mr. Speaker, I desire at this time to discuss briefly the reasons that impelled me to vote for the pending neutrality bill that prohibits the shipment of American goods in American ships to nations engaged in war, prohibits the travel of American citizens in the war zones, and provides that all goods purchased here by the warring nations must be paid for in cash and repeals the existing arms-embargo provision of our law.

At the outset I should like to state that when it first became apparent that the repeal of the arms embargo would become an issue I immediately began an effort to ascertain the views of my constituents on this proposal. They cooperated fully, and none hesitated to give me their sincere opinion. As a result of an extensive survey throughout my district I came to the conclusion that a vast majority were of the opinion that the peace of the United States could best be preserved by the repeal of the mandatory arms embargo. In voting for repeal I have been guided, more than anything else, by the wishes of the people of my district. History demonstrates that the opinion of the people on most national problems is sound. I have found it so during my experience in private and public life.

THE PURPOSE OF THIS BILL IS TO KEEP US OUT OF WAR

The neutrality bill is not designed to help any nation or group of nations. The bill is designed to keep the United States of America out of war. As stated several weeks ago by a prominent American, "Our sympathies are not confined to the people of any one nation or of any one group of nations engaged in the conflict. Our sympathies are with the common men and women of all nations for we know that they all want peace and liberty, not war and domination." During these times of stress and high tension we must not allow ourselves to be influenced by emotional outbursts and propaganda, whatever the source. We must keep cool heads and exercise calm and deliberate judgment. Our one objective must be: "Keep the United States at peace."

UNITED STATES WILL NOT BECOME INVOLVED

In considering this bill some thoughtless Members have sought to create the impression that the passage of this bill was a step toward war. War can be declared only by Congress and, far from being a step toward war, this bill is a step toward permanent peace. Congress will never declare war unless the American people demand it to do so. The American people will never demand that Congress declare war unless they become the victims of a series of acts of violence that violate their rights and jeopardize their national safety.

Under this legislation our ships cannot travel in the war zones—our citizens cannot travel in the war zones—the warring nations must pay cash, and hence we have no credits to protect. Therefore, under this bill, those acts of violence that arouse the people, such as the sinking of our ships and the loss of American lives, cannot occur. If these acts of violence do not occur, the people of the United States will never ask that Congress declare war. We know that the Congress, the President, and the American people fervently desire peace. If we hold fast to this desire and remain cool and dispassionate and act only for the best interests of our own country, there is no danger of our involvement in the European war.

Throughout the consideration of this measure in both the House and Senate there has been no doubt as to the sincerity of the members of both parties regardless of the position they adopted. Partisanship has been avoided, and the final vote finds that Members voted according to their honest convictions and best judgment. I voted for this bill because I believed its enactment was desired by the majority of my constituents, because I believed this bill to be a sound and realistic approach to the problem, and because after a consideration of all the circumstances I believed it would best preserve the peace of the United States. With the cooperation of the people and of the Government we can make it work.

Chester C. Bolton

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE CLEVELAND (OHIO) NEWS

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Cleveland News, October 30, 1939, dealing with the character and career of our beloved colleague, CHESTER BOLTON:

[From the Cleveland (Ohio) News of October 30, 1939]

CHESTER C. BOLTON, 1882–1939

CHESTER CASTLE BOLTON had the religion of true public service. He believed solemnly that any American of means and culture owed a great deal to the nation which made means and culture available; and he spent a busy life demonstrating this.

At 57, he has left a career which will be a monument to him, which is the chief consolation his city finds for his being cut off from a later part of it which promised rare, old-time statesmanship.

The opportunity was close at hand for a seat in the United States Senate. There a man of his convictions and honor might have won back for the toga a great part of the respect for a Sherman, a Payne, or a Hanna.

Few Clevelanders in his generation have accomplished so much with such modesty, so great an indifference to all except the responsibility. In peace or war, there was the State and the Nation, to be served with diligence and patriotism by the citizens whose services would count the most—this was the essence of CHESTER BOLTON'S creed.

Under his creed, it was not enough to be a donor to philanthropy and the arts, as most persons of his talents content themselves with being. He must also be a leader and a worker. And hardly an institution in Cleveland but had him as a friend available every day in the year.

It was typical that he was at the first citizens' training camp at Plattsburg in 1916, to help the examples of preparedness. His business experience placed him on the first War Industries Board when America entered the World War; then he was aide to the Assistant Secretary of War. But a Washington service was not his ideal. He reentered the Army as a field officer and rose to colonel and assistant chief of staff of the One Hundred and First Division.

There was service to be done in the Ohio Legislature, and, unlike many in his position, he did not disdain but embraced it. In three of the best State assemblies of modern times, he was a reflective, conscientious senator and president pro tempore. It was his senate which effected the last noteworthy reform of the Ohio tax structure, in which he voted and acted with impersonality and against interest.

He was elected to Congress in 1928 to succeed a great Congressman, Theodore E. Burton, but he was of such caliber that this important district never noticed the change; it became more famous for its leader-like representation.

In fact, his constituency came to take for granted from him a service on rivers and harbors (so important to Cleveland's business life) and on the Appropriations Committee, which, in a lesser man, would have caused national comment. One incident of his congressional career shows his fineness of principle. All the Twenty-second's Congressmen had used the appointments to West Point and Annapolis as desirable patronage, and this was accepted. That was not good enough for CHESTER BOLTON. He created impartial examinations open to every boy in the district and made his appointments rigidly on the outcome of the exams. His choices at the military schools have done him honor by their work there.

This idealism, born partly of his descent from pioneer Cleveland families, he carried into everything he touched. His close association with Cleveland's great metals business showed it; his duties as a banker were important; his work as a churchman and as an administrator and guide of charities brought strength to his church and charities.

And, above all, he was shy and retiring and escaped the limelight whenever it approached. There was a right noble Spartan strain in him. Alas, it has almost disappeared from public life in America. But his approach to this nobility will not leave his fellow citizens uninspired to preserve it.

America Can Keep Out of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, the Congress of the United States has spoken on our neutrality legislation and on our foreign policy. I fervently hope and pray it will turn out for the best and that America will now settle down to a solution of our perplexing domestic problems. I want the United States to remain at peace and not be dragged through the devastating experiences of another war on foreign soil in a second futile attempt to reshape human nature in Europe by force of American arms.

Regardless of whether we approved or disapproved of the changes in our neutrality laws, which now permit us to sell arms and munitions to nations at war, we can all take solace and find heart in the fact that in the final analysis the people still govern this country and that America can keep out of war. After all, no neutrality law can be good enough to keep a reckless and impetuous Government from involving us in war and no neutrality law can be bad enough to force a wise and prudent government to entangle us in foreign strife. So whether it is good or bad, our new neutrality legislation cannot involve us in war nor will it insure us against war. That is the job of the common people—that is the task for folks like you and me, who by vigorous activities toward peace on the home front, in the immediate future, can prevent the heartaches and sorrow coming from sacrifices on the war front in some sorry tomorrow.

FIRST CASUALTY OF WAR WOULD BE SELF-GOVERNMENT

I am sure it is unnecessary to enumerate the horrors and heartaches of modern war. The first casualty of the last war was truth; the first casualty of another war involving America would be self-government. In the short time in which England has been involved in the present European war, for example, many of the rights for which free men have struggled in that country for seven centuries have already been denied to them. Wars are largely fought by the common people, but the government officials whose errors in judgment and impetuous actions involve nations in war invariably seize the occasion to tighten their grip on government and to take unto themselves the powers of dictators and absolutists. It is as true today as it was in the days of Franklin that "there never was a good war nor a bad peace." America can keep out of the European war if the people will unite in an intelligent and unyielding determination to pursue the path of peace.

It is important that our national leadership be guided by a spirit of strict neutrality and absolute impartiality; in the pursuit of such a policy, I am sure it will have the prayerful support of every patriotic American.

THE PEOPLE HAVE A RESPONSIBILITY IN MAINTAINING PEACE

However, there is an even greater responsibility and opportunity for the people of America. The people in America are the authors of public opinion and the backbone of government. At least until and unless we are at war, the people of the United States have the destiny of our national policies—national and international—in their own hands. They can have the kind of government they desire; in the long run, they receive the kind of government they deserve. Close attention to the acts of government and the activities of Government officials retain for the people the rights and the blessings of self-rule. Inattention to these sacred rights soon results in officials, elected to serve the people, reaching out for more power for themselves in the delusion that they were elected to rule the people. If we are to have peace, the people of America must not let up in their determination to stay out of the present conflict in Europe. If that determination remains strong enough and vocal enough, officialdom in America will not, cannot, involve this country in war.

Mr. Speaker, may I submit for the consideration of the Nation a few suggestions for the people and the Government to consider in doing their part to maintain the peace of the United States?

1. WE SHOULD BE TOLERANT

We should remain calm. We should avoid voicing prejudices. We should practice tolerance and the art of giving due respect to the opinions of our fellow Americans, whether we agree with those opinions or not. We should refrain from hurling charges of pro-British, or pro-German, or pro-Russian, or pro-French against those who disagree with us and as pro-Americans, all, disagree as Americans should and then strive to unite on a common program of keeping America American, which we can all support. The throttling of free speech, and of a free press, and of truth are steps toward war and not toward peace, but we should remember that war news reaching us from Europe must all pass through censors which are established not for the purpose of relaying the truth but of distorting it so as to make the best possible sympathy-winning plea for the Nation involved. We should therefore be slow to form judgments on the basis of such news as can come to us from Europe via either foreign or American newspapers or radio stations.

2. WE SHOULD CURTAIL ALL UN-AMERICAN "ISMS"

We should stamp out the existence of un-American "isms" in the high places of influence in America. While our Constitution protects all people in their rights to organize and to criticize it does not imply that members of such organizations as the Communist Party, the bund, fascistic groups, and similar un-American sects should be permitted to hold responsible appointive positions in the executive department of Government. The Dies investigating committee has presented the Attorney General's office with irrefutable evidence that many such disciples of un-American movements now hold such positions. The President and/or the people should insist that the executive department of our Government be cleaned out of all such officeholders at once. Instead of criticizing the revelation of these conditions as a "sordid procedure," the President should stamp out the "sordid policies" which these practitioners of un-Americanism are attempting to preach from behind the mantle of respectability given them by appointment to positions of Federal authority.

3. WE SHOULD REQUIRE FOREIGN PROPAGANDISTS TO REGISTER AS SUCH

Freedom of speech is an American right guaranteed under the American Constitution. However, when in wartime foreign nations send us lecturers, journalists, and professional lobbyists to win sympathy for their cause and to stir up prejudice against their enemies they should be compelled to register as propagandists so that the American citizens would be forewarned as to the unreliability of their statements. America should not become an open forum for the foreign propagandists of the world to use in an effort to entice us into entering either side of a European war.

4. WE SHOULD HEAR A RENUNCIATION OF THIRD-TERM AMBITIONS

President Roosevelt should avail himself of an early opportunity to make a straightforward statement to the effect that he is not a candidate for a third term and that he would decline such a nomination if it were tendered him. In that way he could effectively dissolve any suspicions that he is using the war situation as a device for furthering his personal political fortunes and greatly increase national confidence in his leadership in these critical days. The time has not come in this country when there is only one American big enough or wise enough to be President. There are many capable leaders in both the Democratic and Republican parties who can guide the destiny of America, in war or in peace, and at a time when we are indirectly giving assistance to the curtailment of one-man government in Europe we should studiously avoid making any further approach to the adoption of one-man government in America. The maintenance of representative government in our Republic transcends the personal ambitions of any man or the political aspirations of any group of political appointees. The great value of our two-term tradition for American Presidents takes on new value and new significance in the light of the last 5 years of European history.

5. WE SHOULD SELF-IMPOSE AN EMBARGO ON HATE SPEECHES

We should have a self-imposed embargo on hate speeches in this country. It is especially unfortunate and unwise when people in high places of influence such as our Chief Executive, Cabinet members, Senators and Representatives, editorial writers, and newspaper and radio commentators permit themselves to render a distinct disservice to the cause of American peace by venting their spleen against the governments of other peoples. In the final analysis, our traditional concept of the Monroe Doctrine demands that we do not meddle in the internal political affairs of Europe as a counterpart of our demand that Europeans do not meddle in the internal political affairs of the Western Hemisphere. The people should protest with vigor against any individual in public or private life who by the influence of his rank or ability brings America closer to the brink of war through the prostitution of his position by stirring up passions at home and stimulating anti-American prejudices abroad. If the people protest effectively enough against such practices, these peddlers of prejudice will slink back into the obscurity from whence they came, and to which they should be consigned for the general welfare until the clouds of war have once again cleared away so their poison shafts can no longer endanger starting an epidemic of public opinion which might lead to war.

6. WE SHOULD STRENGTHEN OUR GENERAL PREPAREDNESS

America should tighten its program of preparedness. This means not only adding what military strength we may require for permanent security but it means, with equal importance, retrenching our national fiscal policies to give us strength to meet any emergency. It means, too, a determined drive to make democracy work at home by giving American farmers the right to supply our own markets at a fair price, by giving American labor steady employment at a respectable annual wage, and giving American business an opportunity to make a fair profit. It means removing some of the political parasites who are now sapping the lifeblood of the farmer, the worker, and the businessman, and it means developing an American program of prosperity and fair play which will provide "a fair chance for a free people" throughout America. These objectives cannot be obtained if we permit our attention to be diverted from domestic problems by sly political strategists who seek to focus attention on Europe. Truly these days we must "See America('s problems) first."

7. WE SHOULD BE ISOLATIONISTS FROM WAR—INSPIRATIONISTS FOR PEACE

Finally, Americans can remain at peace and resist the cries to go to war in good conscience that by so doing they are making their maximum contribution to the advancement of civilization. In the war we would become but another belligerent faced with the final necessity of imposing a hard peace upon a vanquished foe. Out of the war, we become a great beacon of hope to the war-weary people of all the world. We make it possible for belligerents on both sides to call upon our good services when the passions of war have burned low and to request us to help them work out a just and a fair peace which may become a permanent agreement of amity rather than the vengeance-stimulating prologue to another war. By making democracy work so well in the United States that its advantages will beckon to people everywhere, we can by our example, rather than by our arms or our armies, hurry the day when other people will throw off oppression and discard unworkable theories to voluntarily accept and adopt the blessings of self-government as a means of bringing greater happiness to greater numbers. Thus by being isolationists from war, we can become the world's greatest inspirationists for peace and best play our part in the restoration of peace and the advancement of Christian civilization to the four corners of the world.

SOLDIERS OF 1917 ARE PEACE SALESMEN OF 1939

I am strengthened in my conviction that America can keep out of war by still another factor. I refer now to the important influence being exerted by the veterans of the last war in the program to keep America at peace during the present war. The correspondence which I have received from South Dakota indicates that members of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the unorganized veterans are united in a determination to prevent the necessity of sending their sons to a bloody death on foreign battlefields to fight for a cause which they so vaguely understand and which the record since the World War clearly reveals to be impossible of attainment by force of arms. Self-government, christianity, and peace are causes which people must seek from the depths of their hearts; they are not causes which can be forced upon people with bombs and bayonets. This simple lesson in human understanding has been dearly learned by present-day Americans, and we can take courage from the fact that the soldiers of 1917 in this country have become our leading salesmen for peace in 1939. The heroes of our last war are marching again—this time volunteers in the battle to maintain America's peace.

WITH GOD NOTHING IS IMPOSSIBLE

The American people should pray as they have never prayed before that the God of Peace will give them power to guide the destiny of America away from the war shoals of Europe. With God nothing is impossible. He alone can melt the hearts of the war mongers and bring justice and order out of the chaos which is Europe's.

Mr. Speaker, again I say, America can keep out of war. Yes; America must keep out of war if civilization and Christianity are to be preserved. I want to record it here and now that my vote will always be cast on the side of peace unless and until such a black hour might come that we be called upon to defend our own people, our own shores, and our own Government. Such an eventuality is happily not now within the realm of the most remote probability. Let us therefore rededicate ourselves, each and all, in private life or in public office, to the practices and purposes of the Prince of Peace to the end that the torch of American liberty and human tolerance may continue to point the way of hope and of life to all the peoples of the world.

Promotion of the Cultural Arts in New York City and the Exhibitions in the Riverside Museum, Master Institute of United Arts, Inc.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

On my last trip home to New York City, just before consideration of the pending neutrality legislation was begun, it was my pleasure and privilege to see a large and representative collection of Polish art that left the port of Gdynia during the last week of August. Owing to the present situation, it is probably the last shipment of such art objects which we will see for some time.

This interesting collection comprises a part of a large exhibition of paintings, prints, and sculpture by 270 outstanding women artists of Australia, Czechoslovakia, France, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Sweden, and Switzerland to be seen at the Riverside Museum, 310 Riverside Drive, at the corner of One Hundred and Third Street, in New York City.

The Riverside Museum is a unit of the Master Institute of United Arts, Inc., established in 1922. The latter is a corporation organized under the educational laws of the State of New York.

The Riverside Museum has become a vital part of the city's educational and cultural life. It affords the 200,000 permanent residents of the neighborhood, the students of Columbia College, Barnard College, Teachers College, New York University, and the thousands of visitors to Riverside Drive an exceptional opportunity for the study and appreciation of contemporary American and European art as well as ancient examples of the far eastern cultures.

It is the only museum of its kind on the upper west side of Manhattan and supplements the permanent collections of the American Museum of Natural History at Seventy-ninth Street, the New York Historical Society at Seventy-seventh Street, the Museum of the American Indian at One Hundred and Fifty-fifth Street, and the Cloisters branch of the Metropolitan Museum of Art at One Hundred and Ninetieth Street.

The principal and primary purpose of the Riverside Museum is to encourage contemporary American art and its artists by holding large and important exhibitions representative of the various trends in painting and sculpture throughout the country, as well as to import representative collections of merit from Europe, Asia, and the Latin American republics. It is the intention of the trustees to augment the permanent collection of the museum with acquisitions of outstanding excellence in the departments of painting, sculpture, and the graphic arts.

The importance of the Riverside Museum in this densely populated section of New York City cannot be overestimated. Some comments by leading New York metropolitan newspapers bring this out most forcefully.

Carlyle Burrows, art critic of the New York Herald Tribune, comments:

> Prospects of increased patronage for American art and a resurgence of cultural and educational activities in New York's upper West Side have been definitely improved by the Riverside Museum's venture.

Howard Devree, art critic of the New York Times, comments:

> The initial exhibition gives promise of a progressive policy and further interesting events.

Emily Genauer, art editor of the New York World-Telegram, comments:

> A new and important museum devoted to contemporary American art. Culture comes to the upper West Side. A new institution has been founded which in time may equal in importance, as a constructive force in American art, the Whitney Museum.

And again, when the Silvermine Guild held its first New York exhibition here:

> Doing a "mountain and Mohammed" for the benefit of the general public and art critics who found it inconvenient to trek to Silvermine, Conn., the Riverside Museum has brought the show to New York.

At this time it may be of general interest to point out the important work the Riverside Museum has accomplished since its establishment. Housed in a modern skyscraper building, it has filled a long-felt need as a cultural center on the upper West Side of the city, where over a quarter million persons reside in an area of 3 square miles.

Concurrent with the New York World's Fair this summer, the United States New York World's Fair Commission, which is headed by our honorable Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace, sponsored by a Latin American exhibition of fine and applied arts in these galleries. Paintings, prints, and sculpture from Brazil, Argentina, Chile, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Ecuador, Mexico, and Paraguay were sent by these Governments and effectively displayed through June, July, August, and September. The large attendance of thousands of visitors in these few months proved the wisdom of the commission's decision to sponsor this good-will gesture toward our Latin American neighbors.

Other exhibitions held in the Riverside Museum since its founding have been: Group shows of Chicago artists, Buffalo artists, New York City artists, Silvermine, Conn., artists, New York women artists, American abstract artists, and a large retrospective exhibition of documentary photographs of social significance. During this period the permanent collection of the museum, comprising one of the outstanding oriental exhibitions to be seen in this country, was occasionally placed on view. A Tibetan library of 300 volumes is one of two in the United States, the other being in the Congressional Library in this city. The Riverside Museum is open free to the public every day in the year excepting some holidays and on Mondays.

As many of you know, most of the great museums in the United States are repositories for collections of ancient art and their exhibition programs seldom reach beyond the narrow spheres of community interest. Great stress has been made on bringing to New York art exhibitions from foreign countries and out-of-the-ordinary collections gathered here. To enumerate a few exhibitions held in this building that were outstanding contributions to our knowledge of art the following partial list is impressive: Finnish arts and crafts, Tibetan paintings, exhibitions of old masters, collection of seventeenth and eighteenth century Russian icons, Austrian graphic show, American Indian water colors, docks and rivers of New York, parks and playgrounds of New York, and many other exhibitions. A number of these exhibitions were loaned to other museums and institutions and others are still being circulated.

Since 1922, when the Master Institute of United Arts was incorporated as an educational institution, the president, Mr. L. L. Horch, has unselfishly devoted his time and money to the progress of this cultural center, surrounding himself with trustees and officers who have assisted in this noble undertaking.

The Master Institute program, aside from its activities in the Riverside Museum unit, has embraced the establishment of a school of fine arts, dedicated to the pursuit of art education and the correlation of the arts in one building. Classes have been conducted in music, opera, drama, dance, sculpture, painting, and drawing, in large attractive studios overlooking the Hudson River. Noted instructors have given students their elementary and advanced training in their respective fields. A department was inaugurated for the blind where instruction was given in music with gratifying results. A number of scholarships have been awarded annually to worthy and talented students.

In addition to the above school activities approximately 300 events are given annually which include lectures, forums, travelogues, dramatic and operatic performances, concerts, recitals of the dance and opera, most of which have been free to the public. It has also given its cooperation and facilities to the Federal music project, where thousands of students have enjoyed the privilege of attending classes and lectures and concerts. The institute has also given valuable assistance to the W. P. A. adult-education project under the Board of Education of New York City. Hundreds of lectures and discussions on current events, world literature, play writing, psychology, and public speaking have been given. Also elementary, intermediate, and advanced courses have been made available in French, Italian, and Spanish. The success of this program is best evidenced by the attendance of 57,000 during the year 1938–39.

Incorporated within the Master Institute Building is a modern theater seating 300 persons which has witnessed a succession of notable concerts, recitals, plays, lectures, and symposiums by internationally known groups and persons; a public library devoted to the arts, sciences, and literature and large lecture halls for intimate affairs. Among the residents of the building are many students, professors, instructors, and other personalities prominently identified with the city's life. Much effort has been expended in collaborating with museums, colleges, educational institutions, elementary, high, and private schools, libraries, women's clubs, and associations, both in the city and out of town.

It is indeed gratifying to realize that in these troubled times there is an institution that not only serves the cultural needs of the community but endeavors to promote international good will through its diversified program of activities.

How Will Belligerents Pay Cash?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, the credit clause in the neutrality bill created a lot of unfavorable comment. That particular clause was stricken from the Senate bill, but it has not absolutely eliminated the extension of credit to belligerents. Under the present Neutrality Act any individual can borrow money in America, purchase any of our goods except war materials, and take them to a warring nation. Foreigners are not prevented from negotiating loans with international bankers in this country, and they can purchase such materials and sell them to a private concern in the belligerent countries. These materials may go into munitions, and it will be difficult to prove that such materials went to a belligerent government. This is the loophole which may again result in American money financing European wars. It has been stated that the Federal Reserve banks have already been given the "go" sign to furnish the credits by which belligerents may purchase war materials in this country. This is not reassuring to the American people, who so painfully remember the disastrous consequences brought about by extending credit to those warring nations over 22 years ago. The American Ambassador in London, Walter Hines Page, on March 5, 1917, sent a telegram to Woodrow Wilson which contained the following information:

> She (England) cannot continue her present large purchases in the United States without shipments of gold to pay for them, and she cannot maintain large shipments of gold for two reasons: First, both England and France must retain most of the gold they have to keep their paper money at par; and, second, the submarine has made the shipping of gold too hazardous, even if they had it to ship. * * * France and England must have a large enough credit in the United States to prevent the collapse of world trade. If we should go to war with Germany, the greatest help we could give the Allies would be such credit. Perhaps our going to war is the only way in which our present preeminent trade position can be maintained and a panic averted.

Every informed individual must realize that the extension of credit to the Allies paved the way for our entrance into the last war.

The action of Congress in enacting so-called cash-and-carry legislation assumes that we will get cash from belligerents who are in a most deplorable economic and financial condition. These nations cannot pay the principal upon debts incurred as a result of the last war; they cannot even pay the interest upon sums which total billions of dollars. When whatever cash can be supplied by belligerent nations is used up, then the same arguments that brought about the so-called cash law will be used to bring about a law extending credits. Added to the voices of those who wish to see us embroiled in the European war will be the voices of those Americans who have accepted employment on a temporary basis to make munitions for warring nations. They will argue that, unless credit is extended, thousands will be thrown out of work. Another depression will visit America. Certainly the munitions maker will get his compensation. But who will pay him? In the last analysis, will not the people of the United States foot the bill? Will not the American taxpayer be required to pay for these war materials shipped to belligerents, even as he did during the last war?

When we speak of getting cash for war materials shipped to belligerents, what do we mean? It is not as simple as going to the grocery store and paying 50 cents for a pound of butter. The grocer and you both live in America, and you give him an American 50-cent piece, which is considered cash. The grocer gets value received for his goods. He can take that 50-cent piece and buy other goods. But when a foreign country buys materials from us, it can pay either through barter; through selling holdings of American investments and securities, thereby obtaining cash or through the payment of gold. Barter can be used very little during time of war. To dump holdings of American investments and securities will depress our markets for a while, and it will raise only a small amount of the money necessary to finance a war. The chief way in which we might be paid is through gold.

This Nation now has approximately 65 percent of all the gold in the world. Our credit system is already surfeited with gold. After we get if, we bury the gold at Fort Knox, Ky. This country is buying gold at $35 an ounce, approximately $14 an ounce more than it is worth on the world market. We are giving other nations who sell us gold a premium at the expense of the American taxpayer. Other nations on the globe are quickly losing all of their gold. They might dump all the yellow metal into our lap and then go off gold entirely. We would then be sitting with all the gold and no one to sell it to. Even now, if we should attempt to sell our gold, who would buy it? What amount would he buy? How much would we get for it? Until we can sell back to foreigners the gold we are now buying from them at a premium we are not receiving any real value for our goods. Until we can resell the gold abroad, our laborers, farmers, and the rest of our people must pay for the war supplies we send to belligerent nations. The gold which we get in exchange for our American goods is in fact unlawful for us to use and must be buried in the earth, and is practically useless to us. So we can really say that by selling goods to belligerents we Americans are again financing a great part of the war in Europe.

Vicious and Misleading Propaganda in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, each day our desks are covered with an avalanche of propaganda emanating from various sources. Some of the printed matter comes from well-intended, though sadly misinformed, patriotic individuals; more often from organizations, some having the highest purpose as a basis of their very existence.

In many instances—too many, in fact, to overlook—we receive propaganda in the form of books, regularly issued periodicals, and newspapers. In these, often in fact, nearly always, facts are ignored or brazenly twisted, when not misrepresented. At the present time two powerful and well-organized sources of propaganda, functioning through individuals and respectably clothed organizations, are polluting the stream of American public opinion. Our newspaper editors and radio commentators, being too clever in their methods of detection as a rule, refuse to print or announce as news most of the filth of fiendish propagandists. Because of this close scrutiny and attendant blue-penciling and rejection, it becomes necessary for these purveyors of falsehoods and misrepresentations, through which it is intended to twist or at least sway American public opinion, to resort to their own methods of distribution, with little regard for ethics and less for fact and fairness. Among the chief violators of our freedom and broad tolerance is that recently wedded-in-sin combination of communism and nazi-ism, with emphasis upon the latter. It is as nothing to have nazi-ism commit rape, robbery and mass murder upon Poland, a peaceful and defenseless neighbor and then to despoil the victim of her reputation by propaganda to show that after all, she was deserving of such bestial treatment because she was defloured and degenerate. It is the simplest matter of explanation for nazi-ism, insulting as it is base, to say that the fiendish, scab paper-hanger ordered a counter attack in self defense against a neighboring nation and further to misstate that nazi-ism was not mobilized for the stroke of treachery and death which was delivered in violation of nonaggression treaties to the third successive victim.

The invaded territories of Poland, as well as those of Czechoslovakia, are proclaimed "ancient crownlands of Germany" returning to the Reich. Brazen expressions of shameless propagandists enjoying our American hospitality contemptuously give out information insulting to our American intelligence and fairness right here at the swastika-controlled embassy in Washington. Deliberate falsehoods were circulated to the effect that Prague was an ancient German city and, like its university, founded by a Teuton king or prince on soil that was always German. The gallant and brilliant Col. Vladimir Hurban, Minister of Czechoslovakia, silenced the falsifier as he crushed the slander at one bold stroke.

The western Polish provinces of Poznan, Pomerania, and Silesia now temporarily overrun by the Godless and fiendish forces of nazi-ism are claimed as territories of Germany. Our American people were not expected to know that these lands, and even territory which was never restored by the treaty of Versailles, extending far to the west of Poland's recent boundaries and peopled by 1,800,000 Poles who were forced to goose-step to Hitlerism, always belonged to Poland. Propagandists would have Americans believe that German boundaries extended to the Vistula River, if not further east. These same Nazi radio commentators and spokesmen, highly paid for their services, have the gall to state that nazi-ism "has no interest in changing the sovereignty of any American territory, most certainly not to its own benefit." Who in America does not remember the red-handed capture in the act of Von Bernstorff and Von Papen who promised Mexico the sovereign States of Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, in return for military aid against the United States. There is no more difference between nazi-ism and the madmen of Wilhelm's day than there was difference between the schemers of 1914 and Bismarck. This same source of propaganda, with even more brass, stated that "only on two occasions German troops ever fought in the Western Hemisphere"; one of these times "to help Washington throw off British despotism." Seemingly this short-eared ass does not know that the mercenary Hessians who fought the Continental Army in a war that was no concern of theirs and who burned Trenton, bringing disgrace to the people of Germany were worse enemies than the British red coats and were, for a fact, the same breed of hydrophobic intruders and assassins of freedom as are their modern Nazi brothers.

And so the propaganda goes on and on. The persecution and imprisonment on false charges of priests and nuns of the Catholic Church, are justified by spurious charges against them. In fact, the same barbaric treatment is given to the Lutheran Church along with other Protestant denominations. Faked charges against churchmen of sedition, sex crimes, and illegal money export is justified by clever and repeated propaganda. Trade-unionism ruthlessly destroyed and labor enslaved as truly and completely as were the unfortunate Negroes of our own shameful era. Masonry given a death blow by nazi-ism and its leaders jailed, Jews of Nazi Germany, loyal, patriotic and productive are persecuted by the most fiendish and systematic methods ever devised by the degenerate minds of the hated Gestapo, blood purges and mass murder of the flower of Germany's people, charged with nonconformism, become routine and beyond the aid of the masses. The liberty loving people of Germany despoiled of every vestige of freedom and independence are doomed to bestial servitude until nazi-ism is either destroyed or dies of its own venom. Still there are some people in America, Mr. Speaker, who wink at, yea, even condon this wave of bigotry, intolerance, and misrepresentation.

They say the suffering of the Catholic Church in Germany is none of our business. The treatment accorded the Protestants is, so I have heard said, no concern of ours. The persecution of the helpless Jewish minority and confiscation of their properties, like the abolition of Masonry and trade-unionism, is purely a domestic problem for the Nazis to solve as they see fit. The fiendish deportations of millions of Polish citizens from the occupied western provinces of Poland, stripped of all their earthly possessions, and their replacement with unwilling Germans, forced to return as expatriates from neighboring states, excite no compassion in the hearts of some of our indifferent Americans.

That is not what my faith has taught me as regards suppression of religion, free love, confiscation of churches, and the imprisonment of priests and nuns. That is not my understanding of the attitude of American trade-unionism, militant, aggressive, fraternal, and free to express itself, as we know it here in America. That certainly is not approved by the great Masonic fraternity in the United States, and surely cannot hope to have the nod of approbation of the great American public when these varied and base persecutions are all summed up and added to the sad fate of the Jews.

So, as an American, I protest against this wave of propaganda which seeks by misrepresentation and self-justification to corrupt our sense of moral values and disrupt our sense of fairness. I will not lend myself to any aggregation or combination of degenerates who by their propaganda seek to justify fiendish acts of aggression, repression, lust, and persecution, because it is foreign, un-American, it is base and perverted. To me, Americanism means something that is pure, wholesome, unsullied, fearless, impartial and, like truth, unchangeable and deathless.

The One-Act Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker and Members of Congress, this is the last opportunity I will have to address you during the second session, or special session, of the Seventy-sixth Congress, which was called by the President of the United States, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, for the purpose of enacting neutrality legislation. After we were called here the leaders of the party refused the Members of Congress the privilege of discussing or considering any other legislation but neutrality. This was a travesty on justice, because there is important legislation that needs attention, and especially there are many bills which have been passed during Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration which should be changed. We were in session 6 weeks and most of the time doing nothing—a waste of time to Congressmen and anxiety and expense to the taxpayers and general public.

The most outstanding of these are the Wagner Act and the act creating the National Labor Relations Board. These two acts, instead of helping the workers of this country, are doing the laboring man a great injustice. The majority of labor does not have an opportunity to assert itself. The men who are ruling in the labor war today are the radical labor leaders, and I dare say that 10 percent or less of labor is permitted to rule the other 90 percent, especially in the case of the C. I. O. unions. They are closing up more business enterprises, creating more strikes, and causing more disturbance and more bitter feeling between employer and employee, between capital and labor, than at any time in the history of America.

If the results were that labor was given better opportunities and greater wages, more satisfaction, then I should not make this protest, but when I am confident that labor is being injured, manufacturers are being wrecked, and the country at large is suffering, I feel it is my duty as a public servant to raise my voice in protest in order that I may make this country a better place to live. When the C. I. O., with its communistic, radical tendencies, controls the labor situation, to the detriment of all labor, when they head Labor's Non-Partisan League—a political propaganda agency for the welfare of the radical labor leaders—in order that they may get the labor vote to work and assist in the election of radicals to public office, it is time the American people wake up.

I want to call your attention to an article published in the Washington Star of November 4 concerning the fact that Kolb's Dairy and Kolb's Bakery, in Baltimore, closed their doors and went out of business because they were not able to meet the demands of the radical labor leaders. I herewith insert the article:

BALTIMORE FIRM CLOSES WHEN UNION ASKS RAISES

BALTIMORE, November 4.—Kolb's Dairy and Kolb's Bakery, in business in Baltimore since 1921, were shut today—closed, President John G. Kolb asserted, because union employees demanded increased wages he couldn't pay.

Not only was he closing the plants, Mr. Kolb said, but he was also going out of business.

He announced customers of his 2 companies were being taken over by other concerns in the city, and his 80 employees would have to find other jobs.

A contract signed with American Federation of Labor unions last year upped his pay roll $835 a month, he asserted, and the business was operating at a loss. When union representatives sought a new contract, involving certain wage increases, "we decided to go out of business."

"Eventually, if present conditions continue," Mr. Kolb added, "there will be more doing what we have done—close up."

I know of many businessmen today who are trying to figure out what they can do to wind up their business, salvage all they can, and quit business forever because the difficulties in operating are so great that they realize they are going in the "red" every day, and the only thing for them to do is to close up and get out. Why is it that more people are trying to secure Government jobs today than ever before? Just because we are taking opportunity away from the American businessmen who were the creators of jobs. It is not the politician or the man who is looking after labor in order to get votes who make jobs—no, indeed; it is the man who is out in the world trying to do something and to be fitted for more than just work with a pick and shovel; it is the man who wants to go ahead who is the fellow who creates the jobs and gives the opportunity of work to the other fellow. He is the man who creates jobs.

Much has been said about the businessman of this country making too much money. Well, it is the easiest thing in the world for the Members of Congress to adjust the income and inheritance taxes so that we can keep the businessman in his earnings to any level we so desire. We can regulate how much money he can receive net in salary by means of the income-tax law; then why worry about anyone making too much money? If, by chance, he has already made his money and has it salted down, as it were, is it not the easiest thing to adjust the inheritance tax so that when he dies the Federal Government can get any part of it it may want? He will have no opportunity to take it with him, regardless of his destination.

Why do we not have sensible, sane legislators who will give practical thought to, and put into practical application, laws that are just—laws that will continue to build up our country and continue to make it the greatest country on the face of the earth? It seems to me that we are very shortsighted, and that many of the laws that have been passed during this administration should be changed, and changed at once before it is too late.

WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO GET THE MONEY?

Where are you going to get the money to operate this Government under conditions such as we have now? The Treasury statement shows that we are in the "red" over a billion and a half dollars since the 1st of July and that we will be $4,000,000,000 in the "red" by next June 30; we are practically up to the borrowing capacity of our Government of $45,000,000,000; and look at the contingent liabilities, which now total over $5,356,000,000, and which is not considered part of the public debt. We have set this Government up in more business enterprises under Mr. Roosevelt's administration, despite the fact that he promised in his preelection campaigns that he would consolidate Government departments and eliminate bureaus, and has, instead, increased them more than any five Presidents who have been in the chair. The national deficit of this administration has been greater than any other administration, and will be even greater than that of Mr. Wilson during the time of the World War. When will Mr. Roosevelt carry out his promises that we will make our income equal our outgo; when will he simplify Government operation so that the cost will be greatly reduced—or, in other words, when will we balance the Budget? He promised it to us why does he not make good his promises? It seem to me that a man who promises something to the American people should be as good as his word.

WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO GET THE MONEY?

Let me call your attention to the deficit of Mr. Roosevelt's administration:

Mar. 4, 1933, to June 30, 1933	$892,600,000
June 30, 1934	3,409,000,000
June 30, 1935	2,938,000,000
June 30, 1936	4,361,000,000
June 30, 1937	2,707,000,000
June 30, 1938	1,459,000,000
June 30, 1939	3,685,000,000
June 30, 1940 (estimated)	4,000,000,000
	23,451,600,000

How can Mr. Roosevelt look this country in the face and appease his own conscience with the statement that he made on March 4, 1933, in his inaugural address? He stated—and I quote:

Through this program of action we address ourselves to putting our own national house in order and making the income balance outgo.

That was a wise statement then; it is just as wise, and more so, today. When he looks back over his record of spending, it is the most shameful record that has ever stood out for the American people. Instead of trying to economize in government, he and the Congress that represents him have been thinking only about spending, spending, spending. They are not spending the money of this generation and of our people today; they are hoarding up a great national debt for our children, our children's children, and our children's children's grandchildren to pay. It is anything but wise, and it certainly is not a good heritage for our children, and only men without any ability whatever would permit a thing of that kind to go on. No two or three generations can carry on the Government of this country and assume this great obligation. We cannot tear them down by exorbitant taxation, for let me quote what Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt said at Pittsburgh on October 19, 1932:

Taxes are paid in the sweat of every man who labors. If excessive, they are reflected in idle factories, tax-sold farms, and, hence, in hordes of the hungry tramping the streets and seeking jobs in vain. Our workers may never see a tax bill, but they pay in deductions from wages, in increased cost of what they buy, or (as now) in broad cessation of employment. Our people and our business cannot carry its excessive burdens of taxation.

Today we find ourselves in a most terrible situation. I have heard Members of Congress say that we are never going to pay these debts; that we will repudiate them. Has it occurred to you that if we do we will lose our form of government, because no nation under the face of the sun has ever repudiated its debts and maintained its form of government? Should not we buckle our belts and get down to work, try to be sensible, pay off this debt, and maintain the form of government that our forefathers worked so hard for and, in 1776, shed so much blood that we might have liberty; that we might have freedom of religion, freedom of the press, and freedom of speech? Are we going to lose all this and take the form of a dictatorship? God forbid that such a thing will ever happen to America. But I say to you now that unless you stop the present administration and the present way of doing things, it will happen to you just as sure as the sun will rise tomorrow morning. Five or six years more and it will be all over. We will lose our present form of government.

The American people do not know, or at least they do not realize, the seriousness of this situation. It is a serious thing, in my mind. It is terrible to contemplate, and the American people will think the same when it happens. The philosophy of our forefathers, of trying to work and earn a living and save a few dollars for a rainy day, seems to have been lost sight of by this administration. All they think about is spend, spend, spend. They encourage people to do nothing; they encourage them to receive money from the Federal Government and State; they encourage them to think that it is the Government's business to take care of all people, whether they want to work or whether they do not. The old philosophy was that we must take care of our Government if we wish to have law and order, and I am sure that is the sensible solution. If we get back, and get back at once, to trying to aid and assist in the perpetuation of our Government by having good, sound, and sensible laws, the better it will be for our country and for the citizens of this country, and the better it will be for all political parties.

Mr. Speaker, majority leader, chairmen of the various committees, why do you not get together with the committees of the Senate, formulate some plan that will keep our country from going on the rocks? If you do that before it is too late, it will be the very best possible thing that you can do. Here is hoping that you will take this advice, that you will call your men together before the 3d day of January 1940, and that you will not permit the spending spree that has been going on during the past 8 years to continue in 1940. I beg of you to do this, and if you do you will have the undying gratitude of the American children yet unborn. You will have the support of all good sound-thinking American citizens of today. Internal revolution is all too often the result of overburdened people.

The administration is advocating spending an additional $1,200,000,000 on the Navy next year. Do they realize when we complete the present additional Navy of about 100 new fighting craft that our annual war burden of Navy, $770,473,241; Army military, $499,876,686; and Army nonmilitary of $306,182,464 for 1940, making a total of annual appropriations of over $1,576,542,000 for the year will be increased over and above this sum about $500,000,000 additional. A tremendous burden, and yet the instrumentalities for war become obsolete in a few years. I am for adequate defense, but we are permitting a war-minded administration to run wild at this time under the guise of neutrality and keep America out of war. Let us keep our feet on the ground and not be stampeded into bankruptcy. For thus we are surely headed. Where are we going to get the money? Let the administration answer.

Farm Imports

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK CARLSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, I am submitting for the RECORD a table giving the comparison of imports of foodstuff and farm raw materials for the first 9 months of 1938 and the first 9 months of 1939.

Import item	Unit	9 months ended September—
		1938	1939
FOODSTUFFS
Cattle, except for breeding	Head	296,000	604,000
Wheat for milling and export	Bushels	1,203,000	8,091,000
Meat products	Pounds	112,177,000	124,803,000
Cheese	Pounds	37,405,000	37,613,000
Fish (canned, prepared, etc.)	Pounds	107,915,000	129,974,000
RAW MATERIALS
Hides and skins	Pounds	112,093,000	237,542,000
Flaxseed	Bushels	10,944,000	13,849,000
Tobacco, unmanufactured	Pounds	54,679,000	57,820,000
Cotton, unmanufactured	Pounds	85,488,000	73,595,000
Wool, unmanufactured	Pounds	54,437,000	177,194,000
Flax and hemp, unmanufactured	Tons	1,432	4,613

Source: U. S. Department of Commerce figures (Oct. 26, 1939).

United States exports of crude foodstuffs, 8 months, 1938 and 1939, by principal classes and countries

Export items and countries	8 months ended August—
	1938	1939
Total crude foodstuffs	$199,067,000	$79,880,000
Wheat	68,018,000	32,364,000
Corn	82,102,000	11,132,000
Vegetables (fresh and dried)	5,421,000	6,419,000
Fruits (fresh)	28,292,000	24,108,000
Other products	15,234,000	5,857,000
Principal export markets:
Belgium	14,017,000	6,320,000
Canada	54,706,000	16,514,000
China	53,000	2,407,000
Cuba	938,000	1,228,000
Denmark	3,975,000	160,000
France	3,431,000	3,182,000
Germany	10,145,000	762,000
Greece	2,272,000	24,000
Ireland	16,873,000	2,654,000
Italy	1,241,000	61,000
Mexico	3,626,000	2,449,000
Netherlands	20,638,000	8,739,000
Norway	2,284,000	696,000
Portugal	1,860,000
Sweden	1,541,000	565,000
United Kingdom	55,400,000	27,716,000
Total, all countries	199,067,000	79,880,000

Source: U. S. Department of Commerce figures.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENT E. KELLER
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, in the presence of the rampant totalitarian onslaught against insufficiently armed peoples it has become a question whether any weak nation, whether weak in numbers or weak in armament, can hope to survive. Unless they are so protected by sufficient treaties of assistance, in case of attack the weak nations are doomed.

We had a right to believe that the era of the walled city, with all the abuses which that condition enforced, had passed by for all time. But this present period of retrogression has brought the walled nations. The Maginot line and the Siegfried line are impregnable walls of defense—expressions of fear between two peoples that ought to and would, left to themselves, be friends and competitors only in serving their fellow men. Walls of fear. Where will it end?

Behind walls of fear democracy cannot grow and develop and bless, as it has in the past. All the growth of democracy has come from the free, open lands of the world. This present destruction of weak nations by totalitarian governments may well be the beginning of the inevitable struggle of democracy to exist in spite of these tyrannies.

Russia, under the cloak of ultra democracy has grown to great power. From recent events it appears the present leaders of that great people have suddenly turned Czarist again. A new set of self-constituted nobility has apparently thrown off the cloak of democracy and blossomed forth in a new military uniform.

The German people are a great people. They do not want war. The Russian people are great people. They do not want war. But neither people appear able to resist the orders of their masters. Time shall surely bring them both into the actual acceptance of democracy. But whether that shall be in 50 years, a hundred years, or 500 years may depend largely on the liberty the present regimes of Germany and Russia are permitted to exercise in destroying the faith of the people in the right to self-government.

We are not going into this war. But the retrogression toward one-man or one-group government rampant in the world today ought to warn America against sleeping sickness for democracy.

We are not going into this war. But unless we be as unwise as the unwise virgins, we are going to prepare fully against the day when this present war is over, so that we may be so strong in preparedness that whatever combination of totalitarianism may emerge from the present war—if such a combination does emerge—they shall not dare to attack us. That is our road to safety. There is no other.

Any man of intelligence who has read the news reports of the many appearances of oceangoing submarines along our shores ought to see that the 3,000 miles of trackless waters between America and Europe might well be a hiding place for the enemies of our country instead of her defense against them. A sufficient number of oceangoing submarines of present efficiency might come so near to destroying our Navy as to greatly limit its ability to protect our shores against invasion by a powerful enemy. We must not overlook the tremendous improvement in these national concealed weapons in the last few years. Nor can we fail to consider the very much greater improvements and development that may reasonably be expected of them in the near future. And in that quite possible case the United States would be open to invasion, because, fine as its personnel is, we have no army adequate to meet a powerful, highly trained, well-equipped, well-provisioned enemy army.

Therefore, in view of this possibility, we will be back to that primitive condition which has existed in most wars—the necessity of a military force sufficient in numbers, in training, in equipment, and supplies to completely and certainly repel every attempt at invasion of the land endangered.

If we are to understand what walled nations may mean, we have only to get a clear understanding of what the walled city meant to civilization, and multiply that condition into national proportions and note honestly what it meant to human liberty and human progress for the thousand years of the Dark Ages. The growth and retention of liberty requires the open, free sunshine under all conditions. The ability of any army to defend our country, and every country, depends on wartime supplies as well as on ships and soldiers, and the best equipment available. As science is applied to equipment and military supplies, this requirement will become constantly more and more important.

If we are to grasp what unpreparedness means, let us look for a moment at what is happening at the present time in China. The Chinese people are a great peace-loving nation. Man for man they are equal to or superior in manhood, courage, and industry to the Japanese. China is a great country, rich in natural resources. There are four times as many of the Chinese as there are the Japanese. The Chinese had little military preparedness, but the Japanese are thoroughly developed in military training, mechanized army equipment, and fully supplied with arms, ammunition, and airplanes. They have overrun half of the great Chinese Republic. They have bombed the cities and already destroyed hundreds of thousands of Chinese old men, women, and children. And for the first time in centuries, the Japanese armies are encouraged to do that utterly defenseless thing which every other army in modern times has punished by death. It is a part of the invasion of China that the Japanese soldiers are directed to rape the Chinese women and young girls wherever the Japanese armies appear.

Hundreds of thousands of young girls have been raped—not in the dark and lonely places only, but in broad daylight in the open streets, in front of the girls' schools and colleges, where our civilization has provided these institutions.

In proportion as the Chinese had arms and ammunition they have defended their women and children bravely. But the lack of military supplies is permitting the constant repetition of these horrors. The cries of thousands of Chinese women and girls go up every day against the merciless assault of Japanese rapists. A small nation turned bandit is destroying a numerous pacifist nation because that pacifist nation lacks trained men, equipment, and especially arms and ammunition.

I call attention to this condition because I am hopeful that through contemplation of it by those among us who have reached the conclusion that both sides in all wars are wrong should be awakened to the facts of history—that there are two kinds of armies in all wars—armies of aggression and armies of defense. Armies of defense have for all these centuries stood for the defense of the mothers of their countries and the girls who are to become mothers. The men in the defending armies of the world have deemed it an honor and a glory to give their lives in defense of these mothers and mothers to be. Without these defending armies, without men willing to die for the security of womanhood, there would be no civilization and no security in the world today. But it must be pointed out that these defending armies have often been destroyed for lack of training and equipment, arms, and ammunition. That the enslavement of the people by armies of invasion, even where rape has been forbidden, has nevertheless enforced conditions upon conquered people as bad in the long run as China is now undergoing.

All of us Americans must wake up to our own state of unpreparedness to the fact that it takes time to train armies, it takes time to provide equipment, it takes time to provide the means for making arms and ammunition. It takes time to build our airplanes in sufficient numbers to meet the requirements of future wars. We should, therefore, miss no opportunity to provide these fundamentals, which require time in providing proper defense of our own interests.

We ought to remember that we were thrown into the World War because Germany knew we were woefully unprepared. She gambled with destiny in the belief that we could not prepare in time to be effective. And those who know the inside know the tremendous difficulties we had to overcome and the terrible costs we had to bear before we were effective in that war. In short, if we had had a good army and a good navy we would not have been compelled to go into the World War. The several billions it would have cost to provide an adequate army and navy would have saved the vast number of billions we spent in the war and the vaster number of billions yet to be spent as the result of that war. We would have saved the usefulness of the large number of young Americans who died or were incapacitated in that war. If we are not entirely lacking in wisdom we will not be caught again in such a condition.

The opportunity to prepare against such a condition is before us to take it or leave it without endangering our own peace or without any danger of participation in this war. If we repeal this arms embargo we can and will establish munitions factories and learn how to make military supplies for our own armies, which we have always neglected and will likely go on neglecting in time of universal peace. We shall learn to apply mass production to building airplanes and be able to supply sufficient numbers for full protection in case we are attacked. But if we provide all these things sufficiently no nation will be foolish enough to attack us, and we are not going to attack our neighboring nations.

It will incidentally put many men to work, and after the present war passes the chemical plants will be diverted to the manufacture of other products, as most of these were after the World War.

It is our national interest to build, or have built, these chemical plants ready for our own use in case of necessity. It is fundamentally to our national interest to put men to work learning our own needs in case war be forced upon us. It is a national necessity to gain the widest possible experience in building and using airplanes.

These three elements of preparedness will be a valuable contribution toward discouraging any nation from attacking us. Let us understand perfectly that whatever feeling we may have on the subject, American money is going to make and sell war supplies in this war. If we fail to remove the embargo, there are some billions of dollars of American money ready to build airplane, chemical, and ammunition plants in Canada. I am in favor of keeping that money at home, giving our own idle men the work it will afford, and learn how and be prepared to make our own military supplies in America for the safety and security of America. Of course, if we lived in a civilized world all this military preparation could and would be dispensed with. We could and would beat our swords into plowshares; we would learn to do away with poverty; we would turn our energies to the service of our fellow men; we would bless the fathers and mothers of our children, and set the feet of their wee tots in the paths of opportunity; we would provide universal employment; and we would provide full security for every man and woman in our country as the fires of life waned. But so long as the armies of armed nations march and murder their neighbors, destroy weak nations, and brazenly defend all the crimes their armies commit, this great beacon republic must train armies, build navies, plan ahead against the marauding nations of the world, who only understand force and themselves only obey fear.

We passed the present law in the hope that our example of willingness to forego wartime profits would tend to prevent war in Europe. But last year it had become evident that it was to exert no such influence. It had become evident that by favoring one side in a possible war, as it evidently did and does, it might, indeed, induce rather than prevent war. We, therefore, started a fight to repeal that law. We gave notice we were going to change that law to comport with our American tradition along that line throughout our entire history. It was our contention then, during peacetime, that if the arms embargo were repealed it would be a powerful deterrent, if not a preventive, against war in Europe. That that was a well-justified hope has been freely admitted by some of the opponents of the pending bill here on the floor of the House. The justification of that conclusion lies in this fact: That at the present time the success or failure of war depends on equipment and supplies for carrying on a war. If one side has abundant supplies and the other has not, regardless of numbers or training, the side which lacks military supplies is bound to lose, no matter how just its cause may be.

There is not a man on the floor of this House who has given unprejudiced thought to this subject who believes for one minute that the repeal of this arms embargo will under any possible chance throw us into this war. It has been, and still is, a crime to put forth perfervid statements telling the mothers of this country that the lives of their sons are in danger. That if we repeal the Embargo Act it will be sure to lead us into war. Whether put forth from ignorance or willful misrepresentation, that has been shameless beyond measure.

This House itself has the full say as to whether we shall ever enter into any war. To pretend anything else is to belie the plain fact. To pretend for a moment that we are under any circumstances to enter this war is to say that the majority of this House is going to vote to enter into this war. When everyone knows that not a single Member of this House can be found who for a moment would even consider voting for such a measure. Where, then, is the excuse for proclaiming that we are in danger of entering this war? In all honesty, there is no excuse at all. Who is there here that will deny this? Then why should anyone proclaim it?

I am against war; I am against crime; I am against inhumanity in all its phases; I am against greed; I am against tyranny in high places and low; I am against poverty. I am for peace; I am for obedience to law and order; I am for mercy and protection of the weak; I am for unselfish cooperation among men nationally and individually; I am for equality among men; I am for plenty for all, and I know it can be provided. I regret that civilization seems to be so far away; I regret that nations engage in murder and robbery against other nations. But in so topsy-turvy a world I know my country must of necessity seek first its own security under the law of nations. It must with intelligence and ever-present courage go straight forward, regardless of the influences and intrigues of other countries. It has always done that, and always must. When Russia makes a treaty to sell war supplies to one belligerent, we should know that her attempt at preventing this country from selling war supplies also is purely selfish and ought to point clearly and unmistakably to our right and duty in this matter.

I am not against Germany, I am not against Russia, I am not against Great Britain, I am not against France; neither am I for Germany, nor am I for Russia; neither am I for Great Britain, nor am I for France; but I am irretrievably and eternally for the United States of America. I am for its free institutions and its free people. I shall cast my vote that way on this bill in the sole interest of our country, whatever be the result to any other country. Wherever and whenever the interests of America are at stake, I shall have an eye single for those interests. I shall refuse to consider any influence that may be brought to bear in behalf of any other country or any other interest than the interests of America. And I accept full responsibility for all my acts in carrying forward neutrality.

It has been and still is a question whether any country should tie its own hands in any manner tending to prevent freedom of action as the unforeseeable conditions may arise. But in this as in all things where the American people express a universal sentiment on a well-considered subject, I defer to their sentiment and decision. The American people have shown a hundred percent desire to stay out of this war. I join most heartily in that sentiment, believing that the sacrifices made in the Senate bill providing for keeping American ships and American citizens out of the war zone is the best, if not the only, means of keeping us out of this war. I shall give my full support to that measure. If this provision had been put into the law last summer during peace, as many of us attempted to do, the international question and the international danger involved in the capture of the American ship Flint would not be a subject for America to worry over. It necessarily follows that if we keep our ships out of the war zone, this incident cannot be repeated. If we keep out of the war zone, we will keep out of war.

The warring nations of Europe have declared a very extensive war zone over the waters surrounding Europe in which they declare themselves free and justified in destroying any commerce that may enter that zone. In view of that action, the nations of the American Continent feel themselves free and justified in announcing the establishment of a peace zone over the waters surrounding this western continent which shall be free of any and all war activities. As we recognize the war zone established by the nations at war, they must in turn recognize and respect this American peace zone.

The formation of this peace zone around the American Continent is the result of an agreement between all the countries which make up this continent. It is a universal cooperative acceptance of the Monroe Doctrine which this Nation put forth 116 years ago. We must therefore not only stand ready and willing to defend it as we always have, but we are obligated to put ourselves in military position to defend it successfully. That will be our best guaranty of peace.

Contraband of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, in response to my letter of September 26, the Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, sent me a translation of a note of September 19 from the German Embassy in Washington which indicates the policy of the German Government concerning articles which will be regarded by it as having the status of contraband. The letter from the German Embassy, dated September 12, 1939, reads in part as follows:

In its endeavor to spare as far as possible peaceful maritime trade, the German Government, in the prize law of August 28, declared as unconditional contraband only such articles and materials intended for enemy territory or enemy armed forces as serve directly the land, sea, or air armament. However, since the Brtiish Government has issued a list of unconditional contraband far exceeding that limitation, the German Government feels compelled likewise to enlarge the scope of unconditional contraband.

The German Government has therefore adopted the following law, which is hereby proclaimed:

ARTICLE 1. The following articles and materials are considered as contraband (unconditional contraband) if they are intended for enemy territory or for enemy armed forces:

1. Weapons of all kinds, and parts and accessories thereof.
2. Ammunition and parts thereof; bombs, torpedoes, shells, and other kinds of projectiles, contrivances for shooting or throwing such projectiles; powder and explosives, including detonators and igniting materials.
3. Warships of all types, their parts and accessories.
4. Military aircraft of all kinds, their parts and accessories, airplane motors.
5. Armored cars, tanks, and armored trains, armor plate of all kinds.
6. Chemical combat materials and contrivances and machines used to throw or blow such chemicals.
7. Military uniforms and equipment.
8. Means of communication, signaling and military illumination, and parts thereof.
9. Transportation and communication equipment and parts thereof; draft animals, beasts of burden, and animals for riding.
10. Materials of all kinds for producing energy and heat; lubricating oils.
11. Gold, silver, currency, certificates of debt.
12. Implements, tools, machines, and material for the production or use of the articles and products enumerated under figures 1 to 11.

PROCLAMATION REGARDING CONDITIONAL CONTRABAND OF SEPTEMBER 12, 1939

Since the British Government has issued a list of conditional contraband and has included therein foodstuffs and other necessities of life, the German Government now feels compelled also on its part to proceed in a corresponding manner. The following is therefore proclaimed:

Under the conditions of article 2 of the prize law of August 28, 1939, the following articles and materials are considered as contraband (conditional contraband):

Foodstuffs (including live animals), luxuries, feeding stuffs and clothing, articles and materials used for their production.

This proclamation becomes effective on September 14, 1939.

The Neutrality Act Passes—What Then?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER M. PIERCE

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, the 71 majority in the final vote in the House of Representatives on November 3, 1939, for the change in the Neutrality Act was the result of the desire to keep peace and followed a careful study of all phases of a most vexing question. Many Congressmen who voted for the original Neutrality Act in 1935 have deeply regretted such action, because the act has, in operation, materially assisted the aggressor nations and has worked to the decided detriment and disadvantage of the struggling weaker nations. It certainly so proved in the case of China and Japan, as the law has never been invoked during their struggle ostensibly because neither nation had declared war. The Neutrality Act of 1935 did help totalitarian states to overthrow the democratic government of Spain, and that act has recently been operating to make the United States an ally of Hitler and Stalin as against the democracies of western Europe.

After most detailed discussion, it was decided that it would not be possible to enforce a law which would allow shipments to belligerents of parts for weapons and then refuse to allow the sale of the finished product. No distinction could be found between shipping parts of an airplane unassembled and shipping to and selling to belligerents the assembled planes. After consideration from every angle, it was also decided that there was no clear line which could possibly be drawn between offensive and defensive weapons.

A reasonable majority of the Members of Congress became convinced that a revision of the Neutrality Act was necessary and would aid our Government in keeping out of the present war in Europe. It must always be remembered that Congress acts through majority rule, and that any bill passing both Houses must have some merit in the eyes of representatives who are also patriotic American citizens. In the Neutrality Act passed on the 3d of November, our country made tremendous and far-reaching sacrifices. The act curtails use by the American merchant marine of the high seas in the North Atlantic. Not only are American ships barred from trading with belligerents, but vessels of United States registry are also prevented from entering the ports of the neutral nations of northern Europe. Many ships which have been in the trade in the Atlantic are now being tied up because American-owned ships can no longer enter the danger zones. This will undoubtedly bring to the fore many serious problems in connection with our shipping. So far as Members of Congress, shipping interests, and the Maritime Commission could foresee consequences, and consistent with the spirit of the act, the interests of American shippers, carriers, and seamen were protected.

Many believed that credit extended prior to 1917 was one of the potent causes of our participation in the World War. It is therefore provided that belligerents must pay cash on the barrel head for all articles or commodities purchased, and that said articles or commodities must be taken away from our ports in their own bottoms. We fought one war, in 1812, for freedom of the seas, which we have now partially surrendered. We have made sacrifices in the present Neutrality Act which would have startled our fathers had they been proposed to those rugged nationalists—all for the purpose of keeping our country out of the European war. We have certainly made our first appeasement.

There will be no war profits in this country. Early in the second regular session of the Seventy-sixth Congress the Ways and Means Committee of the House will be asked to present a war-profits tax bill for an act which will channel into the Treasury all the excess earnings of munitions makers and manufacturers of war materials engaged either directly or indirectly in such business. The Congress has had no evidence that our industries greatly desire munitions business, which would require remaking plants and plans for the uncertainties of war business with nations financially handicapped. The manufacturers also realize the hazards of post-war readjustments. Clearly, there will be no new crop of American millionaires coming out of this European war.

WAR'S ECONOMIC RESULTS WILL BE FELT HERE

While we are not again going to send our soldiers overseas, we are, nevertheless, deeply concerned over the outcome of the contest of arms in Europe. Whatever the results, we shall be most seriously affected. If the war is fought to exhaustion and a stalemate, then we will probably have increased our gold hoard from the present more than 60 percent of the world's monetary gold to 85 percent. National credit will be exhausted, not only in Europe but elsewhere throughout the world. Repudiation of obligations is sure to follow, for England and France cannot pay in case of a prolonged struggle. They must go the same way Germany, Russia, and Austria went after the first World War, when they repudiated national debts.

Our industrial and agricultural prosperity for a century and a half has depended upon our ability to sell in foreign markets—mostly in Europe—our surplus from farm and factory. After a war of exhaustion in Europe, the nations cannot buy, for they will have neither gold, silver, credit, goods, nor services to give in exchange.

The changed world situation will require in our country a more drastic control of farm and factory—wages, hours, interests, profits—than our producers and manufacturers have ever faced or considered possible. Should England and France again be able to dictate terms of peace, even then the economic conditions will be bad. In this event the democracies of western Europe might be able to reconstruct and rebuild their economic life on some sort of a semi-socialistic plan of organization. Should Hitler and Stalin be able to dictate the peace terms, then the picture cannot be drawn too black. Communism in some form would then reach clear to the English Channel and envelop all of Europe. Surely Stalin and Hitler would take the British Navy. Did not England and France take the navy of Germany in 1918? Would the conquerors, Hitler and Stalin, take the gold reserves? Did not Hitler take to Berlin the metal money of Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland?

Should Stalin and Hitler sit at the peace table as dictators, the last flickering lamps of liberty—free speech, free assembly, free religious worship—will go out forever on the continent of Europe. The totalitarian states would rule supreme not only in Europe but in Asia as well. Hitler and Stalin and their associates, cruel to the last degree, would enforce every condition they stipulated. Compared to their action, England and France after Versailles would appear to have been actually faint-hearted and weak-kneed.

Would the conquerors invade the United States? I do not think any sane person believes for a single minute that they would do so, but they might drive us from the high seas, making it necessary for us to make further appeasement, retiring not only from the North Atlantic but probably from the South Atlantic and possibly from the Pacific. Must we give up Pearl Harbor, or perhaps Alaska, or our friendly trade relations with South America, in order to avoid a naval war? Readers of Mein Kampf, Hitler's own book, see clearly that he aims at world domination. And that book, in which he outlines his plans, followed so far without a change, is not only a classic in Germany but it is taught there in every school.

In any event, it appears that the so-called capitalistic civilization, with its dividends and profits, under which we have made such tremendous strides in the arts of peace as well as in wealth, is in serious danger. The people of Italy and Germany traded off their liberties for bread. In England and France they have temporarily traded off their liberties for the possible chance of saving their governments and cities from annihilation.

OUR NATIONAL RESPONSIBILITIES

The United States, with its constant affirmations of belief in democratic government and maintenance of peace, and its powerful preparation for defense of its ideals, is the hope of the world. Together with its neighbors on the American Continent, it will stabilize and strengthen the efforts of smaller and weaker nations to maintain freedom. But what a herculean task lies ahead of us. Can we, with our own subversive elements, especially in the big cities, with our national debt of more than forty billions, with our factories running today nearly 100 percent of capacity while more than 8,000,000 remain unemployed, with foreign markets practically gone—can we now, or could we after the war, under such circumstances as we might face, maintain our economic stability and continue to prosper? Can we make the wheels go round and divide up the profits so that all who live in the United States may prosper as they have every right to expect to do?

We and our children have a mighty task ahead. Coming years will require the coolest and calmest action, and the most sagacious leadership and the highest statesmanship. If we are to save the capitalistic civilization of which we are so proud, it seems that its privileged beneficiaries, who have become rich and powerful, must give up some of their interest and dividends. I have feared the results of interest exactions which have been so burdensome, especially to farmers. Many times I have said, "Interest on bonds and mortgages should never be greater than the increase of wealth which is 2 percent or less per annum." The future may make great changes in our financial system.

Jobs must be provided for all, and the Government must continue to accept the responsibility of unemployment, with its horrible results. Prevention rather than relief should be the watchword. We have yet to learn the method, but we must formulate a permanent plan of meeting such emergencies and abandon the folly of spasmodic action consisting only of making huge appropriations for some agency to expend. We agree, however, that all must have a chance to earn food, clothing, and shelter, and to enjoy satisfactory lives. I know America has seen dark days before, and when I get really depressed I recall some of the dark days of our past. Since living in Washington I have often wondered what the conditions must have been here after the bloody battle at Antietam, 40 miles north; after the terrible 3 days at Gettysburg. Who could then have guessed that the sons and grandsons of the heroes of those days would now sit in the same legislative halls, working together for the common good of their country? I do have faith that in some manner we shall, under our democratic institutions, solve the problems which today appear so difficult. We must not yield to the delusion that we shall not, as a nation, be influenced by wars between nations. We are resolved to hold aloof from them, but we must prepare to face the consequences of political and economic changes which inevitably result from wars and their concluding peace conferences.

Adequate National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, America is advantageously situated between two seas and separated by thousands of miles of ocean from the conflict now raging in Europe and the war now being waged in China. It is my firm belief that we can defend our land against any invasion of a foreign foe for generations to come. To that end, America must be prepared for any emergency. We can well adopt the words uttered by President Roosevelt on November 11, 1935:

> Defense against aggression by others—adequate defense on land, on sea, and in the air—is our accepted policy; and the measure of that defense is and will be solely the amount necessary to safeguard us against the armaments of others.

In providing for the defense of this country we must not forget to develop our research laboratories. This Nation must always be ahead of other nations in new developments of defense instruments. It was shown to the Congress during the last session that, all things being equal, an airplane with a speed advantage over another airship, can 9 times out of 10 beat the slower ship in battle. Accordingly, we should develop in this country the fastest pursuit planes in the world.

We are distorting our national economy more than is desirable in providing for national defense through gigantic orders given to munitions, shipping, and airplane factories during this armament period in history. Now that the arms embargo has been repealed our munitions production will be stepped up still further to disturb our economy. During the period from 1914 to 1917 we were supplying war materials to foreign countries. Our factories were tooled up for foreign governments. When our Government wanted rifles we found that it would take so long to change over for the tooling necessary for a Springfield rifle that this Government had to take Enfield rifles. although they were inferior. It has been stated that it would be impossible to meet our own needs for airplanes in less than 14 months with our own aircraft industry geared up as it is.

We have taken a serious step toward war by repeal of the arms embargo. Our fortunes to a large extent are now tied up with Europe. We took this step knowing full well that no neutral nation in the world sells arms and munitions or implements of war to any belligerent nation. Switzerland has a permanent law which prohibits the sale of arms and ammunition to belligerents. Norway, Sweden, and Denmark have licensing laws which accomplish virtually the same thing. The sole reason given by the ambassadors and ministers of these countries for such action is that they wanted to stay neutral in the present European war.

The President, in his annual message to Congress on January 3, 1936, indicated definitely that we were discouraging the prosecution of war by preventing belligerents from obtaining the instruments to prosecute a war. He said in part:

We decline to encourage the prosecution of war by permitting belligerents to obtain arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States. Second, we seek to discourage the use by belligerent nations of any and all American products calculated to facilitate the prosecution of a war in quantities over and above our normal exports of them in time of peace * * * through a well-ordered neutrality to do naught to encourage the contest, through adequate defense to save ourselves from embroilment and attack.

Further on October 4, 1936, the President stated:

Nevertheless, if war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality.

They would tell you—and, unfortunately, their views would get wide publicity—that if they could produce and ship this and that and the other article to belligerent nations the unemployed of America would all find work.

That was Roosevelt speaking in 1936. But on September 21, 1939, in his special message to Congress he said:

From a purely material point of view what is the advantage to us in sending all manner of articles across the ocean for final processing there when we could give employment to thousands by doing it here?

Our strong defender of neutrality in 1936 is now in the forefront of those who want to break down neutrality in 1939, and the reason advanced is material gain and reduction of unemployment, just as Roosevelt in 1936 predicted would happen.

Let me quote from his speech at Chautauqua, N. Y.:

It would be hard to resist that clamor; it would be hard for many Americans, I fear, to look beyond, to realize the inevitable penalties, the inevitable day of reckoning that come from a false prosperity. To resist the clamor of that greed, if war should come, would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace.

This country is now definitely a munitions depot for the warring nations of Europe. It is suggested that there might be sabotage in the munitions industry of this Nation, just as there was from 1914 to 1919. There will now no doubt be unrestricted submarine warfare. Many ships will be sunk and many lives will be lost on the high seas. We Americans must remain calm in spite of those war incidents which are certain to arise.

DARE ANY NATION ATTACK THE UNITED STATES?

Many people have heard arguments to the effect that when Hitler subdues England and France he will attack America. No authoritative statement from any military expert has come to my attention which presents the thesis that Germany will be victorious. On the contrary, many naval and military experts indicate that the Allies will win this war. Germany has few resources and about 86,000,000 people. Great Britain has vast resources and an empire consisting of about 500,000,000 people. France, with its great Army, will be a tremendous factor in the war. All three nations are well prepared to carry out a long and devastating fight, and if the war continues for 2 years or longer, those nations will end up prostrate. They will be wrecks morally, physically, and financially. They will be ruined for years to come. They could not successfully attack this Nation and we need never fear them. Even if all the nations in the world leveled their full might against us, they would have little chance of overcoming our resistance.

Gen. Smedley D. Butler stated recently:

It will take not less than 1,000,000 soldiers to invade the United States with any hope of even getting ashore.

These million men must come all at once.

They must bring not less than 7 tons of baggage per man—1,000,000 men—7,000,000 tons of food, ammunition, and what not.

They must bring 400,000 motor vehicles. They've got to find room for 50 gallons of gasoline per day for each vehicle.

Why, there are not enough ships in the whole world to carry that kind of an expedition. And, remember, those ships have to have enough fuel to get back with—to make the round trip. * * * They're got to have harbors to land in; docks to get their stores ashore; * * * and don't forget that we happen to have a navy, and it's the best in the world.

Now, what about an aerial invasion?

Well, Colonel Lindbergh and Eddie Rickenbacker, the two foremost flyers we have, already have told you it's ridiculous to talk or to think about bombing New York from Berlin.

And don't forget that we have an air force of our own.

From this it is clearly evident that the European powers now at war could not successfulliy attack this Nation. The United States can and must stay out of the present European war. We Americans can perform a more noble task for civilization by making this Nation a better place to live in and by making democracy work here.

Anent the Dies Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

LETTER FROM HELEN WOOD

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein a letter from Miss Helen Wood, acting administrative assistant in the United States Department of Labor, Wage and Hour Division, anent her inclusion in the list published by the Dies committee. The letter speaks for itself and comes from a woman whose friends and coworkers in my own State have been of the best. They as well as I relish this chance to afford her the best medium of defense she has at this time.

The letter follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
WAGE AND HOUR DIVISION,
Washington, October 26, 1939.

Hon. JAMES A. SHANLEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SHANLEY: I am enclosing a copy of a letter which I have today written to Congressman MARTIN DIES regarding the publication of my name as a member of the League for Peace and Democracy.

As you undoubtedly are aware, for the past 8 years I was in the employ of the State of Connecticut as deputy labor commissioner and later as executive director of the unemployment compensation division. I feel that the erroneous connection of my name with the activities of the Dies committee is not only a reflection on me personally, but upon the State of Connecticut for having had on its staff someone reputed to have been connected with un-American activities.

You may use this letter in any way you see fit to correct the abuse which innocent people are experiencing at the hands of the Dies committee.

Very truly yours,

HELEN WOOD,
Acting Administrative Assistant.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD A. KELLY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, in the general debate that has ensued for the past few months over the most controversial matter that has been brought before Congress to decide since our entrance into the last World War the question in every American's mind today is, Shall we retain the present Neutrality Act as defined by law or whether we shall repeal certain provisions of it?

Mr. Speaker, one thing is certain; the minds of the American people have been aroused as they never have been before. In my 9 years as Representative from the Third Congressional District of Illinois I have received thousands upon thousands of letters, telegrams, and telephone calls when certain legislation was pending before Congress for consideration. Many of these letters were from people who were sincere in their expressed thoughts of mind; many, however, came from organized propaganda agencies, handed out in form letters for people to sign and send on to Washington for the purpose of preventing the enacting of legislation that is beneficial for the public welfare. People who signed these letters allowed their names to be used without ever knowing what the legislation was about and the purpose for its consideration. Many were compelled to sign them by coercive methods of employers, with the threat—if they did not—of the loss of their positions. These, of course, are old methods used by those in gaining their objective in life.

Mr. Speaker, of all the legislation that came before Congress for consideration, never have I experienced the flood of letters and telegrams from people in and out of my district, instructing me how to vote. Some were letters that had been well thought by the minds of those who sent them and were of a sincere nature; others by the language and phraseology and contents came from propaganda sources, for comparing these letters, hundreds of them have the same wording. I have no quarrel with the persons who sent them on to me, I thank them for the interest they have taken in their Government, and of the special interest in counseling me as their representative. But I feel sorry for them for not having the proper knowledge of the pending legislation upon which they so sincerely expressed themselves. Mr. Speaker, leaders of propaganda agencies never enlighten the minds of people with the truth, that is not their purpose, for their purpose is bent upon one object and that is to gain their own objective by holding back the truth. Judging from some of the communications I have received there seems to be a great deal of confusion upon their part in not having the truth explained to them. For instance, most of them are under an impression that by repealing the arms-embargo provision of the present law, we declared a declaration of war upon Germany.

I have heard that statement conveyed to them over the radio; that is not so, and those who made that statement know it is not so.

Mr. Speaker, as an ex-soldier and a member of the American Expeditionary Forces of the last World War, I sympathize with the American people and know that they do not want war. For the futility of the last war is too fresh in all of our minds, and God forbid that I ever cast a vote that would send a mother's son to fight a war on foreign soil that we were not of the making.

I, as a father, have two sons, one who would become eligible for military service in a few years, an athlete of the finest type, one who received a gold medal last year from the school which he attends. He is to me as all the sons of mothers and fathers in America are to them, fine young men, symbolic of real American manhood; therefore, I am activated by the same motives as they are, fearing that the day would come to send them off to war.

My vote will be cast with a clear conscience and with one purpose only, and that will be to keep America out of war.

Mr. Speaker, how are we going to keep out of war? No man's mortal mind can answer that, but we can best prepare to keep out, and that is for this Nation to remain neutral.

With the provision of the present Neutrality Act we can never hope to keep out and remain a neutral Nation. With our ships owned by American shippers, manned by American seamen, sailing into ports of belligerent nations, loaded down with steel ingots, copper tubing, cotton, metals, and raw materials to make arms, but we cannot sell the arms themselves. We can sell belligerents the metals and other material to make arms, and we can deliver them in our own ships, but we cannot sell arms, we can under the present law sell tractors, but not armored ones; airplanes, but not armed ones; foodstuffs and all the implements of war, that help make war, but we cannot sell manufactured arms and ammunitions, but we can sell everything that is used for that purpose to countries that manufacture arms and ammunitions from our raw materials; it has no sense or justification.

And above all things under the present law our ships take these materials of war to ports of belligerents, that is where the danger lies. Overt acts are bound to happen to these ships just as it happened in 1917 when this country, under the rules of international law, was finally brought into the war by Germany paying no attention to international law and the freedom of the seas by neutral nations, began blowing up our ships. The American people rose in indignation then, they will do it again unless we change the law and make it possible for those things never to occur again.

Mr. Speaker, I am not worrying about any of the belligerent nations committing overt acts against this Nation that might be serious. I do not think any of them would try deliberately to commit such an offense, for history is too young in the memories of those that tried before, and lost.

Neither do I subscribe to organized cowardice that prevails today in America by those who subscribe to the thought—innocently perhaps—that the belligerent nations or those nations in Europe that are tearing down democracies every day, that they should write the foreign policy of our Nation, and tell us as a neutral what we shall do. God forbid that day will ever come.

Are we to forsake our traditional rights inherited by us through great men like Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln? Are we, as a neutral nation, going to forsake men like Commodore Barry; men like Perry, when engaged in battle on Lake Erie shouted, "Don't give up the ship."

Are we going to forsake and forget men of Commodore Stephen Decatur's caliber, who said, "Our country, in her intercourse with foreign nations, may she always be in the right, but our country, right or wrong."

O Mr. Speaker, we cannot forget the above quotation, uttered by a man like Decatur, that smashed the Barbary pirates when England could not, to establish the United States doctrine of freedom of the seas.

Mr. Speaker, if this Nation wishes to remain neutral, she can do it now, she can prevent that which occurred in 1917, she can at least prevent serious overt acts being committed against her on the seas and especially in war zones, by repealing the arms-embargo provision of the Neutrality Act and by accepting the Senate bill as amended.

I wish to quote at this time remarks of Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS, Senator from the State of Nebraska, in a radio address he delivered over the blue network of National Broadcasting Co. on October 3, 1939, at Washington, D. C., in which he said, "No man can tell with absolute certainty whether it is possible for us to keep out of the war. No one can foresee the changes that may occur in the immediate future. The course for us to pursue is the one least liable to get us in—the course to avoid is the one which in all probability would take us into the war."

The proposed changes in the present neutrality act will in all probability eliminate us from getting entangled in any controversial matters that may get us in.

Adopting the cash-and-carry plan where all countries will have the same privileges of coming here and purchasing all materials, including food, by paying cash for them, all rights, title, and interest must be transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, corporation, or national before they leave our ports, and above all they must be carried in their own ships. And when these ships sail from American they are on their own, we are not responsible for any danger they might incur.

It also is proposed to make it "unlawful for any American vessel to carry passengers or articles or materials" to any port of a belligerent nation.

Therefore, when American citizens will have no interest in any property that may be destroyed on the seas, they will not then be calling on this Government for protection.

